There were four great corps in the Republican army of 1896—the manufacturers, the money changers, and the trust managers. These three classes furnished the money to corrupt and the influence to coerce thousands of voters. The fourth corps was the "old-soldier element," over 2,000,000 voters strong. To the manufacturing contingent a higher tariff was promised, and the Dingley bill, in its interest, was forced through Congress and became a law within six months after President McKinley was inaugurated. The money power was promised more bonds and straight-out legislation in favor of the gold standard, and those promises have been duly performed. The commercial and industrial trusts were pledged immunity from prosecution under existing laws, and full faith has been kept with them. The Republican party is therefore assured of the moral support and financial contributions of the capitalistic classes, and certain to have a vast corruption fund for use in the campaign of 1900. Having the sinews of war in abundance, the promoters of McKinleyism feel that they are in no danger, even if they have perfidiously and ungratefully ignored their pledges to give their allies of the veteran corps "fair treatment and generous recognition."

WHY FAITH HAS NOT BEEN KEPT WITH VETERANS.

One reason is because the purse-proud adherents of plutocracy feel that they are always sure of the vote of "the soldier element," no matter how recreant they may be to solemn promises made to it. They confidently count on the soldiers' votes in the coming election, because of their successful efforts in the past to appeal to the patriotism and play on the prejudices of the veterans. The Republican managers chuckle as they contemplate the existing excitement in old-soldier circles, and dismiss the threatened mutiny with the reflections: "The old 'Vets' are so accustomed to voting the Republican ticket that, while they may make wild threats of desertion, when it comes right down to voting as they talk rather than as they shot, they can not help being 'loyal.' A real, live President in a G. A. R. parade and a judicious ante-election waving of the 'old flag' will cause the old fellows to forget all our broken promises and forgive even Commissioner Evans's dubious management of the Pension Bureau."

But the chief reason why the Administration has not kept faith with Union veterans is because it is hopelessly committed to the expensive policy of

IMPERIALISM.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, our national expenditures were $365,000,000, of which $141,000,000 were for pensions. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, we expended $605,000,000, of which only $139,000,000 went to pensioners. Of this tremendous increase in our expenditures, amounting to over $280,000,000, or twice the amount of money expended for pensions, at least $150,000,000 were spent last year in attempting to carry out the vicious policy of imperialism.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, over $112,000,000 in war taxes were wrung from our people, of which over $8,000,000 was produced by the tax on tea.

Contemplate the fact that money by the scores of millions is being annually squandered and hundreds of brave young lives are being yearly sacrificed in a chimerical scheme to force our political ideas, our so-called civilization, on an alien people.

Then realize that, as shown by the report of the Pension Bureau for 1899, 144,397 veterans of our Army and Navy, their widows and dependents, are pensioned at less than 40 cents a day, while thousands of other needy and deserving veterans, their widows and orphans, have no pensions at all. Yet pensioned and unpensioned veterans must contribute from their meager hoards toward defraying the expenses of our military missionizing and the maintenance of our colonial satrapies. At less than one-fourth of the annual financial cost of imperialism a service or a per diem pension bill could be enacted and carried into effect, and enough funds would be left over to give a proper increase of pension to every deserving veteran now pensioned under the general law.

The interest of those who profit by imperialism and the interests of the Union's veterans are, therefore, necessarily hostile and irreconcilable. Already the people, and especially the moneyed classes, are restive under the burdens of the Dingley tariff and the war-revenue law. A reduction in taxation must occur in the near future. This will mean greater rigidity in pension practice or a radical change in our policy as to our insular acquisitions.

Having in mind the contrast between recent Republican promises and performances, the discerning veteran is bound to conclude that the pensioner, not the colonial parisite, will be the sufferer.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

Who is responsible for the complete failure of the Republican party to carry out the pledges and promises made to the veterans in its platform of 1896? For over three years H. Clay Evans has been the most abused man in America. Posts of the Grand Army of the Republic have fulminated against him; the organs of the various organizations of veterans have belabored him with vigor and virulence; whenever and wherever an old soldier has a grievance—and thousands of them have been treated unfairly and unjustly—he places the blame upon Evans. In short, H. Clay Evans, in old-soldier circles, is held up and hooted at as the sum total of official deviltry and political perfidy. The truth is, however, for the sins and hypocrisies of the McKinley pension policy. President McKinley appointed Evans Commissioner of Pensions, and could have removed him at any time the Commissoner's course was unsatisfactory. Corporal Tanner was summarily dismissed from the Commissionership because his administration of the Pension Bureau displeased President Harrison. No one will question the power of the President to remove Mr. Evans. The question naturally arises, "Does President McKinley know that his Commissioner of Pensions is and has been for three years abrogating and ignoring the law, unfairly and arbitrarily rejecting just pension claims, insulting and spying upon soldier's widows, and in every way possible giving the lie to the solemn pledge of the platform on which Major McKinley was elected—to give the veterans of the Union armies "fair treatment and generous recognition?"

EVANS IS THE OFFICIAL SCAPEGOAT

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY KNOWS ALL THIS.

It has been iterated and reiterated to him, and he can not plead ignorance to any of the charges of Pension Bureau mismanagement. Knowing, as he must know, all of the damning truth in failing to cause his party's pledges to Union veterans to be kept, and in permitting his Commissioner of Pensions to revive and continue "every odious practice of William Lochren," President McKinley can not escape the charge that he and not his understrapper, Evans, is responsible for the breach of his party's solemn pledges and for the indignities and outrages which have been heaped upon the heads of Union veterans, their widows and orphans, during his Administration.

EVANS HAS BEEN BUFFER

long enough. He has acted well his part, but veterans will be no longer deceived. It is an insult to their intelligence to assume that the removal of the Commissioner now, or later in the campaign, would acquit the President of knowledge of and complicity in the monstrous conspiracy to hold up and pare down the allowance of pension claims which has been going on during the past three years. The Administration purposes to use Commissioner Evans as a shield and cloak to this shocking confidence game until assured that it no longer conceals the real conspirators; then we may expect the usual political trick. The President will rise in indignant majesty, theatrically denounce Commissioner Evans as a betrayer of the Presidential confidence, and summarily remove the offender. This scenic effect will be followed by the appointment of a new Commissioner, who, during the closing weeks of the campaign, will "work the soldier racket for all it is worth" in the doubtful States, and the gentlemen who have enacted the little comedy will fraternally don the blue and sally forth to the Philadelphia encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to try once again to persuade their comrades to "vote as they shot."

Fortunately, however, Union veterans know that ever since September, 1899, the President has been directly, personally, and completely estopped from denying knowledge of and responsibility for Commissioner Evans's official acts for reasons clearly set forth in the following article, which appeared in the National Tribune under date of September 14, 1899:

EVANS'S CONDEMNATION.

Several times in the history of the Grand Army of the Republic the national encampment has found it necessary to criticise the Commissioner of Pensions, but never to visit upon anyone the unstinted condemnation it has unanimously passed upon Commissioner Evans.

Even Lochren did not move it to so stinging a rebuke. Then we were in the hands of a declared and open enemy, from whom we had no reason to hope for anything. Now it is a professed friend, who adds hypocrisy to injustice and aggravates cruelty by tireless slander.

With all the force that can be given language the encampment denies absolutely the view of the law which Evans inherited from his predecessor and has still further harshened by his own animus. It points out that the opposite view had the support of such peerless lawyers as Benjamin Harrison and John W. Noble, while his has not the sanction of a single lawyer of reputation.

It convicts him of going even beyond the worst phases of Lochrenism in his eagerness to withhold from the veterans and their widows that which the laws granted them, and of having converted his office into a spouting geyser of defamation which has constantly filled the papers of the country with slanders against the men and women to whom the nation owes boundless gratitude. It points out that this unintermittent flow of disparagement is never relieved by a single word of appreciation of the gallantry, heroism, and self-sacrifice of those men and women, though his Bureau must teem with multitudinous testimonials which could not fail to move a heart less icily cold.

It shows that he has as little justification for his slanders as for his pretended law, and then, stating its hopelessness of relief from him, lays the whole matter before the President, citing the law which specially charges the Chief Magistrate with the oversight and control of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The whole matter is therefore appealed directly to President McKinley. With the utmost respect, with impressive dignity, in carefully measured words, all the more forceful for their thoughtful circumspection, the President is informed that his Commissioner of Pensions has utterly failed to carry out the spirit and intent of the laws, and that he has done this with a persistent zeal which seems to imply a perverse animus. The encampment is a jury which presents a unanimous finding of facts to the President. It does not embarrass him with so much as a recommendation as to his action upon them. The encampment, which must always maintain the most exalted and American view of the Chief Magistrate, took the proper attitude that it was only necessary to present the facts to the President. He could not fail to act properly upon them.

So the matter stands at the present writing.

That the veterans feel keenly President McKinley's treatment of them is evident. After all that was said and done prior to, during, and after the Philadelphia encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, they hoped that the President in his last annual message would manfully come to the front and at least say something good of them. The state paper in question was cold, formal, and noncommittal on the subject of pensions. So much so that the National Tribune of December 14, 1899, mournfully observed:

WHY IT WAS DISAPPOINTING.

In the hurry of going to press last week we could only say of the reference to pensions in the President's message that it "was distinctly disappointing."

Now we shall say why it was so.

The bitter discontent of the veterans and their friends with the maladministration of the Pension Bureau is now more than six years old. It began in 1893 when Cleveland, Hoke Smith, and William Lochren began their cruel work of disemboweling the pension laws, and particularly the act of June 27, 1890. The bitterness increased as these men perfected their work, and by 1896 became an overwhelming sentiment, which expressed itself most vigorously at the polls. President McKinley, and all those who were candidates with him that year, sympathized with the discontent, and promised sweeping reforms if intrusted with power. They were successful at the polls, and Henry Clay Evans was made Commissioner of Pensions, presumably to carry out the preelection promises, "obliterate every vestige of Clevelandism, Hoke-Smithism, and Lochrenism," and restore the administration of the pension laws to what it had been under President Harrison, Secretary Noble, and Commissioner Raum. Instead of doing this Mr. Evans has continued virtually every obnoxious rule, regulation, and practice of Lochren, and in many instances intensified and harshened them. It has been made even harder to get justice under Evans than it was under Lochren, though the veterans and their widows are now six years older, and therefore incomparably more deserving of speedy action on their claims.

Naturally, therefore, the bitterness of discontent has gone on increasing, and been sharpened by the feeling that the veterans and their widows have been the victims of ingratitude and deceit.

WHAT HAS THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC DONE?

When the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, sometimes referred to in old soldiers' circles as the "House of Lords," assembled in the city of Philadelphia last year, its membership was in a serious dilemma. Their constituents, as individuals, posts, and, in many cases, departments, were clamorous for the removal of Commissioner Evans and a complete return to the liberal pension procedure that prevailed during the Administration of President Harrison.

Gleefully commenting upon what it apparently then regarded as a victory for Union veterans in their fight to force the Administration to make good its ante-election pension pledges, the National Tribune of September 28, 1899, said editorially:

The newspapers of the country are beginning to realize that Evans badly deceived them when he proclaimed that he had won a decisive victory in the national encampment. They are beginning to understand the fullness of the condemnation passed upon him, and the more radical of the soldier haters are turning around and abusing the national encampment. Evans finds himself caught in a severe pinch. After his proclamation in advance that the Administration was going to stand by him and send a number of prominent officials to control the encampment, he is estopped from using his favorite excuse that that body was "controlled by pension attorneys." Everybody knows that there were never so many district attorneys, marshals, postmasters, revenue officers, and minor officials in the national encampment. Almost everybody else than pension attorneys was in evidence at Philadelphia.

It will be hardly presumed that these Federal officeholders were numbered among those officers and delegates of the encampment who were urging the organization to declare open war on Commissioner Evans and make formal demand on the President for his removal and for a complete about-face in his pension policy. No; these district attorneys, marshals, postmasters, and other occupants of remunerative offices were there playing partisan politics instead of demanding that faith be kept and justice done to their less fortunate and more needy comrades of the rank and file of the Grand Army of the Republic. These Republican officeholders and others of the same stripe who were yet "outside the breastworks" realized it would be "bad politics" and would "hurt Comrade McKinley in 1900" to have the encampment go on record as squarely denouncing the perfidy of the Administration in its relations with Union veterans.

By dint of hard work and many promises, President McKinley's political henchmen convinced the encampment that all grievances would be righted if a committee would call on the President and make known its complaints and wishes. The commander in chief designated the committee. It came to Washington; it saw the President; it returned whence it came, leaving Commissioner Evans's scalp still in its normal position and the situation absolutely unchanged. Then the commander in chief appointed a committee on pensions, with instructions to investigate pension conditions and to suggest remedies for existing causes of complaint and dissatisfaction. This committee basked in Administration circles for some weeks and made a report which, with its recommendations as to legislation, would do credit to any political "whitewash" committee that was ever selected, the net results of its labors being the enactment of a bill containing sundry amendments to the act of June 27, 1890, which was signed by the President on May 9, 1900, and is thus characterized by the American Tribune, of Indianapolis, Ind., in its issue of May 17, 1900:

CONGRESS CHANGING THE PENSION LAWS TO SUIT COMMISSIONER EVANS—THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC PENSION COMMITTEE'S BREACH OF TRUST.

After our article was in type last week, the House of Representatives changed the Senate bill (fraudulently called the Grand Army of the Republic bill) so that it represented all that Evans, through his Grand Army of the Republic pension committee, desired; and then passed the bill under suspension of the rules. It will now go back to the Senate to be rushed through and become a law. By it all of Evans's contentions and practices are approved by Congress, just as we warned the veterans was the object.

The veterans should immediately write their Congressmen—Senators and Representatives—to vote and work against the bill. Send them the American Tribune, with a protest against their course. Demand on your rights that Order 164, of Commissioner Raum's time, be restored for rating new-law invalid disabilities with the same rate as the same disability under the old law is rated. Demand that the proposed increase of widows' exemption of income shall explicitly state that "this income of $250 shall be held to relate only to income from property, and shall not include any part of her labor earnings or income from her labor or the labor of her children." This is the present holding of the Interior Department, and should apply to this new amendment;

but it is the trick to include her earnings. (See Davis, 9 P. D., pages 2, 3, and 4.)

We showed conclusively in our issue of May 10 (last week) that the invalid bill does not change the elements of the law; and that these two bills as now under way are not Grand Army of the Republic bills, but Evans bills; and are being passed under the false pretenses of benefiting pensions while in truth and fact they will cause the rejection of ten pensions to each claim which they will benefit.

Notwithstanding the last Grand Army of the Republic encampment was in the grip of the political bosses in President McKinley's Cabinet, which demanded a traitorous report from that discredited Grand Army of the Republic investigating committee, that encampment did get through and adopted one explicit resolution which required two specific changes in the pension laws, and only two changes. The present Grand Army of the Republic pension committee has wholly ignored and disobeyed each of those two requirements, has committed a breach of trust, turned tails, and gone into the enemy's camp. This is the first part of the resolution:

"Resolved, That this encampment respectfully represents to the President its earnest conviction that rule 225, now in practical effect in the adjudication of claims for pensions, under section 2 of this act of June 27, 1890, in the Pension Bureau, works grave injustice to the worthy ex-soldier and ex-sailor, and we express the hope that you will not find it inconsistent with your duties as an officer to abrogate this rule and reestablish the principle as defined in rule 164. Under the operation of rule 164, formulated and put into effect soon after the passage of this act, unquestionably responsive to public sentiment and based upon sound legal propositions—in a word, the simple expression of the letter and spirit of the law—400,000 names were added to the pension roll of the Republic, and to which no objection was heard for years after its promulgation."

The other point in the resolution required that the exemption of widows' net income from property be raised to $250, amount allowed by Commissioner Raum under President Harrison. Then followed an address to President McKinley, requesting him to order Evans to comply with the above. Then came the following:

"Resolved, That this committee is hereby authorized and directed, in the event that it is determined that relief may not be accorded by the administrative officers of the Government, to present to Congress a request for the amendment of the law in such form as to make certain the true intent of the statute, as we believe it can be constructed as herein presented."

Any Congressman would, on request, have introduced the above bills. But Commander in Chief Shaw and his Grand Army of the Republic committee did not ask it. They took two bills suggested to confirm and approve, against the veterans, Evans's present practice on rating, and to further narrow widows' exemption, and introduced them in the Senate, through Senator GALLINGER. This bill on rating veterans simply added to the word "disability," the plural "disabilities." The present law contains the stronger term "disability," and requires the whole inability to be rated. The whole includes and covers all its parts. The Pension Bureau cares no more for a pension law than a breachy animal cares for a rail fence. This charge against McKinley and Evans has been proved in the American Tribune time and time again, and it stands admitted the country over, and was admitted in the arguments in Congress on this bill. They pretended to be trying to tie the Commissioner down to the law, but they confirmed his Order 225 by passing this amendment without changing the law. That was the whole object, to approve Evans and down the Cincinnati resolutions.

Congressman GARDNER of Michigan said:

"This bill remedies the law as to widows' claims, but I fear that in so far as it is designed to aid in the construction of the law of 1890, by making its operation more liberal toward the veterans, it will be a failure. If you will amend it so that the disabilities shall be rated 'as of service origin,' you will have made the intent of Congress so plain that no Commissioner of Pensions nor board of medical referees can misconstrue it." [Applause.]

Congressman CALDERHEAD said:

"The truth about it is that if the law as it now exists was administered in the spirit in which it was made, was construed by the law department of the Pension Bureau in the spirit in which it was enacted, or was construed by the medical department of that Bureau in the spirit in which it was made, this bill would not be necessary. The truth about it is that if the same rules of evidence applied before that department that apply in any civil court in any civil suit or in any suit in equity, this bill would not be necessary."

It would have been a simple matter to have tried the votes of Congress on Order 164, but that was to be avoided by all means, or Evans would not have been confirmed. They are preparing to get hold of the machinery of next August encampment at Chicago. It is a necessity in a political year, as well as to confirm Evans. Evans is now howling through "editorials," written by him in the Pension Office and published in all the cuckoo and pension-hating newspapers, pretending to denounce the great increase of pension expenditures which these two bills will make. Congressmen are aiding him in his deception. The following was got off in the debate:

"Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

"Mr. DRIGGS. Certainly.

"Mr. MADDOX. I understand you to say that this will increase the appropriation about a million dollars?

"Mr. DRIGGS. I am taking my own estimate; I have nothing to go upon or to base my estimate upon. I am assuming that it will increase it a million dollars. It has been stated by one gentleman before our committee, who appeared before us on behalf of this bill, that it would not increase the pension expenditure one dollar."

There is a frank admission inadvertently made in debate. This amendment on rates will not increase pensions one dollar, because it makes no change in point of law. President McKinley may order Evans to increase just before the elections; but he has now the same law for it, and has had for over three years, or all the time.

Another very important point, and adverse point against veterans in this sham tinkering with the law, is that the amendment is not retroactive and contains no clause saving pending claims. It strikes every claim from the files, and compels claimants to lose all the past time and to file a new claim, which will begin from only the new filing. That is the express language of this section 2 as amended: "Such pension shall commence from the date of filing the application after the passage of this act." The amendment preserves only one of the old dates, and that is the date of widow's marriage, "Shall have married soldier after the passage of the act of June 27, 1890." There is no better settled principle of statutory construction. There can not be two sections 2 and two 3's unless the amendment provides that pending suits or claims shall be adjudicated under the law as it was, and for that purpose continues the law. (86 Tenn., 523; 85 Tenn., 495; 86 Ky., 170; 73 Iowa, 616; 20 Oreg., 394; 82 Ky., 256; 12 Mass., 537; 6 B. Monr. (Ky.), 146; 121 N. Y., 234.) This nonretroactive character of these amendments was admitted by Congressmen in debate. These speeches can not change the amendment from what it is written; but they show the admission, and also a false pretense in connection with it, to cover up what they too late saw was a dangerous admission.

"Mr. BURLESON. How many rejected claimants will this amendment affect?

"Mr. DRIGGS. These cases would not come under this act because they have been turned down. The gentleman will notice that in the wording of the act it says that it does not include pending cases. It is very clear about that. These cases rejected would not come in here.

"I want to say another thing, that under this act there is absolutely no chance whatever for any arrearages—that is, any extensive arrearages. There has been some complaint made in the daily press that a bill of this character would provide for the granting of arrearages. I will leave it to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] if it is not true that under this bill there will be no arrearages?

"Mr. GRAFF. Practically none.

"Mr. DRIGGS. Of course in pending cases I concede there may be some."

Now, the false pretense in the above lies in pretending that there might be a little increase in the pending claims. Why a little? There are 94,017 invalid claims pending under this section 2; some of them are many years old. If it carries a little increase to them, how does it carry a big increase to new claims? And how far back on pending claims does it take the increase? Who is to judge? Is Evans? Why not let him write the law in each claim to suit his notion? The admission, to its full extent, was correct. It not only cuts off increase on pending claims, but renders them null and void and leaves them without any law to support them. The clauses are the same in the original act as to pending claims under other laws; and it was held that such pending claimants must file a new claim to commence from date of filing, not from date of prior pending claim.

The real issue is well stated in an article which appeared in the National Tribune under date of October 12, 1899, entitled:

IT GOES MUCH DEEPER.

The fight against the maladministration of the Pension Bureau is not all, by any means, of the present struggle. The pension question is simply the most salient feature of the issue as to whether the veterans of the war of the rebellion are back numbers, to receive no further consideration as a factor in public life. If they can be treated with impunity as they are being treated with regard to pensions, if they can not properly resent the wholesale defamation and depreciation poured out on them by the Commissioner of Pensions, their personality has lost its power and their hands their cunning. They need not be considered any longer for public office or employment, and they can take themselves to their dusty shelves and be forgotten.

But inasmuch as there are something like 800,000 veterans alive, and most of them have sons and sons-in-law, we think that the politicians who are calculating that they have "at last got through with the old soldiers" are liable to awake to their mistake with a shock.

To conclude, attention is invited to the information and suggestions, expressed and implied, contained in an article in the National Tribune under date of November 16, 1899.

NOT TO BE SHELVED JUST YET.

We invite the earnest attention of aspiring politicians who are fondly cherishing the delusion that the "old soldier business is at last played out," to the following table of the number of probable survivors of the war of the rebellion, prepared for the years named by Gen. F. C. Ainsworth, the Chief of the Record and Pension Division of the War Department:

1901	965,313	1915	429,727
1902	930,380	1920	251,727
1903	894,585	1925	116,073
1904	858,002	1930	37,033
1905	820,687	1935	6,296

This is exclusive of all deserters and men dishonorably discharged, and is as nearly an accurate and official report of the number of surviving ex-soldiers as anything short of a formal census enumeration can be.

Therefore, next year, as far as anybody can tell, there will be nearly 1,000,000 veterans still alive. They not only control their own votes, but each one of them can strongly influence that of one or more sons and sons-in-law.

In brief, then, the veterans are still the strongest political element in the country, and if they stand together upon matters affecting their interests, they can control the elections of Representatives in Congress and even of President of the United States.

This is a matter for comrades to think over and discuss among themselves. Let them measure up quietly their own strength in each community, and do a little figuring on the basis of the returns of the recent elections as to how a solid soldier vote would have changed things. They can do this in a non-partisan way, for the younger politicians of all parties are alike anxious to shelve the veterans and get rid of their claims to office, employment, and pensions.

Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and veterans can not be blamed for resisting the efforts of greedy politicians to crowd them off the earth.

Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. THOMAS M. JETT,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 2, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10539) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890—

Mr. JETT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am going to support the pending bill, the title of which is "A bill to amend an act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am going to support this bill. I mean by that, I will support it provided I can not get anything better.

These amendments to the original anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, are perhaps a little more stringent than the original act itself. I would much prefer the amendments to this act of July 2, 1890, that have been offered by my friend Judge TERRY.

In my judgment, the House will make a great mistake if it refuses to accept the amendments that have been offered by the minority of the Judiciary Committee. If the majority party in this House are desirous of enacting legislation for the purpose of protecting the rights and interests of the people against the unlawful and illegal monopolies, then they should be willing to accept the pending amendments offered on the part of the minority of the Judiciary Committee by Judge TERRY.

From our experience and observation of what the trusts have done and are doing, it seems to me that it should be considered a great pleasure to each and every member of this House to have an opportunity to strike a blow at these deadly foes of human liberty and despoilers of the happiness of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, it is no longer a question in the minds of the people as to whether or not there are trusts and monopolies abroad in the land. There are many who can rise up and bear witness to the great evils they have done and oppression they have brought. Their presence is known and their direful effects have been severely felt and experienced during the last few years throughout the length and breadth of every State in this Union. They exist under different names and have different titles, but yet have a common purpose—the monopoly of manufacture, the monopoly of production, and the destruction of competition as well as the control of the cost to the consumer and user of articles of necessity and of common use.

Mr. Speaker, if I will be permitted, as I did not have an opportunity on yesterday to address myself to the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States ostensibly for the purpose to amend the Federal Constitution that more stringent legislation might be had by which the trusts could be regulated, I will for a brief time during this debate make some remarks concerning that joint resolution then under discussion.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that from the action of our Republican friends it seems to me, and I believe will be so understood by the American people, that they are only trifling with this question as well as with the people who are and have been suffering by the hands of the great monopolies. Now, in support of what I have said and to prove that I am correct, it is only necessary to refer to the action of our Republican brethren in relation to this matter. It will be remembered that the Committee on Rules, a committee of which the Speaker is one, and who usually controls those on the committee that are of his same political faith, never brought in a rule for the consideration of the joint resolution until after they had first brought in a resolution and passed it through this House to adjourn.

You gentlemen on that side are not acting in good faith about this matter, judging you from your actions. You first fix a day to adjourn and then bring in a rule to consider a constitutional amendment. I am sorry to see you trifling so with the proud and patriotic people of our country, who are hoping and praying for relief from the soulless corporations and monopolies. By first fixing the time for adjournment, before giving the people's representatives an opportunity to legislate upon this important question, you knew it could not pass both branches of Congress. You are playing into the hands of the trusts. These acts of yours indicate very strongly that you are the agents of the monopolies.

Mr. Speaker, if the majority party of this House were wanting to legislate in opposition to the trusts, why did you wait until you had fixed upon an hour of adjournment before you would take up the constitutional amendment for consideration? This act of our Republican friends is in keeping with what they have been doing for the trusts during the last three years.

Mr. Speaker, when the people are being robbed of the fruits of their toil, I rise above party interest and party prejudice to defend and protect their interests. I represent a constituency of honest and patriotic people. I protect their rights alike, Democrats and Republicans and Populists and all parties. I would not so far forget myself and become so narrow-minded and partisan as to want to legislate only for those that are of my political way of believing. I want relief against these great combinations, formed for private gain, for all my people, regardless of their political affiliations.

Now, further, Mr. Speaker, no one who is in favor of legislation to suppress the power of the trusts would dare think of supporting the joint resolution for an amendment to the Constitution that you brought in here yesterday. It appears that it was drawn with the view of making it so bad that no one who was anxious for anti-trust legislation would support it. By this resolution you propose that power should absolutely be taken away from the States to legislate in opposition to the trusts. No one who is anxious for legislation that the people may be relieved from this octopus would ever sanction any measure that would absolutely destroy the right and power of the State to legislate upon the subject of trusts and monopolies.

We all know that what enforcement of anti-trust laws has been had was under State legislation. There are one or two States in the Union that have enacted drastic laws upon this subject to such an extent that they have been able to largely control the action of the trusts, and one of these States is the great State of Texas, whose anti-trust law was held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Why, then, do you seek to authorize a constitutional amendment that will take away from the State the right to legislate in opposition to trusts? This is in effect what your constitutional amendment amounts to. Again, Mr. Speaker, has the Attorney-General of the United States undertaken to use the power that is given in the act of June 2, 1890, to suppress these great evils? The answer comes from every source in the negative. If the Attorney-General had taken hold of this matter when he should, in my humble judgment, the people would not be bearing the burdens that have become more burdensome daily.

Who has tried to enforce the law during the present Administration in opposition to these trusts? Whose duty is it to see that the Federal laws are administered? It is the duty of the Attorney-General, under and by the direction of the Chief Executive of the United States, to see that the laws are duly administered and enforced. And I ask the gentlemen on the floor of this House to name any one instance in which the Attorney-General of the United States has filed a complaint in opposition to the trusts and with a view of suppressing them.

Nay, gentlemen, you may search the records of all of the courts of the entire country, and in no one case will you find that upon the docket. This is the reputation of the Republican party in relation to trusts. This is where the party stands that have brought in a resolution for a constitutional amendment that is so vicious in its provisions that anyone who desires to relieve the people of their burdens could not support.

Nor is this all, Mr. Speaker. We find that the Committee on Rules have brought in a rule, and it has been adopted by the majority party of this House, in which it is provided that there shall be no amendments to this joint resolution. You gentlemen who are responsible for this resolution being before this House bring in a rule with it for its protection in this, that you refuse to permit any amendment even being offered to it. It seems that you gentlemen on that side of the House are determined to stand up for the trusts. Your determination is so strong that when you bring in a resolution for a constitutional amendment you bring in also a rule to prohibit the offering of any amendments. Do you think you are going to fool anybody? Do you think that the people of this country can be hoodwinked in such a manner as you are attempting at this time? You must have very little confidence in the ability of the people to discern right from wrong.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the American people know what it means to have stalking abroad in this land such enemies to them. I can say, answering for my people, that they are in opposition to such false and vicious legislation that is being attempted here. I can say for the people whom I have the honor of representing upon this floor that they are not only with me in opposition to such a vicious matter, that is calculated to protect the trusts and illegal combinations, as this resolution for amendment to the Federal Constitution, but that they will stand by me in my fight for legislation that will curb the power of all these unlawful combinations that are sapping the very substance from the life of our people.

Mr. JOHNSTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JETT. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is there any probability of the bill under consideration, in your judgment, passing both Houses of Congress?

Mr. JETT. No; it is not intended by our Republican brethren that this bill now under consideration shall become a law. If it had been intended to have any effective anti-trust legislation, the leaders of the Republican party would not have waited until the hour of adjournment had been fixed before they would have brought in a rule to consider this measure.

Mr. LITTLE. If the Republican party had desired the passage of anti-trust legislation, would it not have been considered earlier in the session?

Mr. JETT. Certainly; the time for consideration is put off until they fix a time to adjourn, showing there can be no legislation in opposition to trusts.

Mr. Speaker, I have said all I desire to say concerning the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I now desire to refer again to the present bill under consideration for a few moments. What has been the history of the trusts with reference to the rapidity of their organization within the last three years? Never in the history of any country has there been an annual production of legalized monopolies equal to the last year's crop—that is, for the year 1899. It is charged, and reliably so, that 2,000 corporations were chartered and authorized to issue capital stock to the amount of three and one-half billions. This will be substantiated by an examination of the records of the department of state of New Jersey.

As I am informed by reliable sources, 200 of these corporations are each capitalized at two millions and upward. One hundred of the charters granted for the year were given to absolute trusts. Fifteen thousand trusts, combinations, and other corporations in every section of America are being operated under the liberal laws for the organization of such concerns, of New Jersey. Upward of 200 of these are, in the language of the New York Journal, "simon-pure trusts, organized for the purpose of controlling absolutely various products and enterprises." Of course there have been incorporated under the laws of New Jersey several other concerns of which I will not here speak.

Mr. Speaker, the following list shows the concerns having an authorized capital of $2,000,000 or more, each chartered during the fiscal year from November, 1898, to November, 1899, and a large percentage of which number are entitled to be placed in the category of trusts:

Mr. Speaker, from an examination of the above all will necessarily be compelled to admit that there exists within the United States a great many combines formed for the purpose of private gain and which are exceedingly dangerous to the well-being of the people and of the free institutions of the United States. It will further be admitted that when these unlawful combinations are permitted to carry out their purposes, as they have been doing recently, they become oppressive and interfere with labor and legitimate enterprises. Here are some of the effects experienced by the people of these illegal combinations.

I desire to show to the members of this House the increase of many articles, which increase has been brought about by the influences of the trusts. We find since the trusts have been in operation, within the last three years, that builders' hardware has increased from 45 to 70 per cent; iron beds, from 35 to 65 per cent; brass castings, 33⅓ per cent; barbed wire, 88 per cent, and in this connection I desire to say that the farmers of this country who use barbed wire for fencing are compelled to pay 88 per cent more than foreigners are compelled to pay for the same class of wire.

This is a direct result experienced by our people daily of the trusts. Brooms have increased within the last six months from 40 to 50 cents a dozen; rubber belting has increased within the last year 33⅓ per cent; brass wire, from 75 to 85 per cent; carpets, 16 to 20 per cent; flannels, 10 per cent; glassware, 40 per cent; window glass, 50 per cent; hardware, 45 per cent; wrought iron, 100 per cent; iron for horseshoes, 40 per cent; cotton linings, 12 to 15 per cent; oil, 20 to 80 per cent; lumber, other than oak, 25 per cent; oak lumber, 33⅓ per cent; nails, 115 per cent; water buckets, 50 per cent; steel for horseshoes, 100 per cent; tin plates, 75 per cent; tinware, from 20 to 500 per cent; wooden tubs, 50 per cent; t n, 95 to 100 per cent; wall paper, 50 to 80 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, these are a few of the numerous articles that have been increased in cost to the consumers and users of such articles, brought about by the formation of monopolies. Every man engaged in the tilling of the soil, or in one of the various pursuits in life, when he goes to purchase these things he feels directly the effects of these unlawful institutions. These illustrations come home to our people daily, and when they understand the situation, as I believe they will, they will loudly condemn these illegal concerns.

It has, Mr. Speaker, come to this, that the farmer and the laborer have got to strike a blow in their own necessary self-defense unless the cost price on the various articles which they are necessarily compelled to have will become so burdensome that they can not afford the necessaries and conveniences of life. It is these people whom I have in mind and for whom I desire redress. It is these people that I am more directly representing upon this floor, and I hope to secure that character of legislation that will be for the benefit of them, so that they will be better enabled to provide for themselves and for those that depend upon them.

Mr. Speaker, every time an article is purchased by one of our people, especially those things that are more generally used and which we are all compelled to have, the effect of these illegal organizations is felt, and this, in my judgment, is an argument against the policy of the present Administration for its failure to even undertake the enforcement of what is known as the "Sherman anti-trust law." I know it is claimed by some that this is prosperity, but this character of prosperity that builds up and amasses great fortunes at the expense and to the detriment of what the lamented Lincoln called the common people is unjust and I say outrageous.

And along this line, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the amendment that has been offered and is now pending, which provides that nothing in this act can be construed so as to apply to trades unions and other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, etc., should meet with the approval of this House, and the failure of our Republican friends to provide the proper safeguards for these organizations is in keeping with their past history in dealing with these industrial questions. It may be insisted, of course, that no one would think of saying that this act would be held to include them; but, judging the future by the past, it would be exceedingly unsafe for the interests of the farmer and the laborer to have this bill adopted without this provision.

My distinguished friend Judge TERRY has requested me to investigate the RECORD during the consideration of the Sherman Act and to see what was said by the then advocates of that bill. I will say for the information of the House that I found that when the Sherman Act was up for consideration that Senator George, of Mississippi, and Senator TELLER, of Colorado, raised the question that the provisions of that bill would affect the Farmers' Alliance, Knights of Labor, and kindred organizations organized for the purpose of raising the price of products and increasing the wages for labor.

It was claimed by Senator Sherman that no one would think of making the provisions of that bill apply to these organizations. He said that the bill did not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to affect public opinion to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation, but we all know that the "Sherman law," notwithstanding what the Senator had said, was invoked for the very purpose that Senator Sherman had disclaimed that it would be. In this act similar provisions are found on this point as in the act of 1890.

This is the reason why this side of the House are in favor of the amendment in question. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish I could speak with that confidence that I could if I knew it was the intention of the party in power to adopt this legislation before the adjournment of Congress. There is too much vagueness surrounding this entire matter. I am afraid that this bill will not be passed through the Senate and receive the sanction of the President at this session. My desire for the relief of my people, whom I know are bearing these burdens, is such that I feel that legislation of this character should not be attempted or be had for political purposes, but that it should be considered as a serious matter, which it is, and be enacted without division.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments may be adopted and this bill passed.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to append a letter sent by the Anti-Trust League, reading as follows; also editorial in Verdict of August 7, 1899, and constitution of Anti-Trust League:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 2, 1900.

Hon. T. M. JETT,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In view of the discussion of proposed anti-trust legislation now going on in the House, I beg leave to suggest to you three or four points that should be included in any legislation enacted upon this subject, as follows:

First. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to offer a reward of not less than $10,000 or more than $200,000 to any person or persons who shall furnish evidence that will lead to the arrest or conviction of any person or persons guilty of a violation of the Federal anti-trust law or of the interstate-commerce law, and whatever moneys are required for the execution of these statutes are hereby appropriated from any funds available in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Second. That any individual or combination of individuals, corporation or combination of corporations who shall be engaged in an effort to establish or who shall have established a partial or complete monopoly in the control of any line of business or industry in the United States shall be and are hereby prohibited the use of the United States mail.

Third. That any person or combination of persons, corporation or combination of corporations who shall engage in destructive competition, upon conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine of not less than $10,000 for each offense and imprisonment of not less than one year. The words "in destructive competition" in this act shall be construed to mean the offering for sale of any articles or article of commerce at a price below the cost of production or manufacture for the purpose of destroying competition and establishing a monopoly.

Fourth. Inasmuch as equality of rates in transportation charges of all shippers is an absolute necessity for the securing of freedom of trade and commerce among the people of the United States and various States, and as the private monopoly of the public highways, such as railways, telephones, telegraphs, and pipe lines, inevitably lead to criminal discrimination in favor of those individuals or corporations which control great wealth, and against the interests of the masses of the people, therefore immediate steps shall be taken by the Government of the United States to secure the Government ownership and operation of all railways, telegraphs, telephones, and pipe lines.

Fifth. Upon the complaint of any citizen or citizens the Attorney-General of the United States and all district attorneys of the United States are hereby directed to institute proceedings against any person or combination of persons, corporation or combination of corporations, who are charged with a violation of the Federal statutes against the organization or operation of trusts.

H. B. MARTIN,
National Secretary, American Anti-Trust League.

THE BANK TRUST—THE NEWEST AND GREATEST—TO OVERLORD ALL OTHER TRUSTS.

[Alfred Henry Lewis's editorial in the Verdict, August 7, 1899.]

Here be true news. This is a grave story. It is one of even, near concern to small and great. Let it come unshod of simile, unbusked of imagery or rhetoric, unclouded of any mists of metaphor. In Wall street as this is read the giant trust of all is forming. It is to collect within itself the banks of New York City. Its core is to be Standard Oil. Its moving spirits are John Rockefeller and Pierpont Morgan.

With them in full and close association are the Rothschilds and their American agents. It was to link the Rothschilds to the scheme that of late took Morgan Europeward and brought him back again. This trust, at its consummation, which is close, will pull the reins of guidance and crack the whip of domination over $2,000,000,000. It will, as stated, be a muster of the New York City banks. They are to be made into one force—unified and brought under one word and one command. Thereafter they are to say "No" together or "Yes" together, or together stand motionless and mute. This trust of the banks is to be the dictator trust; to overlord all other trusts. The greatest among these latter will be dwarfed as they stand beside it. We, the people, are to become the subjects of bank conquest and suffer the feudalism of money. This bank trust is to be our William of Normandy. New York City is to be its Hastings without a blow. It will have, as it were, a Doomsday book, and the country is to be parceled among its followers.

This is a true tale. There is neither guess nor fancy in its telling. Naught but the bald facts are set forth. This trust expects to hold the nation in the hollow of its hand. Their plan is to be the grand bank of the United States; issue at the last its money and have custody of its credit. In a cruder day Jackson defeated a parallel conspiracy; crushed beneath his stern heel the head of a similar serpent.

With this difference: That was a python of seven and one-half millions, a baby and plaything to the one in hand. Now are we to confront a serpent of two billions, or one two hundred and fifty times as large. At a time, too, when the Jacksons seem gone from our midst. For a century and a quarter there has been liberty in this land. For a century and a quarter Europe, pointing to America, whether in hate or love, was driven to say with Job: "There the wicked cease from troubling; there the weary be at rest! There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor! The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master!"

Once this trust of the banks, and Europe will say this no more. There will none to give tongue to it. The fact of freedom will have departed, the song would be a lie. In that day of gilded, narrow fetters, the spirit of true Americanism will be crippled, bent, and broken. A sightless Samson, it will grind in the mills of the Philistines. It will long for destruction, and dig for death as for treasures that lie hid.

Standard Oil is to be the heart of this bank trust. There is one known thing of Standard Oil. Its minimum profits are at least forty millions yearly. How much more they be is the jealous secret of Standard Oil, and none may pierce it. As stated, as captain constructors of this bank trust are Rockefeller, Morgan, and the Rothschilds. They will go to New Jersey for organization. That State has grown the Morocco of America. Its statutes are the merest shipyards to build and launch and outfit these trust pirates of commerce. New Jersey, to be consistent, should adopt the black flag as its banner. It should float the Jolly Roger, with skull and crossbones, from the dome staff of its capitol. Once this trust of the banks is afloat, it will have beneath its pennant every bank in New York. They must join or be destroyed. The old killing Standard Oil method will suffice for this. Then it will extend itself. Every bank in the country will become its gillie. There will be no limit to its sway. Its powers will find their last extension in the frontiers of the possible. It will loose and unloose credit. It will fix the price of money and censor the markets to the last item of value. It will pick up the national debt and hold the country between its thumb and finger. It will demand bonds and get them, or it will force payment for them. It will stand at the spigot of loans. It will flow money on or off at its selfish interest or caprice. All other businesses will sit like beggars at its gates. It will be the Dives of trade, and commerce will become its Lazarus. If it likes you, you may have money; if it hates you, your ruin is within its reach.

In short, controlling, as it will, the tides of credit in their ebb or flow, this bank trust will rule the mart. An autocrat, it will respond to nothing but itself. There will be none greater, none stronger. Congresses will exist by its consent and Presidents wait, hat in hand, for its orders. It will have power of life and death in business; to lift up or strike down, to plant or uproot. Between the upper and nether millstones of its operations all men are to be ground, and all will be grist to its hopper. Elections will be at its mercy. It will produce in office its own paid, sworn follower. It will draw within the train of its control every element of government. You may change your White House every four years, your Congress every two; yet once this trust of the banks be rooted you will never change your ruler. You will bow eternally before this never-dying, changeless dynasty of money.

Indian Appropriation Bill—Conference Report.

HON. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 24, 1900.

The House having under consideration the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] has submitted to the House a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, W. A. Jones. It is addressed to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and is dated "Washington, March 14, 1900." The letter has the caption in the following words:

Memorandum with reference to the speech of Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD, of New York, as it appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1900.

I have examined this letter, Mr. Speaker, with much care and with greater indignation. Such a paper emanating from another source would not, perhaps, require other comment than an expression of contempt for its author. Coming from an official of this Government—the head of the Indian Bureau—I can not permit its statements to go unchallenged, nor its author to escape just rebuke.

This letter is one of the most remarkable documents that, in my opinion, has ever been issued by a public official in this country. It is teeming with misstatements. Evidently it is intended to mislead. Did the Commissioner merely distort the remarks submitted by me when this bill was under consideration in this House I might easily be content to permit just and fair-minded men to judge and to properly characterize his action by the record as it would then be. But this Commissioner has not merely done that. In an apparent delirium of recklessness for truth and decency, he has done much more. The speech to which his letter refers was an honest and unbiased discussion of the Government's ability to accommodate during the coming fiscal year the pupils in the contract schools. It may have appealed to him as neither sound nor conclusive; but it was addressed to the reasons and not to the passions of men. Unable to make an effective answer to it, however, the Commissioner, in a vain effort to justify his position, has attempted to place in hostile array men of different religions, which, if successful, would have aroused the most bitter, most dangerous, and the most destructive passions of men. This letter is a covert, contemptible, and despicable attack and slur upon the missionary work so long done by the people of a particular faith. It is a scandalous, although indirect, reflection on the Catholic missions of this country, unjustifiable, unworthy, and constituting a disgraceful abuse of official power. Not daring to reflect directly upon these missions, this Commissioner, in what apparently seemed a safe and diplomatic manner, has given expression to his bitterness against them.

When an official occupying a responsible position in this Government so abuses his official power as to do manifest injustice to the memories of men whose fame is entwined with the glory of this country and to grossly insult 12,000,000 of its most devoted citizens, as this Commissioner has done, it is not only proper, but every consideration of decency and justice demands that his slanderous charges be refuted and that he be confounded with the proof that his statements are both inaccurate and unjust.

The Commissioner opens his statement in these words:

Mr. FITZGERALD introduced an amendment to reestablish the contract-school system.

This statement is absolutely false. The Commissioner knew it to be false when he made it. Stated in similar words by another unfamiliar with the facts it might be taken as a careless or inaccurate use of language. Contrasted with other statements made by the Commissioner in this letter, it only permits the conclusion that it is made for the purpose of deceiving those unfamiliar with the system and the legislation affecting it during the past few years.

Since its inception, the contract school system has never been abolished. It is in existence to-day. It will cease, it is true, with the termination of the present fiscal year; but that does not justify the language of the commissioner, which was evidently deliberately used to convey an erroneous impression.

When the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration in this House I submitted an amendment, the text of which follows:

After the word "Alaska," in line 14, page 45, insert the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, but shall only make such contracts at places where the Government has not provided school facilities for all the children of school age residing thereat, and to an extent not exceeding the number of children in attendance at such contract schools at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900."

This amendment did not in any sense reestablish the contract-school system. It merely continued, or proposed to continue, a practice of Congress to provide for children in contract schools until the Government would have adequate facilities of its own. The only issue raised by this amendment was, Has the Government ample school accommodation for the pupils in the contract schools?

The policy of discontinuing contract school appropriations originated, officially, in the following provision of the Indian appropriation act, approved August 15, 1894, and making provision for the fiscal year 1895. The act provided:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to inquire into and investigate the propriety of discontinuing contract schools, and whether, in his judgment, the same can be done without detriment to the education of Indian children; and that he submit to Congress at its next session the result of such investigation, including an estimate of the cost, if any, of substituting Government schools for contract schools, together with such recommendations as to him may seem proper.

As I have heretofore shown in discussing this question, the Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report for 1894, evidently with this action of Congress in mind, said:

The contract schools are now the subject of general discussion. I agree fully with those who oppose the use of public money for the support of sectarian schools. But this question should be considered practically. The schools have grown up. Money has been invested in their construction at a time when they were recognized as wise instrumentalities for the accomplishment of good. I do not think it proper to allow the intense feeling of opposition to sectarian education, which is showing itself all over the land, to induce the Department to disregard existing conditions. We need the schools now, or else we need a large appropriation to build schools to take their place.

It would be scarcely just to abolish them entirely; to abandon instantly a policy so long established. My own suggestion is that they should be decreased at the rate of not less than 20 per cent a year. Thus, in a few years more they would cease to exist, and during that time the Bureau (of Indian Affairs) would gradually be prepared to do without them, while they might gather strength to continue without Government aid.

The Secretary's theory at that time was to reduce the contract school allowances at the rate of 20 per cent a year; but upon further investigation he apparently concluded that it was neither feasible nor practicable to make the large annual reduction at first contemplated, for in a report to Congress, dated December 13, 1894, he said:

It is possible that the plan of annual reduction can not be carried out to the full extent proposed, namely, 20 per cent each year. But in any event within a few years, unless unforeseen obstacles arise, the substitution of Government for contract schools should take place.

In the third session of the Fifty-third Congress the House of Representatives endeavored to carry out the Secretary's first proposition by placing the following provision in the Indian appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1896:

The Secretary of the Interior may make contracts for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, to an extent not exceeding 80 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895, and each succeeding year he shall proportionately so reduce the amount thus used that at the end of five years from the date on which this act goes into effect all contracts for such education shall cease.

Had this provision been enacted into law, it would have established a policy requiring annual reductions of 20 per cent and the abolition of the contract school system on the 30th of June 1900; but this did not become the law. The Senate substituted the following provision:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make contracts, but only with present contract schools, for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, to an extent not exceeding 80 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895, and the Government shall, as early as practicable, make provision for the education of Indian children in Government schools.

This provision was finally accepted by the House and enacted as a part of the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1896.

It is apparent that originally neither Congress nor the Department definitely decided to limit the continuance of the contract school system, after having decided to abolish it, to five years, nor contemplated an absolute annual reduction of 20 per cent of the appropriation. It was determined, however, that the Government should place in Government schools, at as early a day as practicable, the Indian pupils then in contract schools; and until this was possible it was intended that necessary contracts should be continued. In other words, it was contemplated that hand in hand with the reduction in the number of pupils in contract schools there should be provided accommodations in Government schools for the pupils dismissed from the contract schools. That the Secretary of the Interior had this in view is clearly shown by his statement in the extract above quoted, that during the time that would elapse before the contract schools went out of existence, "the Bureau of Indian Affairs would gradually be prepared to do without them;" and by his further declaration in the same extract: "We need a large appropriation to build schools to take their place." It is still further shown by the following extract from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, dated November 19, 1894:

By gradually reducing the contracts year by year and placing the pupils in Government schools, or better still, in public schools, the contract schools can be entirely done away with in the course of five or six years, and this without doing any great injury to the parties who have their money invested in contract schools, and at the same time provide adequate facilities for the Indian pupils.

That this was also the intention of Congress is evident from the concluding clause of the provision above quoted.

It is true that ever since 1895 Congress has made a reduction of the contract school appropriations, and that in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1900 it declared that the appropriation therein made for contract schools should be "the final appropriation for sectarian schools." These annual reductions and this declaration, however, were made upon the theory and in the belief that the Indian Department, from year to year, had made provision in the Government schools for the contract pupils for whom appropriations were discontinued, and that at the end of the current fiscal year the Department would be able to care for all the pupils then in contract schools. This belief was based upon the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, made every year for the past three years, that he could provide facilities for all the contract school pupils.

Early in the session, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, my attention was called to this question. After a thorough and careful study of it I became, and I am still, convinced that Congress has been misinformed, and has acted upon statements misleading in character and now, in my opinion, evidently prepared and made for the purpose of misleading, and of influencing the action of Congress. Despite the assertions of the commissioner to the contrary, it is a fact easy of demonstration, that at no time since 1895 has the Indian Bureau been able to provide accommodations in the Government schools for the contract school pupils. In 1895 there were 3,500 pupils in such schools, and at no time since then have there been less than 2,000.

The following figures, taken from the annual reports of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, show the capacity and enrollment of the Government schools for each year since 1895:

Capacity	16,950	17,806	18,610	19,874	20,126
Enrollment	16,584	17,789	18,603	19,899	20,712
Difference	366	17	7	25	586

While these figures disclose that the capacity slightly exceeded the enrollment in the years 1895, 1896, and 1897, yet for 1898 and 1899, respectively, the enrollment was 25 and 586 in excess of the capacity.

From an examination of these figures, compiled by the Commissioner himself, it seemed clear to me that more pupils were enrolled in the Government schools during 1899 than the capacity justified. No provision having been made in the bill making appropriations for the coming fiscal year to provide in any way for the pupils carried by contract, the amendment heretofore set forth was offered by me so that some provision might be made for them during the coming year.

The Commissioner in his letter does not deny the accuracy of his own figures, but by an elaborate table he attempts to demonstrate that the Government has accommodations for the contract pupils. He urges that because the Government schools have had an increase in attendance of 7,900 pupils since 1893 that there need be no fear of the Bureau's ability to accommodate all the children in the contract schools. Of course the attendance in the Government schools increased materially since 1893. It would have been most remarkable if it had not. A glance at this table, in which are given the amounts expended for school buildings in the Indian Department from 1893 to 1899, as shown by the annual statements of receipts and expenditures issued by the Treasury Department, will disclose sufficient reason for a large increase in attendance in the Government schools.

1895	85,985
1896	35,716
1897	120,355
1898	198,941
Total	1,188,808

In the Indian appropriation act for fiscal year 1900 the general appropriation for construction, purchase, repair, etc., of Indian school buildings amounted to $300,000; the specific appropriations to $299,050; total, $599,050.

With this information it is not so very extraordinary that since 1893 there has been an increase in attendance at these schools of 7,900 pupils.

Neither is it strange that in the corresponding period, as the Commissioner points out in his letter, the contract schools lost in attendance 2,898 and in enrollment 3,683 pupils. Rather, the highest encomium that can be paid to those conducting these schools is to point out that the decrease in both attendance and in enrollment has been so small. The $533,241 set aside for contract schools in 1893 had dwindled in 1900 to $59,822.25 (eliminating Hampton and Lincoln as not coming within the description of contract schools), yet the attendance and enrollment, despite the loss of nearly 90 per cent of the appropriation, decreased only about 50 per cent.

But, after all, these questions of increase and decrease in attendance in Government and contract schools since 1893 are not material to the question raised by the amendment, namely, Could the children in contract schools in 1900 be accommodated in the Government schools in 1901 if no appropriation were made for the contract schools?

It is conceded by the Commissioner, as indeed it must be, since his own report proves it, that the number of pupils enrolled in the Government schools during 1899 is in excess of the accommodations. He contends, however, that since all the pupils do not continually attend the schools, and that the reports show that the average attendance is much less than the average enrollment, it is perfectly proper to continue to enroll much beyond the accommodations at hand. Should the 2,000 pupils now in the contract schools be enrolled in the Government schools, or if only the 534 contract pupils were enrolled therein, the loss in attendance, which is now the hope of his office, would immediately become its necessity. If all the pupils enrolled to-day in the Government schools were to apply for admission, it would be denied to some of them. How, then, could the Commissioner find accommodation for 2,000 additional pupils? The assertion that the Indian Office can provide for these children is an idle boast; the public official that makes it deserves pity rather than contempt.

There is still more conclusive proof than that already adduced that the Indian Bureau can not only not provide in the Government schools for the pupils in contract schools, but that it is impossible to place in any schools large numbers of Indian children of school age.

In the Indian appropriation act, just agreed upon in conference, the general appropriation for construction, purchase, repairs, etc., of Indian school buildings amounts to $240,000; specific appropriations for construction, repairs, and improvements, $349,927; total, $589,927.

The Commissioner does not contend that with this appropriation sufficient additional sittings can be provided in the time at the disposal of the Bureau, or, in fact, in any time, for the 534 pupils under contract, much less for the 2,000 pupils in the contract schools. Since 1895 the Government school accommodations, with the expenditures already set forth, have been increased as shown in the statement that follows:

Total capacity for—
1895	16,780
Increase 1895 over 1894	661, or 4	per cent.
Total capacity for—
1896	17,866
1895	16,780
Increase 1896 over 1895	1,086, or 6	per cent.
Total capacity for—
1897	18,610
1896	17,866
Increase 1897 over 1896	744, or 4	per cent.
Total capacity for—
1898	19,874
1897	18,610
Increase 1898 over 1897	1,264, or 6	per cent.
Total capacity for—
1899	20,126
Increase 1899 over 1898	252, or 1¼	per cent.

The rate of increase of 1899 over 1898 is 1¼ per cent; while to place the 2,060 pupils in contract schools in Government schools would require an increase for 1901 in the Government facilities of 13 per cent over the facilities of 1899. No such increase has been contemplated during the past year; provision for such increase was not made either during the year just closing, nor will it be made in the year to come.

The Indian school population can not be stated with accuracy. A number of reports of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs prior to 1896 estimate the school population from 34,000 to 39,000. The report of the Indian school superintendent for 1896 places the school population at 38,981. No statement or estimate of this population is given in any report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs since 1896. The Bureau of Indian Affairs estimates it at about one-fifth of the total Indian population. According to the report of the Commissioner for 1899, exclusive of the Five Civilized Tribes and the Indians in Alaska, the Indian population is placed at 187,319. Adopting the practice of the Indian Bureau it is safe to place the school population to-day at 37,484.

The Commissioner concedes, indeed, his report for 1899 shows, that as stated by me in the speech referred to in his letter, the capacity of the Government schools is 20,126. In the contract schools there are 2,060 Indian children. With ample allowance for the number of pupils in other schools of every character—not exceeding at a very liberal estimate 2,000—about 13,000 children of school age are unprovided for in any way whatever.

Such deductions are not confined to me alone. They are not merely matters of opinion. They are facts gathered from official reports. Anyone who will take the trouble to investigate the subject quickly arrives at the same conclusions. It is apparent to the most superficial observer, excepting the blind in the Indian Bureau, that the Government can not accommodate at present all the children of school age. The well-known editor of the Forest and Stream, Mr. George Bird Grinnell, in a work entitled The Indian of To-day, published this very year, speaking of the contract-school system, says that—> * * * it is to be regretted that Congress has reduced the number of children to be paid for at a time when there are so many requiring education for whom the Government provides no accommodation.

This is the opinion of one with no personal interest. It is the belief of everyone who has in an impartial manner given any attention whatever to the question.

An even more insuperable barrier intervenes, however, to prevent the Commissioner accommodating in Government schools the pupils now in contract schools. No reference is made to this difficulty in the Commissioner's letter. Its perusal might suggest the suspicion that the Commissioner is unaware of this difficulty. The Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1896 contains the following provision:

> That hereafter no Indian child shall be sent from any Indian reservation to a school beyond the State or Territory in which said reservation is situated without the voluntary consent of the father or mother of such child, if either of them are living, and if neither of them are living, without the voluntary consent of the next of kin of such child. Such consent shall be made before the agent of the reservation, and he shall send to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs his certificate that such consent has been voluntarily given before such child shall be removed from such reservation. And it shall be unlawful for any Indian agent or other employee of the Government to induce, or seek to induce, by withholding rations, or by other improper means, the parents or next of kin of any Indian to consent to the removal of any Indian child beyond the limits of any reservation. (Act approved March 2, 1895. Public—No. 121.)

With that provision of law in mind it may be possible for the Commissioner to point out in which of the Government schools, located in the same State or Territory, the pupils in the contract schools, as shown in the following statement, can be placed:

With much care the Commissioner has set forth the several amounts received by the schools under the control of the Catholic Church and contrasted the total with the aggregate amount received by the combined Protestant schools. It is difficult to understand the relevancy of this contrast to the issue raised; but it does not require much shrewdness to divine the purpose of the Commissioner. It was intended to convey the impression that in some way Catholic schools had improperly obtained an advantage over the schools controlled by the Protestant denominations. The amount received by any particular class of schools can have nothing to do with the ability of the Government to accommodate the contract pupils. It has no place in this discussion at all. It was brought in to ally with the Commissioner certain well-known and bigoted persons, who are unable to consider the question at issue or kindred questions in an impartial manner.

But the Catholic Church needs offer no apology for accepting aid from the Government in the work of Indian education. The solicitation was on the part of the Government. It was the Government, not the church, that proposed such a practice. While some men have been found too narrow to pay just tribute to this work, none have ever had the temerity to disparage it.

The Commissioner states that "from 1889 to 1899, inclusive, the Catholics have drawn for contract schools $3,493,409." It apparently has never occurred to the Commissioner that this has resulted from a monetary standpoint alone in great saving to the Government. The Catholic contract schools educate and care for pupils for one-third less than the Government schools. To be a little more explicit and accurate, the per capita allowance for pupils in contract schools is $108 per annum; the average per capita cost of educating Indian children in Government schools, as estimated by the Indian Bureau, is $142 per annum. The Government schools are eight twenty-sevenths more expensive than the contract schools. The expenditure of the $3,493,409 for pupils in the contract schools conducted by Catholics has effected a saving to the Government of $1,035,084.

This, however, is not all. Since 1896 these schools have carried many more children than the Government paid for under the contracts. These additional children cost the Government nothing.

The number of pupils carried at no expense to the Government during that period are shown in this statement.

Fiscal year.	Contract number.	Average attendance.	Excess attendance.
1898	1,672	2,272	600
1899	1,078	1,993	915
1900	931	*2,000	1,469

*Estimated, but fully within the number.

Had these children been in Government schools the cost of their board and tuition would have aggregated $548,940. This amount, with the $1,035,084 already shown to have been saved, amounts to $1,554,024, which represents part of the saving to the Government in the education of the Indians that has resulted from its arrangement with Catholic contract schools.

Besides this sum, it must be remembered that large expenditures would have been required for the erection of necessary school buildings, which easily would have amounted to $750,000, while the usual repairs and improvements necessary from time to time would have compelled considerable expenditures.

It is rather to be regretted that the Commissioner did not give just a little of this information when stating the amount that had been received by Catholic schools and contrasting it with the totals received by all other schools, so that men might have judged whether the Government had been improvident in its contracts with these schools.

In his letter the Commissioner says:

In the criticisms and debate on this question no account is taken of the fact that religious bodies do and can take care of Indian pupils. There are a number of mission schools throughout the Indian country maintained and operated by various religious bodies and churches, who furnish teachers, food, clothing, etc., to the pupils attending.

At times I have thought that the Commissioner never read the speech which he attempts to review and answer. If he has, is it not more than passing strange that he should so quickly forget the following language contained therein:

The value of these schools is not at issue. It has never been questioned. In the report of the board of Indian commissioners for 1898 this commendation is found at page 7:

"The contract and mission schools are continued by the various church missionary societies, though with a slight reduction of attendance, since the most of them no longer receive Government aid. We trust that this work may go on and increase, for, as we have often said, our deep and abiding conviction is that what the Indian needs above all things is moral and Christian training."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report for 1899, made no comment on contract schools. Unable to speak in derogation, he refuses the tribute of just praise. Upon the question of mission schools, however, which differ from contract schools only in that no pupils are in the former under Government contract, he says:

"The labors which they do in an educational way are of inestimable value for civilizing these people, and while the heavy burden must, as it should, rest upon the shoulders of the Government, yet these little institutions of learning, with their faithful Christain workers, are important adjuncts."

It would be too unkind to make further comment upon this statement of the Commissioner.

The Commissioner says further:

In 1893, prior to the inauguration by Congress of reducing contract schools, these "mission schools" reported an attendance of 75 pupils, and in 1894, 152 pupils. For the year 1895, when the first reduction was made, 754 pupils were reported; 755 in 1896; 813 in 1897; 1,112 in 1898; and 1,261 in 1899. An analysis of the average attendance at the mission schools shows that the Catholic schools had an attendance of 259, the Protestant schools 855. It seems evident from this that the great Protestant organizations in refusing aid of the Government for their schools have maintained them in the true missionary spirit out of their own funds.

A more palpable attempt to deceive this House has seldom been attempted. A more unjustifiable and outrageous effort to bring into reproach, in an underhand manner, the Catholic missions among the Indians of this country has never been made. As I stated in the speech to which the Commissioner's letter refers, "mission schools" differ from contract schools only in that no pupils are in the former under Government contract." As the Commissioner well knows, pupils in contract schools without contract provision are "mission" pupils. Why, then, in the "analysis" that he made were the 1,469 "mission" pupils in Catholic contract schools eliminated? These 1,469 "mission" pupils, with the 259 that the Commissioner admits were in attendance in the Catholic mission schools, make in all 1,728. Contrast this total—1,728—with the 855 pupils in attendance in all the other mission schools, and let the Commissioner answer whether it still—seems evident from this that the great Protestant organizations in refusing aid of the Government for their schools have maintained them in the true missionary spirit out of their own funds.

It would be interesting to know whether this still applies, in the opinion of the Commissioner, to the Protestant churches alone.

At this time, too, it is proper to call attention to the fact that in addition to the mission schools to be found in the Commissioner's report, and from which this analysis was apparently made, there are two other Catholic mission schools. At Santa Fe, N. Mex., St. Catharine's, a mission school, with 135 pupils; and at Muscogee, Okla., St. Joseph's, with 145 pupils.

I have no quarrel with the school of any denomination. As far as I am informed, they all do good work. This I have never hesitated to say. Members of this House and of the Senate have heard me urge an appropriation for the Hampton school. But when an official of this Government makes such a statement as that just quoted it is very natural that it be resented.

The insinuation that the Catholic Indian schools have not "been conducted in the true missionary spirit" is simply astounding. Who that had ever read a line of the history of this country could have given expression to such a slander? From the discovery of this continent to the present day much of the history of this country must be read in the lives of Catholic missionaries. Perpetuated in countless streams and rivers, towns and cities, mountains and valleys, the glories of their deeds and of their lives will be commemorated throughout the land until the end of time. To detail their marvelous work would be idle, since the history of America will forever stand in refutation and condemnation of the Commissioner's contemptible insinuation.

No fear need be entertained that this work will cease. The history of nineteen centuries can be marshaled to show the fidelity with which that church has gone forth to teach all men. This is the Commissioner's chief reliance against embarrassment. Well does he know that the accommodations that the Government can not offer will be found in these same schools. And let it be hoped that in their operation nothing will be done that will not be in harmony with the Commissioner's idea of "the true missionary spirit."

In this extraordinary letter the Commissioner also says:

It is claimed in the discussion in Congress above referred to that "if contract schools are obnoxious because sectarian, Government schools are certainly much more objectionable." This is a statement which is not substantiated by the facts. Long quotations are given from Archbishop Ryan, Herbert Spencer, and Webster's argument in the celebrated Girard case as bearing upon this subject. The definition of a sectarian school, as adopted and understood in this office with reference to the educational matters, is that of the latest edition of Webster's International Dictionary. He defines sectarian as "a member or adherent of a special school, denomination, or religious or philosophical party;" sectarianism as "excess of partisan or denominational zeal; adherence to a separate church organization."

The statement that "if contract schools are obnoxious because sectarian, Government schools are certainly much more objectionable" was certainly made by me. It was based, too, upon the report of the superintendent of Indian Schools, a Government official, and on an extract from the Commissioner's own report, all of which he conveniently omits to mention in the extract just quoted. Just to make it clear that there was justification for the assertion, even though the Commissioner says that it is "not substantiated by the facts," I give here the authority for the statement, as it appears in my former speech:

The Government schools are supposed to be stripped clean of everything that smacks of sectarianism. The report of Miss Estelle Reel, the superintendent of Indian Schools, for 1899, however, refutes this supposition. At the outset of her report she says:

* * * "Therefore it seems most fitting that I should set forth in my report such matters as have come under my personal observation while in the field."

As a result of her "personal observation," she reports the conditions existing at the many schools visited. Some of her observations follow: She found at the Haskell Institute, Kansas, that "a most happy Christian influence pervades the school;" Chilocco Indian School, Oklahoma, "religious exercises are conducted regularly;" Nambe and Tesuque Pueblo day schools, "religious training is carefully given;" Albuquerque Indian School, New Mexico, "the religious welfare of the children is carefully looked after;" Phœnix Indian School, Arizona, "Christian influences surround the students;" Perris School, California, "Sunday-school exercises are held regularly;" Carson Indian School, Nevada, "religious exercises are held regularly;" Klamath Agency, Oreg., "at each school (there are three) there is a force of faithful, Christian teachers;" Chemawa Indian School, Oregon, "religious exercises are regularly held;" Siletz Boarding School, Oregon, "the religious training of the children is carefully looked after."

These, sir, are all Government schools. Can there be religious training without sectarian teaching? Why, these schools are the most objectionable because the most sectarian of all existing schools among the Indians. Speaking of this phase of the school question, the Commissioner, in his report for 1899, says, at page 29:

"Although sectarian teaching is forbidden in the schools, they are not Godless institutions. The broad principles of the Bible, of religion, and morality are taught, and, so far as it is possible, only strong religious characters are placed in charge of the children. The petty distinctions of creeds are ignored, but all employees are required to lay such a foundation in the hearts and minds of their pupils that the great religious bodies of our country may hereafter build upon it a vigorous and enduring Christian character."

In other words, the Commissioner believes in a "creedless" religious training by lay teachers.

That is the justification for the assertion that the Government schools are as obnoxious from the standpoint of sectarianism as are contract schools.

It was hardly to be expected that the Commissioner could appreciate the force or meaning of any word without recourse to a dictionary, and no one could imagine him exercising any reasoning powers for himself in an effort to comprehend its meaning. The long quotation from Archbishop Ryan to which he refers was adopted by me as a more comprehensive and exact definition or explanation of the word "sectarianism" than any given elsewhere. It was made before the Senate Committee on Appropriations in February, 1898, by the Most Rev. P. J. Ryan, Archbishop of Philadelphia, and is as follows:

This word sectarianism, gentlemen, is the most thoroughly misunderstood and at present, perhaps, the most mischievous word in the English language. Properly speaking, sectarianism is the religion of sects—that is, of bodies cut away, as the term implies, from the original church. Unsectarian religion is the religion of that original church. But this is not the meaning popularly attached to it. Webster defines as sectarian "one of a party in religion which has separated itself from an established church, or which holds tenets different from those of the prevailing denomination."

Now, as we have no established church, for union of church and state in our circumstances is out of the question, and there is dispute as to which is the "prevailing denomination," a "sectarian" is not easy to find. For a man to preach unsectarianism it is supposed that he must avoid all doctrines in which he may disagree with anyone of his audience. Now, as every doctrine of Christians has been denied by someone, unsectarian preaching is simply impossible, when the audience is representative of all shades of religious opinion. What is called unsectarian teaching is attempted in some of our public institutions by what are known as "moral instructors," but it is sometimes the most sectarian of all teaching, as it represents simply the peculiar religious views not of a body but of the individual who teaches. It has the merit of great variety, as it changes with each moral teacher, and not unfrequently with the same individual at different periods of life.

The Commissioner evidently could not appreciate the logic of that passage. The limits of his vision and reason are defined by Webster's International Dictionary.

The quotation from Webster's argument in the Girard will case was used in the argument to demonstrate that the Government schools were equally as sectarian as contract schools. That the mere fact that individuals uncontrolled by the tenets of a particular church were commissioned to teach, could not obviate the objection that the teaching was sectarian. To repeat Webster's words:

It has been said that there may be lay preachers among them. Lay preachers! This is ridiculous enough in a country of Christianity and religion.

* * * * * * *

Now, are not laymen equally sectarian in their views with clergymen? And would it not be just as easy to prevent sectarian doctrines from being preached by a clergyman as from being taught by a layman? It is idle, therefore, to speak of lay preaching.

Here Webster was interrupted by a statement that it was not lay preaching, but lay teaching, that had been discussed. He continued:

Well, I would just as soon take it that way as the other—teaching as preaching. Is not the teaching of laymen as sectarian as the preaching of clergymen? What is the difference between unlettered laymen and lettered clergymen in this respect? Everyone knows that laymen are as violent controversialists as clergymen, and the less informed the more violent. So this, while it is a little more ridiculous, is equally obnoxious. According to my experience, a layman is just as likely to launch out into sectarian views and to advance clashing doctrines and violent, bigoted prejudices as a professional preacher, and even more so. Every objection to professional religious instruction applies with still greater force to lay teaching. As in other cases, so in this, the greatest degree of candor is usually found accompanying the greatest degree of knowledge. Nothing is more apt to be positive and dogmatical than ignorance.

A passage from Herbert Spencer's Study of Sociology was used to sustain the proposition that the development of the intellect alone did not act as a preventive of vice. I contended then, as I believe now, that religious training and development are essential to all proper education; that without it men are not made either good or desirable citizens—certainly not good Indians. The passage, however, was not relied upon in the discussion of the sectarian nature of the Government schools.

It may be said that this is of no importance. None whatever, except to call attention to the commissioner's omission to state upon what the assertion was made, and the authority to which it is improperly credited. It merely brings out distinctively the careless and unfair manner in which the commissioner has reviewed and answered the speech to which he calls attention.

With much seriousness it is pointed out in this letter that—

In a Catholic contract school every employee, from superintendent to the smallest Indian assistant, is a member of the Catholic Church; no other denomination has any representative; the ritual of the Catholic Church, its catechism, it traditions, its theories, are alone taught; it is emphatically an organization for the purpose of inculcating the peculiar tenets of the Catholic faith to the exclusion of all others. In a Government school the religious or political opinions of an employee are not involved in his selection or retention in the school.

It seems strange that it did not occur to the commissioner that everything in that passage about Catholic contract schools applies with equal force to the contract and mission schools of all the denominations. Why single out with such particularity the Catholic schools? Why did not the commissioner call attention to the fact that the Lincoln School, for which direct appropriations have been made and which will only cease with this year, is by its charter an Episcopalian school? Hampton, until 1893, when apparently it first dawned upon men that contract schools were sectarian, made it clear in its reports that it had a missionary department.

Pupils were there prepared to do mission work. Its report for 1895, found at page 414 of the Report of the Commissioner of Indians Affairs for the same year, shows that of the "returned students" 6 were missionaries and 15 catechists. Religion and religious teaching and instruction is an important part of the school work. Its principal is a Congregational minister, and it has a resident chaplain. I do not say these things in derogation of the school. From personal examination I am convinced that this school does good work, and, as I have already stated, I urged the appropriation for it. But these facts are stated because, as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is well aware of them, it emphasizes the action of the Commissioner in dragging into the discussion of the Government's ability to accommodate the children in contract schools matters affecting Catholic schools alone when there was no necessity for it.

The Commissioner concludes his letter by saying:

Representative FITZGERALD says truly that the only difference between the Government schools and the contract sectarian schools is that one is supported by the Government and the other by contributions from religious and other associations. This is the point involved in sectarianism. The mission schools, if managed under Presbyterian auspices, teach the peculiar tenets of Presbyterianism to the exclusion of all other tenets; so are the Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, and others. In other words, they use their own funds in order to propagate their peculiar and separate creeds.

Of course I never made any such statement. Had I done so the commissioner would have been justified in declaring that I was absolutely ignorant of the school system. No doubt it would have afforded him great pleasure to point out my ignorance on the subject. I did say, however, as it appears before, that mission (not Government) schools differ from contract schools in that no pupils are in the mission schools under Government contracts. It may be said that the commissioner inadvertently used the term Government for mission; but even if this be so, it only further illustrates the careless and thoughtless manner in which the letter was prepared, or else it is an exhibition of ignorance about Indian schools that should not be tolerated in the least responsible of the commissioner's subordinates.

There are some other matters upon which I might with propriety touch at this time. There is no question that Catholic as well as Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Baptist, and Methodist mission schools are supported by the respective churches that maintain them, although the Commissioner omits to name in that statement the Catholic schools. There has never been a desire on my part, however, to discuss this question in the narrow way that the Commissioner has attempted to do. I have no wish to stimulate the bitterness sometimes inherited by men of different religious beliefs. Indeed, there is no necessity of it being done by anyone, not excepting the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Whenever the question of Indian education is to be discussed, as a member of this House I will shrink from no phase of it. Some other phases of the question the Commissioner will hardly deem it either profitable or advisable, although it certainly would prove instructive, for him to discuss.

So far as this remarkable letter is concerned, I am done. Upon it I have no further comment to make. If the Commissioner can take any satisfaction from it, let him enjoy to the full his delight. It may as well be understood, however, that no such slanderous statements as are contained in this letter can either be uttered in this House or placed in the RECORD without receiving speedy and proper refutation and their author just rebuke.

Trusts.

SPEECH
HON. MARLIN E. OLMSTED,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. OLMSTED said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was my intention when I spoke before upon this subject to call attention to the influence of Republican administration upon the laboring man. Our Democratic friends are shy about comparing present industrial conditions with those which obtained during the last Democratic Administration. One member upon this floor did faintly insist that the Democratic party had done more to reduce the hours of labor. We concede that. They reduced not only the hours but the days, the weeks, and the months of labor. They even reduced the number of men engaged in and the wages paid for labor.

Pennsylvania is the Keystone State, and what affects the keystone affects the whole arch. In the manufacture of iron, steel, and tin plate alone there were employed in Pennsylvania in 1899, under President McKinley, 24,667 more men than in 1896, the last year of Cleveland's term. Each man had upon an average about thirty-five days more work in the year, and the daily wages were from 10 to 31 per cent higher.

The aggregate of wages paid them was $50,680,394 in 1899, as against $29,859,019 in 1896, a difference of $20,821,275 in favor of a Republican Administration. These figures are from the official reports. The statistics as to workmen in mines, upon railroads, and in other lines can not yet be officially ascertained; but their testimony will be equally convincing as to the advantages of Republican supremacy.

As part of my remarks I submit the following official tables, for which I am indebted to Hon. J. M. Clark, chief of the bureau of statistics:

From Hon. James E. Roderick, chief of the bureau of mines of Pennsylvania, I learn that the production of coal in my State in 1899 was 127,101,167 tons as against 98,347,986 tons in 1896, an increase of 28,753,181 tons. The wages paid are not reported to his department, but assuming that the amount paid per ton for mining remained the same in 1899 as in 1896, the cost of mining the additional 28,753,181 tons was more than $20,000,000, so that in the manufacture of iron and steel and tin plate and in the mining of coal there were paid out in 1899 as wages to laboring men more than $40,000,000 in excess of the wages paid in 1896, the last year of the last Democratic Administration.

Think of the great advantage to every interest and to all the people of having $40,000,000 per annum added to the number of honest dollars in circulation. Think to what proportions this increase will swell when we take into consideration the additional wages paid to men employed upon railroads and in the various other branches of industry not included in the figures I have given. Reflect that this great improvement has been taking place not only in Pennsylvania, but throughout the entire Union, and then you may begin in a small way to realize the inestimable advantages of Republican rule and the importance of maintaining a Republican majority in Congress and continuing in power the Administration of President McKinley, under which such mighty changes have been wrought for the benefit of all our people.

HON. NICHOLAS MULLER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 7, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8777) to confer upon the supervisor of the harbor of New York further power to act in reference to interference with navigation, and to confer jurisdiction upon the United States courts to punish offenders thereof.

Mr. MULLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I urge the passage of the bill, which is a measure in behalf of all the owners, managers, masters, and pilots of steam vessels who are in active service. I urge the passage of this bill in the interests of navigation and to protect the lives of navigators and to protect valuable property, by the avoidance of collisions. No legal authority for abating this smoke nuisance can be found in the Federal laws; and in the interests of commerce and navigation Congress is appealed to to remedy this long-existing evil and thus do away with this great menace to navigation.

It has been conclusively shown by preponderance of evidence that these waters under the control of the Federal Government are made absolutely dangerous, and large interests are jeopardized by the creation of these dense smokes and fumes from the factories located on the Jersey side of the Kill von Kull River. This bill, while directly intended to protect navigation, will also give great relief to people of the State of New York, whom I have the honor to represent in part. This bill should receive the favorable sanction of Congress, as recommended by the honorable Secretary of War, honorable Secretary of the Treasury, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and by the United States Government supervisor of the great harbor of New York.

This bill should command the earnest consideration of every member of Congress, and I am convinced, if properly and carefully considered by this body, it will receive favorable action. For years Staten Island has suffered from the prevalence of this smoke nuisance, and as Congress alone can give relief, I earnestly ask for such relief as this bill will afford, and am supported in this contention by thousands of people on Staten Island who have witnessed the depreciation of property values caused by the dense smoke of these factories; and so dense and stifling is this smoke that all forms of vegetation are dwarfed and ruined.

This bill should receive the favorable action of Congress—

First. Because the interests of interstate and foreign commerce demand the protection of the Government against this danger to navigation in the great waterways controlled by the Federal Government.

Second. Because the large appropriations granted by the United States are rendered, to a great extent, useless by the danger to navigation on waterways so improved at the nation's expense. It has been shown by naval officers and expert navigators that these dense clouds of smoke, obscuring the vision, are a far greater hindrance to navigation than the densest fog could be.

This bill in its general character does not apply to any particular case, nor is it advocated by any special interests, and if opposed, as it certainly should not be, it can only be opposed by special interests. It is a strictly business as well as humanitarian measure. Its enactment is demanded by the highest considerations of the public weal, and for a just and proper regard for the increasing dangers that threaten navigation in the great port of New York.

Having at heart the welfare and safety of thousands who demand the passage of this bill, I submit it to the consideration of the House, feeling that a sense of right, humanity, and common justice will satisfy the members of the House that this bill should pass, in the interests of the people concerned as well as the United States Government, whose executive representatives unite in recommending its enactment into law.

Deficiency Appropriation Bill.

HON. HENRY D GREEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 14, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11537) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes—

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At the very beginning of this session of Congress, as far back as December 12, 1899, House bill No. 3717, familiarly called the Grout bill, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

It has remained there ever since, and, for all that I can find out, will remain there until the Fifty-sixth Congress ceases to exist, or at least until it will be too late to have the measure acted upon and enacted into law at this session.

There can be no excuse for this unprecedented and needless delay. Sixty days would have been sufficient time to hear all the arguments for and against the measure. It is apparent that want of time to consider can not be urged as even a plausible excuse. What, then, is the reason for the delay? The bill is a very short one, the provisions are simple, the subject-matter is old, and the legal propositions involved have all been settled by the court of last resort. The people naturally suppose that the men who are appointed as members of the Committee on Agriculture are not only familiar with the subject-matter of the questions coming under its jurisdiction, but are friendly to the passage of fair legislation which will protect and encourage that large portion of our people who are engaged in agricultural pursuits.

To my personal knowledge, many individual members of this House have seen personally the members of this committee and personally urged them to take prompt action on the pending measure. Speaking for myself, I know I have done everything in my power to have the friends of this measure make special efforts to report the bill promptly and favorably.

From all the information I can obtain, the majority of that committee are in favor of reporting the bill favorably. When its friends outside of the committee expostulate and complain of the delay—the dangerous delay—the only answer we receive is in the way of excuses which do not excuse.

Anyone, from the conduct of the committee in not reporting, from the poor excuses offered for the delay, from the assurances given of approval of the measure, is compelled to conclude that the members of the committee are individually for the bill and collectively against it.

Their delay can be explained in but one of the following hypotheses:

First. The enemies of the bill, open or secret, constitute a majority of the committee, despite their personal assurances to the contrary.

Second. The friends of the bill, while they may be a numerical majority, are outmaneuvered by the oleomargarine supporters, and have not and are not managing their fight with skill.

Third. That the friends of the bill are in a majority, yet by party orders or for supposed partisan capital are willing to allow the bill to be delayed so that final action may not be taken on the measure before the expiration of this session and before the question of the Presidency is again settled previous to the convening of Congress.

It looks as though they wished to be able in the next Congressional and Presidential canvass to pose as both the friends of the oleomargarine trusts and the friends of the farming and dairy interests.

Let me say to the Committee on Agriculture as well as to the members of this House that this straddle will not be successful.

The farmers and dairymen of the United States are alive to their interests; they have taken a firm and uncompromising stand in their opposition to any longer delay in stamping out this fraudulent business, which so interferes with them that it threatens the very existence of the manufacture of pure dairy butter.

They are well organized and each day are becoming better organized. They stand shoulder to shoulder in this fight, willing to drop party lines if need be.

They will solve the mystery of this delay. Time will disclose to them the real cause. Even the secrets of the committee room will leak out and become public property. They will be able to separate their friends from their opponents and before the Fifty-seventh Congress is elected they will by their votes at the polls see that their interests are not put in jeopardy by either open enemies, lukewarm friends, or bungling management.

It is said by members of the committee that the bill has been referred to a subcommittee of three, and that two out of the three members are enemies and have held back and continue to hold back the report. Will it not be hard to explain to the dairy interests of this country what necessity there was to have a bill so plain in its provisions and so reaching in its character referred to any subcommittee? Surely this was a blunder. But it is easily corrected. The majority of the committee, which had power to refer to a subcommittee, surely have the power to order a report of that subcommittee, and in case of a refusal they can discharge them from all further consideration of the measure and take action. Nay, they can even take action and report the bill without considering the fact of its submission to the subcommittee. This may not be a very courteous proceeding, but who will deny that the time for courtesy has passed and for action has come? The continuance of this courtesy plea can result in nothing else than the undue delay and ultimate defeat of the measure.

I for one hold and say there is no good reason for delay, and for one representing a constituency in which every farmer keeps cows and produces milk, and is directly or indirectly interested in the manufacture of pure dairy butter, enter my solemn protest against the dilatory action of this committee and demand a report. The very opponents of this measure can assign no good reason for withholding the measure from the consideration of the House. The subject is an important one, one of great interest to the public, and one whose decision affects the business of many thousands of our most industrious and most valued citizens. So it at least has a right to be discussed and passed upon by the House.

If there are any intrinsic objections to this bill, if any of its provisions are unjust, if any can be improved, let these changes be made by the committee and the bill then reported. The members of this House, I believe, are fully able to frame and pass a fair and acceptable measure on the subject-matter. Whatever may be said by the opponents, it is not fair that the legislation be stifled in committee or its enactment into law at this session of Congress be prevented by these dilatory tactics. I again warn the members of this committee and of this House that each one individually and the majority party collectively will have to answer for the defeat of this legislation, whatever be the excuse they may give.

In behalf of my constituents, in behalf of those of your constituents who have for days by letter, petition, and resolution pressed you to have this bill doing away with the illegal and unjust practices used by the manufacturers of oleomargarine in their unfair and criminal competition with the pure dairy product passed, I appeal to you to redouble your efforts to secure a favorable report of the Grout bill and its enactment into a law before Congress closes its doors this session.

Now, let us turn our attention to an examination of the merits of the Grout bill and to a discussion of the arguments urged by its supporters and the statements and criticisms of its antagonists.

Let the position of those who favor this bill be not misunderstood. They do not complain at their product, real dairy butter, being placed on the market in honest competition with oleomargarine, butterine, or any chemical compound of grease, call it by whatever name the manufacturer may; but they do protest against these grease compounds being placed on the market and sold to purchasers and consumers for what it is not—the product of the dairy.

The provisions of the Grout bill should plainly convince any unprejudiced thinking man that this is their only object, for although the Federal tax on oleomargarine and its kindred products is at the present time 2 cents a pound, by this bill this tax will be reduced to one-fourth of 1 cent a pound—merely a nominal amount—one which will enable these compounds to be sold for 1¼ cents cheaper than its present price.

But it does provide that all oleomargarine, the natural color of which is white, if colored to resemble butter shall pay a Federal tax of 10 cents. Why do the dairy interests ask the reduction? Simply because they wish to show in a practical manner that they do not fear the honest competition of oleomargarine or any other grease so long as it has its natural color and must be sold in the open market for what it really is.

Why do they ask the imposition of a high tax on the colored compound? Simply because if it is sold for butter, which it is not, it can not be sold at a price under which honest butter can be produced.

These imitations, on an estimate based upon the market prices of the products entering into them and adding in labor, cost of production, and a fair profit to the manufacturer, can be produced at from 8 to 10 cents a pound, while, on the contrary, every farmer or every man that has ever examined into the manufacture of dairy butter knows that at 18 and 20 cents the profit is merely nominal and during many seasons of the year it can not be produced at that cost. Now, here let us examine what materials go in the manufacture of these compounds. They are the same, and in order that there may be no mistake about it I insert the answer given by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in reply to a resolution of this House asking for the information which under the present law the manufacturers are obliged to file in the Treasury Department, after swearing to the same.

When you glance over this long list of various articles it has a tendency to make even a stout heart quail. It is claimed that they are all healthy and easily digested. Perhaps they are; I hope they are. To me it looks like a rather nasty mixture, and I may be pardoned for preferring my butter to be made of the natural juice of the cow. But I do not intend to discuss either the healthiness of the compound, its flavor, or its digestibility; others may discuss that part of the subject.

If anyone will take up the list and put market prices on the several ingredients, the statement I have made as to cost of production can be easily verified; and that is the point I wished to make clear. The burden of the complaint of the supporters of this measure is that these products are fraudulently sold as dairy butter. Is this charge true? I have before me a circular letter mailed to me and having the name of G. F. Swift, president of Swift & Co., of Chicago. He states, "It is absolutely impossible to-day, under the internal-revenue laws and regulations, to sell oleomargarine as butter to consumers of ordinary intelligence." Is this true? No thinking, reading citizen will believe this statement. Certainly none living in Pennsylvania who has read the North American and other newspapers, which have daily during the last three months shown up the frauds practiced in the sale of oleomargarine in Pennsylvania alone.

That State has stringent laws against the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine for butter, and severe penalties are attached; but even these laws it has shown—and daily now is conclusively showing—do not prevent or deter the manufacturers of oleomargarine and their agents from carrying on a gigantic system of frauds. Over 11,000,000 pounds of this grease was sold in Pennsylvania alone, nearly one-eighth of the entire output of the United States manufacturers—fully one-eighth when the amount exported is taken into account.

Was this sold as oleomargarine or butter? The answer may be found in the hundreds of indictments brought before the Federal courts against those who sold this trash for butter, and at butter prices. The cases tried conclusively proved that a mighty and extensive conspiracy existed, backed by the millionaire manufacturers, to set the laws at defiance and swindle the consuming public. These men, principals and agents, went so far as to guarantee immunity from punishment to those who carried on this nefarious business and perpetrated unblushingly these gigantic and outrageous frauds.

They went beyond this in their revel of lawlessness. They bribed the State authorities and officers who were supposed to have been appointed and who were paid out of the taxpayers' money for the purpose of detecting and punishing these offenders.

Such a flood of light has been thrown upon this subject that the man who makes the statement that oleomargarine is not largely sold as dairy butter would be stamped as a modern Ananias, and would be admitted without further examination to the order of the knights of that name.

It is hard to believe that the gentleman whose language I quoted above willfully made a false statement, but it is harder still to believe that he has not "ordinary intelligence." The public must explain his statement. In charity I am willing to believe he has been misinformed by the conspirators. Now, if a large part of the 11,000,000 pounds sold in Pennsylvania was sold as dairy butter—and when I fix that amount at 90 per cent I believe I place it within the bounds of truth—how much of the balance was sold in others States as the products of our dairies? Is it any wonder that the sales of these imitations have increased so rapidly?

Let us look at this increase, boasted by the manufacturers.

In the same letter Mr. Swift says—I read a portion of his letter:

Fourth. The annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1899 (pages 192 to 199, inclusive), furnishes much interesting and valuable information on this subject. For instance, the average monthly production of oleomargarine in 1888 was 2,880,460 pounds, while the average monthly production in 1899 was 6,928,325 pounds, showing an increase in production in eleven years of nearly 300 per cent. This increased production grew out of the increased market, and the increased market came because the people wanted and used oleomargarine. During the same period the averege quantity withdrawn monthly for exportation to foreign countries increased from 140,516 pounds in 1888 to 258,003 pounds in 1899.

The following table of production from all oleomargarine sources for each fiscal year since November 1, 1886, the date the oleomargarine law took effect, is interesting as showing the extent of operations in the country.

	Produced.	Revenue paid.
	Pounds.
On hand Nov. 1, 1886	181,090
During the fiscal year ended June 30—
1887 (from Nov. 1, 1886)	21,513,537	$723,948.04
1888	34,325,527	864,139.88
1889	35,664,026	894,247.91
1890	32,324,032	786,291.72
1891	44,392,409	1,077,924.14
1892	48,364,155	1,206,329.60
1893	67,224,398	1,670,643.50
1894	69,632,246	1,723,479.80
1895	56,958,105	1,409,211.18
1896	50,853,234	1,219,432.46
1897	45,531,207	1,034,129.60
1898	57,516,136	1,315,708.54
1899	83,130,474	1,956,618.56
Total	647,610,476	15,942,101.43

This table is taken from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue above referred to, and is therefore authentic and official. It will be noted that the production has steadily increased until, in the year 1899, it amounted to 83,130,474 pounds.

The Secretary of the Treasury's statement shows that the production of oleomargarine in the United States for the month of December, 1899, was 11,713,743 pounds.

With these startling and unimpeachable figures, does any sane man wonder why the farmers of this country complain and ask the enactment of legislation which will only in a measure protect the dairy interests from utter annihilation in the very near future if the present fraudulent competition is allowed to go on.

Every member, when he casts his vote on this measure, must decide whether he will wipe out the entire dairy interests of his district to allow the millionaire bogus-butter manufacturers of the United States to roll up more millions; for that and nothing else is what a vote against the Grout bill means. To you members of this body who represent Southern constituencies, where the cotton blooms, I ask you whether you are willing by your votes to strike down the great dairy interests of this country in order that you may dispose of a few more gallons of cotton-seed oil than you otherwise would?

Have you no regard for your friends among our people who, like you, are trying under the most adverse circumstances and discriminating laws to wring a livelihood by the hardest labor from the soil of mother earth? There are innumerable legitimate uses for your oil. Daily and hourly you are gaining more extended markets for it among the people of the North and the East and the West. You need not fear for its present and its future—it has far better uses than a component part of bogus butter.

To you I will quote from Mr. Swift:

Cotton-seed oil: This ingredient is not always used; it is used in limited quantities in the medium grades.

The statistics above quoted show you how much, irrespective of his assertions, is used. We, the friends of honest butter, ask your assistance. We ask you to take a broad and honest view of this subject and not be influenced by selfish and sordid considerations alone, but by your sense of right and justice. Show us what Southern justice and generosity is. Prove to us that it exists, and you can never give us more conclusive proof than by the stand you take on this bill. This is a case of live and let live. What is your answer?

To the Union Dairy Company, manufacturers of choice oleomargarine, I say, as honest men, change your name; oleomargarine is not a product of the dairy, and your name is a fraud, and it suggests fraud to others who handle your product. To the Retail Merchants' Association of Illinois, I say to you that for every dishonest dollar you may put into your pockets by the sale of oleomargarine for butter you pull five honest dollars out of the pockets of the trousers of the honest farmers who sell an honest product from the milk of their cows, and many of them live on the broad, grass-covered prairies of your own State.

To the various trade and labor organizations who have honored me with their protests against the Grout bill I say you have been imposed upon by false statements and designing and unscrupulous men. No one can object to your eating imitation butter from choice. You can even buy it for less money than you do now if this bill is enacted into law. It will not be colored, it is true, yet the color adds neither to its taste, its feel, its odor, or its healthfulness. Surely the difference in price will pay for its looks. And then you must also remember that you and yours are subject to the same impositions that have been inflicted upon your fellow-workmen all over the United States. The workmen in any community do not wish to buy oleomargarine for real butter, they do not want to pay two or three prices for these grease com pounds. Stop a minute and think. Do you?

Your plea that the passage of this bill will close the sixteen oleo factories and throw workmen out of employment is a weak one. It will not bear examination. Do you think these factories will be shut down? I would that this might happen, but it will not. They will surely not produce the quantity they do now, I grant you, and some workmen may lose employment there to find it in the manufacture of some honest product. But to every man that goes elsewhere for employment for this reason a score will find employment and a better living on our farms and in our creameries. Remember they are workingmen earning their living by the hardest kind of manual toil.

You could give the same reason for not interfering with the marketing of soapstone, whose product is mixed with the flour which goes into the bread you and your families eat. So could you give the same reason for not shutting down the manufactories which produce any other adulterated food article which is sold for genuine. You are the sufferers; you are the direct beneficiaries of all pure-food legislation honestly enforced. Ask your wives; they will tell you so, if you do not believe my statements.

This is no time for the workingmen of even Cincinnati, Cleveland, or Chicago to give their assistance to the oleo or any other trust. You speak of butter trusts. Do you not know that such a trust is a practical impossibility? Cattle used for dairy purposes will not flourish in large herds. The actual labor of producing butter is too great for a trust to be even thought of. Thousands of farmers would by adding to their herd of cows break it down in a few short months. Do not strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. Honesty in this case is the best policy; and what is more, it is right. Many of us who are pressing for this measure have for years fought, and hope in the future to actively assist in fighting, your battles. They are many. They are opposed by money and the same kind of arguments as you bring forward against the butter interests.

Had you not better consider before you are used as the tools of the backers of these frauds? When the farmers of this country cease to give you sympathy and assistance you will have a harder fight to maintain your rights than you have ever had in the past. It will not pay to go back on these valuable allies, and I am glad to say your opposition is not general. It is confined to only a very few spots, and you do not talk for the great army of the employed.

You ask me why it should be permissible for the makers of genuine butter to color their product and not the manufacturers of oleomargarine.

Mr. Swift ostentatiously boasts that they have colored oleomargarine a rich yellow color for twenty-five years, as though that gave a prescriptive right to continue the practice despite the disastrous results. The reason I give you for prohibiting the coloring of oleomargarine is that by coloring it you are able to and you actually do deceive the public.

God Almighty gave butter its color—the grass He gave the cows to eat colored it yellow. If any distinction is to be maintained, it must be the natural color when that color is most pronounced. When it bleaches from the want of grass food in color, it could hardly be told from oleomargarine; and it is as much as anything to maintain the true distinction that they are compelled to color it, and they do color it.

Butter, to my recollection, was never colored until it was brought into competition with these imitation competitors. The necessity for the passage of this legislation becomes evident when we call to mind that thirty-two States of the Union have enacted legislation to remedy this crying evil. They have from time to time by amendment made these laws more stringent. All action on this subject has been for greater protection and never for less—for heavier penalties and never for lighter. The people of these States by a large majority must have demanded and kept demanding this legislation, or these laws would never have been passed. Thereby they recognized the existence of the evil and the necessity for action such as this bill contemplates.

The most plausible argument, and one which seems to have done more than any other in convincing some of the labor organizations of the cities named above that this bill is hostile to their interests, is that the enactment of this law will raise butter to an exorbitant price, which they fix as high as 50 or 60 cents a pound. Surely when oleomargarine pays 10 cents tax, and costs not more than 10 cents, it would enter the competition colored at 20 cents a pound. Again, the increased production of butter, which will take place as soon as a small margin of profit appears, will be greatly increased, and this will in itself maintain the price at a point very nearly at the cost of its actual production.

So I say to you your fears are groundless and you will be able to buy and eat genuine butter at a price no greater than or but very little greater than its present price. On principle no one can object to pay for an article its actual cost plus a fair profit, but we can object to profits being made exorbitant by resorting to fraudulent practices.

In conclusion, let me say that the farmer's lot is a hard one; it means incessant toil of the severest kind; it means manual labor under the burning suns of July and August and in the drenching rains of March and April. His wife and every one of his growing family must contribute their share to keep the wolf from the door. He suffers from drawbacks which come to no other occupation. At one time it is too much rain, at another it is too little; at another it is the fly in his wheat, the cholera among his hogs and poultry, or some other disease among his sheep or his cattle

Hardly a season goes by that he must not face a substantial and unlooked-for loss. His taxes are high, and the owner of land and farm stock can not escape them, as does the coupon clipper. Profits never come to him in a great lump, as they do to the manufacturer. Good years are only comparative to him, as his margin of profit is never large, and bad years are often as disastrous as they are to the manufacturer. Ease and luxury he knows little about. He is always the victim of tariff legislation, for he pays a tariff on even the imported grains which he sows. He pays the direct and indirect exactions of all tariff-taxed commodities which he is forced to consume. He is forced to sell in the markets of the world at a price fixed by his foreign competitor, and buy at protection prices.

He suffers most from freight discriminations. He contributes the largest part by far to the profits of all trusts. He has suffered from the fall in the price of lands. He pays the highest rates of interest for the money he is forced to borrow. He asks but little consideration at the hands of Congress; he asks them not favors, but only rights. In this measure he asks just and necessary protection, and he now awaits your answer. He is no slave; he owes no allegiance to trusts or corporations; he is not controlled. He is still a proud freeman, and he has the power and the nerve to punish a public servant who fails to do his honest duty and secure protection to himself and the general public from an undeniable fraud practiced on them. Remember, "You can not fool all the farmers of this country all the time."

Civil Government for Alaska.

HON. S. S. BARNEY,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 17, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes—

Mr. BARNEY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall not at this time enter into an extended general discussion of the pending bill (Alaska code), as we are all agreed that there is a pressing necessity for proper legislation of this character at this session of Congress. Later on, however, when this measure is taken up under the five-minute rule, I shall have some suggestions to make as to its details.

At this time I desire to take advantage of the rules and practice of the House and make some remarks more particularly applicable to other important measures asking the attention of Congress—one measure at least, which though perhaps not political in its character, is of vital interest to a large portion and perhaps all the people of this country.

The most important industry in America is the farming industry. And while we all know this to be a fact, I sometimes think we pay less attention, in the way of legislation, to its needs than any other. The reason for this perhaps is that the farming industry is so diversified and scattered in its influence that its wrongs and necessities are not often heard from in legislative halls.

It is the one great industry in this country which is not yet organized into great corporations, which always seem to be able to take care of themselves, and, from its very nature, probably always will remain divided and free from concentration.

It has "stock," and, generally, well-watered stock; but not of the kind which is quoted upon Wall street. And I trust the day is far distant when that will be the case.

It is very seldom that the farmers of the country knock at the doors of Congress for relief, and for that reason if for no other when they do come their requests should be heeded. The fact that they are here asking for help is good evidence that they are entitled to our careful consideration. The measure to which I now refer is H. R. 3717, being a bill "to make oleomargarine and other imitative dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine," introduced by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], and commonly known as the "Grout bill." While that measure in some of its details may not be entirely above criticism, I regard its object and general scope as most meritorious. It seeks to prevent fraud both upon the honest producers and the honest consumers of this country, and that in relation to a food product which enters into the domestic economy of every household in the land.

For that reason it may truthfully be said to be a measure not alone for the relief of the farmer, but also in the interest of all the people of this country who are not directly connected with this fraud. This bill seeks to insure to the consumer a knowledge of what he is buying and eating, to the end that he may not be imposed upon either in quality or price, and to insure the producer against being compelled to compete against a swindle and a fraud.

Those who have not given the subject careful attention hardly realize the magnitude and importance of the dairy interests of this country. The annual value of the dairy products of the United States is more than $800,000,000, and my own State of Wisconsin produces to the value of more than $35,000,000 every year. Millions of men, women, and children in this country are chiefly dependent upon this industry for their support, and these millions form a class of people who have a right to be heard when they ask for help.

They ask for no subsidy or bounty; they ask for no class legislation; they ask for nothing but protection against a fraud and a counterfeit. They ask for no legislation to assist them in placing their product upon the market, but they do ask—and they have a right to ask—for a law which shall prevent swindlers and counterfeiters from invading that market. This law is simply a proposition to prevent deception of the consumer who wishes to buy butter, and is so palpably just as to hardly need argument. Butter is a product of the cow, and from time immemorial she has had a monopoly of this article, and no man or corporation has any better right to counterfeit butter than he has to counterfeit the current money of the land.

Butterine, oleomargarine, or whatever name it may be called by, has no more or better right to be called butter and sold in the market for butter than a bogus dollar has to pass for a genuine one. The only difference is in the extent of the injury done in the one case or in the other.

It should be remembered that the measure referred to does not seek to take away or limit the right of anyone to either manufacture, buy, or use butterine, oleomargarine, or any other substitute for butter; it only seeks to compel the manufacturers of these substitutes to place them upon the market and sell them for what they really are.

If a manufacturer still wishes to deceive the public and color his product in imitation of butter, he can do so upon the payment of the required tax. If it were possible under the Constitution to do so, I would not have any manufacturer permitted, for any price, to deceive the public in a food product; but this exercise of the taxing power seems to be the only feasible way we have of reaching and preventing this deception and swindling of the public.

It is said that we are thus indirectly taxing an article out of existence. Now, in the first place, let it be understood that we are not attempting to tax oleomargarine or any other substitute for butter out of existence when made and sold for what it really is, but only desire to make it difficult for manufacturers to place on the market and sell an article of food for what it is not. If this can be accomplished in this way, I am glad of it and have no apology to offer. Congress taxed the old State banks out of existence, and thus prevented the public from being imposed upon by a wildcat and unsafe currency, and that was done "with malice aforethought," and the great majority of the people of this country are saying amen to that legislation every day. Many States, by means of high license, tax rum out of the market, or at least limit its sale, which is the same thing in principle. If such legislation is a proper exercise of the taxing power, I see no impropriety in making it burdensome, by taxation, for counterfeiters to deceive the public in an article of food.

It has been claimed that this oleomargarine is a wholesome article of food, better than much of the butter which is sold in the market, and that it is bought and consumed by the poorer classes, and that such a law will deprive them of this privilege. There is no truth whatever to this proposition, and it is only a subterfuge, by the means of which dishonest manufacturers seek to obtain undeserved sympathy and support.

Such a law will not prevent or in any way limit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or any other substitute for butter when not placed upon the market in a manner calculated to deceive the public. This law is as much in the interest of the people who buy and consume oleomargarine as of those who produce butter, and will only reduce the dishonest profits of the oleomargarine manufacturer. When the public is deceived as to the kind and quality of the article it is buying, it is always liable to be cheated, and generally is cheated.

Why is oleomargarine made and sold in imitation of butter if not for the purpose of making the consumer think that he is buying butter, and thus fraudulently induce him to pay for it the price of butter? While all may not be thus deceived, some unquestionably are, and in that way the market price of oleomargarine is dishonestly raised above its fair market value. It has been proven that oleomargarine can be made for less than 8 cents per pound, and yet it is often sold for more than three times that sum. Thus it is seen that all classes are cheated by this counterfeit—the farmer, the dealer, and the consumer.

Let some law be enacted which will prevent this deception, at the same time in no way preventing or limiting the honest manufacture and sale of oleomargarine for what it really is, and the consumer of this article, instead of paying 18 or 20 cents a pound for it, will be able to get it for but little more than one-half that sum. The dishonest profit of the manufacturer will be taken away, and the man who can afford it and who buys gilt-edged creamery butter will perhaps pay a little more for it, for he will know what he is getting and will not be deceived.

At the last session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, the Senate, by resolution, authorized and directed its Committee on Manufactures to investigate the pure-food question, and to ascertain if any food products are frauds upon the purchasers. While this committee was in session in the city of Chicago last summer, several witnesses appeared before it with samples of oleomargarine, which had just been purchased for the "best creamery butter," and for which from 18 to 25 cents per pound had been paid. Some of these packages had no marks upon them at all, as required by law, to enable the purchaser to know what he was buying, and all the others were so wrapped that this mark was entirely concealed; and this evidence was not successfully contradicted.

Notwithstanding the fact that this kind of traffic is being carried on all over the country, all the time in violation of law, experience proves that under the present law it is practically impossible to prevent it or to punish the offenders.

It may be stated as a fact almost undisputed that more than four-fifths of the oleomargarine sold and consumed in this country is sold for pure butter; and a large part of that which is honestly sold is fraudulently placed before the consumer for pure butter by dishonest hotel and boarding-house keepers. This dishonest practice can be but for one purpose and can have but one effect, and that is to raise the price of the imitation article approximately to that of pure creamery butter, while its cost of production is less than one-half.

Does it need any argument to prove that if a law is passed and enforced which will prevent this deceit and fraud, this imitation will be reduced in price to a fair profit above the cost of production, and thus save money to the purchasers and consumers of oleomargarine? It is not to be wondered at that the pork packers of Chicago and other large cities are opposed to this measure, because without some such law they are able to sell imitation butter for more than twice the cost of production.

The following report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in response to the resolution of Congress asking for information as to the ingredients used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, as shown by the returns of the different manufacturers, shows the composition of this article of food and proves beyond a doubt that it is now being sold in the market for nearly twice what it is honestly worth:

[House Document No. 662, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1900.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions in responding to House resolution of May 8, 1900, I have the honor to submit herewith data therein called for.

The original forms in which this information is submitted to this office are not only very large in bulk, but voluminous in number, and can not very well be transmitted; besides, they are a part of the records of the Internal Revenue Bureau, and should not therefore leave the custody of the Treasury Department.

The data submitted discloses the kinds of material used, the amount of each ingredient, and the per cent that each bears to the total amount of oleomargarine produced in the country for the periods named, and it is believed furnishes all the information intended to be called for in the resolution.

Very respectfully,

G. W. WILSON, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Without discussing the question as to the healthfulness of the above conglomeration of ingredients, I think I am justified in saying that it is not honestly worth in the market 20 cents per pound and never would sell for that sum if uniformly offered for sale without deception. Oleomargarine has the same rights before the public as any other food product, and it is not sought by this law to take from it one such just right. It has the right to be made of lard, hoof fat, cotton-seed oil, and soap grease. It has the right to come into the market honestly for what it actually is and, under those circumstances, to obtain for itself as high a price as the consumer will pay. But it has no right to sneak into the market disguised as pure butter and thereby obtain an unfair and dishonest advantage over both the butter consumer and the butter producer.

There is no better protection for the public against unjust profits than laws to compel producers to put their goods upon the market and sell them without deceit or fraud, and that is all this measure seeks to do.

We are told that we have no more right to tax the manufacturer of oleomargarine for his colored product than we have to tax the farmer who sometimes does the same thing. I say there is no analogy between the two cases whatever, because the manufacturer of oleomargarine colors his product for the purpose, and the only purpose, of cheating the consumer and making him believe he is buying something which he is not buying, while the producer of butter has no such object in view. Pure butter is colored to suit the fancy of the consumer and not to cheat him. I tell the man who sells me my butter that I do not wish it colored, and he brings it to me uncolored; others who buy of the same man desire their butter colored, and they get it to suit their fancy.

Nearly all wool is white, and everybody knows that to be a fact, and yet most of the garments which are made of wool are colored. This is not done for the purpose of cheating the buyer—and he is in no way deceived by it—but is done to suit the varied fancies of the buyers and wearers of woolen garments. There is no more fraud in the coloring of pure butter than there is in the coloring of wool and woolen goods.

In conclusion, I wish to say that there is a larger and broader principle involved in the measure than the protection of the farmer from the dishonest invasion of his market or the protection of the consumer from this one fraud.

America is the richest and most fertile country on the face of the earth. It has the means and the capacity of producing the greatest variety and the best foods consumed by man. Its people are the most ingenious and skillful people under the sun. For these reasons the food products of America ought to be the best in the world; and yet, if one wishes to purchase an extra article of food, he must buy something either actually imported or marked imported to deceive him.

Is it not a fact, humiliating to every American citizen, that foreign brands are placed upon our best food products to make people believe they were not made in America? And why is this so? Not because we have not the material and the skill to make the best food under the sun, for we have both; but because we have not yet risen to the standard of the Old World in the enactment and enforcing of pure-food laws.

The first step in that direction is to drive out of our markets every fraud and counterfeit. Every State should make and enforce laws which will enable the purchaser to know just what he is buying and eating or drinking, and the Federal Government should lend its aid in that direction, so far as it can, by the exercise of its taxing power.

If one wishes for any reason to buy ground pease instead of coffee, oleomargarine instead of butter, or any other substitute instead of the genuine article, he should have the unlimited right to do so, but he should buy in the market with a full knowledge of what he is getting. He can then buy pure food if he wishes to do so, and whatever he buys he can get it for what it is reasonably worth. This measure will at least help to accomplish that object with reference to one of the most important and delicate articles of food which goes upon the American table, and that is why I am heartily in favor of it.

I sincerely trust that before this session of Congress closes this measure will be reported to the House and considered. If that is done, it will undoubtedly pass, and it is a great wrong to prevent this consummation by parliamentary scheming.

Trusts.

SPEECH
HON. FRANCIS R. LASSITER,
OF VIRGINIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration joint resolution (H. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States,

Mr. LASSITER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not accustomed to this rough and tumble debate which I have enjoyed for the last few minutes, but I had intended to ask a question of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, which was answered by his silence when the gentleman from Texas charged him with the fact this morning. It is perfectly patent to my mind, devoted as I have been for my whole life to the interests of the people, that it is not the desire of the majority of this House to pass any legislation which shall restrict the illegal combinations which we call trusts. I had intended to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether he and his party associates had any arrangement with the leaders of either party in the other branch of this governmental body, looking to the favorable consideration of the pending resolution at this session of Congress? In view of the fact that a resolution has been adopted that Congress adjourn on the 6th of this month, and with the knowledge that several other important measures, including appropriation bills, are yet to be considered by both Houses of Congress, it must be evident to the country that this amendment to the Constitution is not aimed at trusts. It is aimed at the Democratic party.

Trusts will flourish so long as the Republican party is trusted to devise legislation to suppress them. Democrats, and all others who sincerely reprobate the illegal trade combinations known by this name, should reject this fraud—this Grecian horse—whose author could doubtless trace his lineal descent from Sinon. For one, knowing I should traduce my constituents in believing that they could be deceived by the political play of the majority, I shall adhere to the traditional principles of Democracy and with the caucus of that party vote against this snare. I can not do violence to the Constitution of my country, the sovereign rights of a sovereign State which I represent in part, nor hold out false hopes to people of this land who are the prey of these combinations, under Republican legislation and administration, for selfish fear lest my life-time record shall be misconstrued. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Increase of Pay of Surfmen of the Life-Saving Service.

Life, which all creatures love and strive to keep,
Wonderful, dear, and pleasant unto each,
Even to the meanest; yea, a boon to all
Where pity is, for pity makes the world
Soft to the weak and noble for the strong.
Arnold—"Light of Asia."

HON. TOWNSEND SCUDDER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 4, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11212) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. SCUDDER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This amendment should pass. The surfmen employed in our Life-Saving Service are underpaid. It is because this benignant service is threatened seriously, and because calamity will be the natural result of its crippled condition that we ask commensurate remuneration for those employed in it. Not that money reward can adequately compensate for the saving of precious human life, for life is priceless. Its loss can not be repaid. There are losses for which rewards and gains will afford compensation; not so loss by death, and for this reason legislation for its protection and preservation can not be too generous.

I would pay the life saver so well and make such liberal provision for his loved ones that thought of them or of self would be removed even more from his mind than it is now, if that be possible, at the moment of great danger, when risks seeming hopeless and heroism without bounds are demanded of him. With how much better heart and courage could these brave fellows go to their work if freed from all anxiety for their dear dependents in event of accident to themselves? I will not attempt to answer the question. To me it seems that the annals of the service reveal few cases of anything but the most complete self-abnegation and sacrifice in the hour of need, and for this reason the more would I wipe away that anxiety which must prey upon them in their leisure moments.

Mr. Chairman, the standard of civilization of a people is measured by their regard for the sanctity of human life—the divine gift of our divine Maker—life—equally precious to the lowly and to him of high degree—life, for the preservation of which every instrumentality known to the highest civilization of mankind should be called into requisition.

Our Life-Saving Service has been said to be divinely beautiful; the characterization is apt and deserved, for its benefactions know no boundary; its example has been an incentive to all nations; it rescues the children of all nationalities.

Is it to be marveled that enlightened governments everywhere are following the example we have set? The gallant and heroic services which humanity in distress has received at the hands of our life-saving crews have been recognized by foreign powers on more than one occasion, several of which have bestowed upon these heroes of ours especial tokens of grateful appreciation, among them the Government of Spain, which awarded a crew near Cape Charles medals of honor; the Government of Great Britain; the German Empire, which bestowed money upon the families of surfmen who perished in endeavoring to save the crew of a German vessel below Cape Henry, and awarded valuable tokens to the survivors of our crew, the greater number of whom were lost.

I have no doubt there are other instances, but do not call them to mind. These suffice to prove how general is the recognition our Life-Saving Service has received, after which other nations have organized similar institutions, but to which is awarded, by general consent, the preeminence in this God-like work. Representing a district embracing many miles of coast, along which are scattered over 10 per cent of the life-saving stations of the Government, and a constituency deeply interested and concerned in the work of the Life-Saving Service, I feel justified in calling to the attention of the House the dangers threatening this service by reason of the neglect of Congress to make adequate provision for the compensation of the life savers.

At an early date in this session I had the honor of introducing a bill (H. R. 7436) fixing the compensation of surfmen employed in the Life-Saving Service at the uniform sum of $65 per month. Gladly would I have made it seventy, but I feared to ask too much at this time.

I had previously introduced another bill (H. R. 97) providing for the pensioning, by retirement on half pay, of keepers and surfmen disabled by reason of wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty so as to unfit them for the performance of duty.

The bill further provides that any person who has been, is now, or at any time hereafter may be a keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or lifeboat station may, at his own request or at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the expiration of twenty years' employment in the Life-Saving Service, be retired upon half pay for the remainder of his life.

That if any keeper or member of a crew of a life-saving or lifeboat station shall hereafter die by reason of perilous service or any wound or injury received or disease contracted in the Life-Saving Service in the line of duty, leaving a widow, or child or children under 16 years of age, such widow and child or children shall be entitled to receive, in equal portions, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, one-half of the same amount, payable quarterly as far as practicable, that the husband or father would be entitled to receive as pay if he were living and continued in service.

The portion payable to the widow to cease upon her death or marriage, and the portion payable to any child to cease upon his or her attaining the age of 16 years. Upon the death or remarriage of the widow her portion of said amount to be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries under the provisions of section 8, if there be any; and upon the arrival of any child at the age of 16 years the payment of the portion of such child to thereafter be added to the amount to be paid to the remaining beneficiaries, if there be any. I feel that these provisions should be extended also to the superintendents and assistants in this service.

Both of these bills were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The pension bill I have not succeeded in having reported, not for lack of interest in the subject, but rather, I assume, owing to an indisposition at this time to take up new legislation, particularly that extending the pension system to the civil service. The experience which I have gained on this subject, however, encourages me in the hope that the time is not long distant when the end I have at heart will be accomplished. I feel assured that a bill can be framed which will meet the serious objections of those opposed to the extension of the pension system, of the merits of which legislation, so far as the Life-Saving Service is concerned, I will speak later.

My bill increasing the pay of surfmen (H. R. 7436) has fared better than the pension bill, its passage, with certain amendments in matters of detail, having been recommended by Hon. Sumner I. Kimball, the General Superintendent of the service (H. R. Report 1078, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session), to whom and to Mr. Horace L. Piper, the Assistant General Superintendent, I am gratefully indebted for much valuable information upon the Life-Saving Service. I take the liberty of using Mr. Kimball's language commending my bill, as it expresses the condition confronting the service far better than can words of mine.

To enable the committee to properly consider this bill, it seems proper that they should have information regarding the extent and location of the stations at which surfmen are employed, the number of surfmen, their required qualifications, the nature of their duties, and the hardships and dangers to which they are exposed.

The Life-Saving Service, as at present organized, divides the 10,000 miles of sea and lake coast of the United States into 12 districts embracing 260 stations in commission, distributed as follows: On the Atlantic, 190; on the Great Lakes, 55; on the Pacific, 14; and 1 at the Falls of the Ohio, Louisville, Ky. Each of these stations, excepting 8 on the coast of Florida, is manned by a keeper and a crew of surfmen ranging in number from 6 to 8, according to the requirements of the various localities, making the aggregate number of surfmen employed 1,763 who would be affected by the enactment into law of the bill under consideration.

On the Pacific coast the stations are open and manned throughout the year; on the lake coasts, from the beginning to the close of navigation (say from April 1 to December 15); on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, from the 1st of August to the 31st of May, following. During the period the several stations are manned each year the surfmen, under the existing laws, receive a compensation of $60 per month.

Surfmen are employed only after examination and certification by the Civil Service Commission. An applicant must be a citizen of the United States; not under 18 or over 45 years of age; not less than 5 feet 6 inches in height; not less than 135 or more than 205 pounds in weight; must reside in the district in which he seeks employment, and not more than 5 miles from the ocean, bay, or sound shore, or the shore of the Great Lakes (except applicants for the Louisville station); must be able to read and write the English language; must be a good swimmer, and must pass a satisfactory physical examination.

No person, however, can be examined who has not had at least three years' experience as a surfman, sailor, or boatman, unless the number of eligibles shall be found insufficient to fill the vacancies. An applicant, if successful, must, before signing articles of engagement in a crew, pass another physical examination by an officer of the United States Marine-Hospital Service, and be certified as physically sound. Once in the service, at any time during six months after his entry, if his conduct or capacity be not satisfactory, the keeper can, upon his own volition, discharge him from the service.

These restrictions limit the location of surfmen to the coast where they are to be employed, and of those eligibles by location it has been shown that only men in the prime of life and physically sound, accustomed to the handling of boats, and believed to be capable of withstanding the labor and exposures incident to the performance of their duty, are admitted to the service. It may be added that anyone subsequently found deficient is immediately discharged.

During the period of active service every surfman is required by law to reside at the station where employed, which, in most cases, is upon some lonely and exposed point of the coast, thus separating him from his family and preventing all social intercourse. During this time he is entitled by the regulations to be absent a period from sunrise to sunset in pleasant weather, in turn with the other members of the crew, or in lieu of two turns he may be absent twenty-four hours; but in this case he must furnish a substitute, to whom he must pay his entire salary for the period absent. No other absence is permitted except in an exigency, and then only upon loss of pay, a substitute being employed and paid the full salary of the absent man.

Their duties at the stations consist of daily practice and drill of some kind with the boats and apparatus, taking care of the station and the Government property, making such repairs and improvements as may be within the scope of their ability, and at night and during thick weather keeping watch and patrol upon the beach. The night is divided into four watches, each of which is taken, in turn, by two surfmen, proceeding from the station in opposite directions, and patrolling the beach until they meet the patrolmen from the adjacent stations, and exchange checks with them to prove their faithful execution of this duty. Where the stations are located at too great a distance from other stations to admit of this a regular beat of several miles is assigned, the limit of which is marked by a key post, which the patrolman is obliged to reach and there make record of his presence upon the patrol clock which he carries for the purpose. The severity of this duty can hardly be conceived by people accustomed to remain at night within doors.

Some idea may be formed from the fact that men have perished in its discharge, while others have providentially escaped death through timely rescue by their comrades. It is not at all unusual for patrolmen to meet with accidents which cripple them through stumbling in the dark over driftwood and unseen obstacles, and a large proportion of the deaths which have occurred in the service is due to complaints contracted through exposure on patrol. It frequently happens during the prevalence of storms that the men are drenched by overflooding seas, or by having to wade through the beach gullies often waist deep and sometimes deeper. This duty is considered so important that it is never under any circumstances omitted, and its infraction is held to be unpardonable, and is followed by certain dismissal.

In addition to the foregoing regular routine must be added their terrible and daring labors at shipwrecks. This, of course, is their crowning duty, and involves efforts almost superhuman and heroism carried to the very brink of deadly peril and often to death itself. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this feature, as many examples of their prowess are known to the country at large and have become as familiar as household words. The extent of their success is attested in the annual reports of the Service by statistics showing great numbers of lives saved and vast amounts of property delivered from the sea.

When it is considered that the life-saving crews are thus composed of selected professional experts, as it were—the pick of our hardy beachmen and sailors—that their duties, hardships, and exposures are as above described, and that the results of their labors and achievements have won for the Service the foremost place among all similar institutions in the world, thus adding luster to the national honor, it would seem that their compensation should bear relation rather to the value of their services than to the rate of wages current on the coast. Such, however, is not now and never has been the case.

For ten years previous to 1892 the compensation of surfmen was, under the law, fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at a rate not to exceed $50 per month for such period as the General Superintendent might find necessary. This pay proved so meager that men best qualified for the service preferred private employment, and Congress, therefore, by an act approved July 22, 1892, provided that surfmen should receive $65 per month each during the time the stations were manned.

By a provision in the act of August 3, 1894, extending the period of active service on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts from eight to ten months in the year, however, the above rate was limited to those surfmen who should serve for a shorter period than 8 months, $60 only being allowed to those serving the full period named for the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. This proviso was offered as an amendment by a minority in the House of Representatives, and was insisted upon at a time in the passage of the bill when, if the point of "no quorum" had been raised, the bill would have failed.

The discrimination thus made in the compensation of surfmen was productive of much complaint among them, and involved difficulties in the administration of the service and the settlement of the accounts which it is not necessary to enumerate here. They are set forth in the annual report of the operations of the service for the year 1894, and were in some measure remedied by an amendment in the appropriation bill of March 2, 1895, extending the period of service for which $65 per month could be paid from eight to eight and one-half months. On account of the discrimination still remaining, however, the administration of the service continued to suffer serious embarrassments which, as the committee having the bill under consideration may wish to understand, are quoted, as set forth in the annual report for 1895:

The act approved July 22, 1892, increasing the compensation of all surfmen from $50 to $65 per month, relieved the service of the difficulty it had for a considerable period experienced in enlisting and retaining competent men for the crews. Although the rate then fixed was smaller than many thought should have been accorded, it sufficed to secure the requisite ability and to restore contentment in the stations.

The act of August 3, 1894, extending the period of active service upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts two additional months (May and August), however, created a new disturbance, which threatened results scarcely less disastrous to the morale of the service than those which were apprehended and were making themselves apparent in consequence of the insufficient wages provided for the men previous to the increase of 1892.

This discontent sprang from a clause contained in the act which provided that all surfmen serving more than eight months should receive but $60 per month during the period of their service, and thus made a discrimination in the rate of compensation chiefly against those serving in a large proportion of the stations on the lakes, but also against many on the ocean coasts, and gave rise to numerous difficult questions of construction in the administration of the law. The difficulties were set forth to some extent in the last annual report, and attention was called to the necessity for remedial legislation. A provision inserted in the act making appropriations for the maintenance of the service for the current fiscal year, extending the rate of $65 per month to all surfmen serving for a period of eight and one-half months, obviated many of the difficulties; but a serious one yet remains, the discrimination now being chiefly in favor of the lake as against the ocean coasts, and in favor of one man in each of the 154 manned stations on the Atlantic coast against his comrades in the same station and all others employed on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

This happens from the fact that the term of active service upon the lakes, which is from the opening to the close of navigation, rarely or never exceeds eight and one-half months, and from the circumstance that in each of the 154 stations on the Atlantic an extra man is employed from December 1 to May 1—a period of less than eight and one-half months. The surfmen upon the lakes, therefore, and the extra man referred to, their term of service being within eight and one-half months, receive $65 per month, while all the others receive but $60.

The sense of injustice which this inequality excites among the men naturally creates much discontent and ill feeling, besides provoking constant strife on the part of the best surfmen throughout a large extent of the Atlantic coast to obtain the shorter period of service, it being a fact, which the authors of the law in question were apparently unaware of, that upon many portions of the Atlantic coast the services of men expert in surfing, boating, and fishing command much better wages during the late spring, summer, and autumn months than have ever been paid in the Life-Saving Service.

The interests of the service, no less than simple justice, demand that the compensation of surfmen shall be made uniform at whatever rate, and it is believed that $65 per month, the rate established by the act of July 22, 1892, is none too large.

It is noted here that no further allowance has ever been made to them, food, clothing, etc., being entirely at their own expense. This is mentioned because the idea is more or less prevalent that, like the enlisted men in the Army and Navy, surfmen are allowed rations, etc.

The embarrassments mentioned were repeatedly made known to the committees on appropriations, and the establishment of a uniform rate was recommended to them. Finally, in appropriating for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year, the rate of $60 per month was provided for surfmen throughout the service. While $65 per month would have been a more suitable rate, though one by no means adequate to their deserts, the fact that it was the same throughout the service was a source of great relief, and would have proved of such advantage that, if there had not been recently a great increase in the rate of wages for labor and in the cost of the necessaries of life, I should not now urge the increase contemplated by the bill, nor do I think the surfmen would have asked for it.

But the rise in the cost of living and the increase in the wages of laboring men throughout the country—and especially of men competent to handle boats—has so made itself felt in the decrease of the number of men seeking employment as surfmen, as well as in the increase in the number of resignations from the service for entry into better-paying private positions, that serious injury has already been done the service, and still more serious results are threatened. Within a year more than 15 per cent of the entire number of surfmen in the lake districts have resigned to better their condition, and the number of men applying for examination with a view to entering the service has so decreased that in nearly all the districts there have not at times been eligibles enough to fill the vacancies. The condition of the Ninth life-saving district, including the coasts of Lakes Erie and Ontario, is well set forth in the following extract from the quarterly report of the district superintendent, dated September 28, 1899:

"I found throughout the district a considerable feeling of uneasiness and dissatisfaction among the surfmen on account of the reduction in their pay, coming, as it did, when wages ashore and afloat through this section of the country are advancing. Attention is respectfully called to the fact that in nearly all of the changes during the season in this district the reason given by the surfmen for leaving the service has been that they thought they could do better elsewhere. During the trip I endeavored as much as possible, by talking with the men, to stay this current of unrest and desire to seek employment elsewhere; but I fear that some of the best men in the district will not return another season. The cost of living has advanced, and the point is made by the men that if they can do as well at other employment and be with their families it is more advantageous for them to do so.

"This district is in what in prosperous times is a center of industry. The cities of Oswego, Rochester, Buffalo, Dunkirk, Erie, Cleveland, Sandusky, and Toledo, with the many smaller intermediate towns, afford many openings for such men as the service most needs.

"Attention is also called to the dropping off of the applications for examination for the position of surfmen, the reason for which is, without doubt, the many other openings at present, both on the lakes and ashore, together with the reduction in wages in the service. I have sent out many notices to the lake towns, inviting sailors, fishermen, etc., to apply, and have in other ways endeavored to obtain applications, but the work so far is almost barren of results.

"This statement fairly represents the situation in the remaining lake districts, covering the coasts of Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Superior.

"The wages of a common seaman on the lakes during the past summer was $1.75 per day, besides his living, which increased in the fall to $3 per day, with living furnished. It is evident that the service, paying $2 per day without board, which would leave the surfmen about $1.50 net, can not compete with the shipmaster who pays $3 per day with board in addition.

"As an officer of the service has aptly expressed it, 'Heroes on $1.50 a day, especially if they have large families to support, however full of human kindness or prone to daring exploits, will immediately yield to the plump $3 per diem of the lake schooner or steamer with the fleshpots of the cook's galley thrown in by way of garnish.'

"On the Atlantic coast while the relative number of resignations has not quite equaled that on the lakes, the conditions are nearly as unsatisfactory, while in the Gulf district for a year or more the crews have been more or less made up of such men as were available from outside who have not passed—and perhaps could not pass—the required examinations for entry in the service, it being impossible to obtain eligibles.

"It is not difficult to foresee what the inevitable result of this disinclination of the best qualified men to accept permanent employment in the service must be—a result which it is believed neither Congress nor the country desires. There must be some additional inducement to retain the best men already in the service, and to cause that class of men outside to apply for entry thereto. The additional compensation contemplated by the bill under consideration will, it is believed, furnish the inducement desired; and I therefore urgently recommend its passage, amended, however, so that the new rate shall take effect at the beginning of the next fiscal year, and the period of pay be limited, as now, to that part of the year when surfmen are actively employed."

If I may be indulged, Mr. Chairman, I will give a brief sketch of the history of the development of the American Life-Saving Service now covering a period of existence exceeding the century mark by fourteen years.

The initiatory movement was the organization of a few benevolent persons of the Massachusetts Humane Society in 1786. In attempting to alleviate the miseries of shipwreck on the Massachusetts coast, small boats were built; and in 1807 the first lifeboat station was established at Cohasset. The society depended upon voluntary crews, but so much was accomplished of value that some pecuniary aid was received, as time wore on, from both State and National government.

The magnificent work of the Coast Survey begun in earnest in 1832, absorbed the resources of Congress for a decade and a half, during which period nothing was attempted in the way of life-saving except through voluntary societies. A few public vessels were, indeed, authorized in 1837 to cruise near the coast for the assistance of shipping in distress, but it was through the movement in aid of commerce which extended to the light-house system.

In 1847, $5,000 were appropriated by Congress toward furnishing light-houses on the Atlantic with the facilities for aiding shipwrecked mariners. The money, after remaining in the Treasury two years unused, was permitted to be expended by the Massachusetts society upon Cape Cod.

In the summer of 1848 the Hon. William A. Newell, then a member of the House of Representatives from New Jersey, incited by some terrible shipwrecks on the coast of that State, induced Congress, through his eloquence, to appropriate $10,000 for providing surfboats and other appliances "for the protection of life and property from shipwreck on the coast between Sandy Hook and Little Egg Harbor." During the next session a still larger appropriation was obtained. Twenty-two station houses were erected on the coasts of New Jersey and Long Island, and although no persons were paid or authorized to take charge of them, and they were manned by extemporized crews, their value in several cases of shipwreck was so great that Congress made further appropriations from year to year, and stations and lifeboats gradually multiplied.

Through the pressure of a shocking event in 1854—the loss of three hundred human lives off the New Jersey coast—a local superintendent was employed, a keeper assigned to each station, and bonded custodians placed in charge of the lifeboats, which before that time had been repeatedly stolen; but the absence of drilled and disciplined crews, of general regulations, and of energetic central administration rendered the record of the institution unsatisfactory and its benefits checkered by the saddest failures.

In 1871 Sumner I. Kimball succeeded to the head of the Revenue Marine Bureau of the Treasury Department, under charge of which were the life-saving stations. He made it his first duty to ascertain their condition. Capt. John Faunce was detailed to make a tour of inspection, and was accompanied a portion of the way by Mr. Kimball himself. The buildings were found neglected and dilapidated, the apparatus rusty or broken, portable articles had been carried away, the salaried keepers were often living at a distance from their posts, some of them too old for service and others incompetent, and the volunteer crews were in a quarrelsome temper with each other and with the coast population.

Then commenced that vigorous prosecution of reform which has crowned the humane work with unprecedented success. Making the most of slender appropriations, and in the face of perpetual discouragements, this one man, the chief of a bureau, pushed on by philanthropic impulses and guided by unerring judgment, brought a complete and orderly system into effect. It was not the work of a day, nor of a year. It required patience, sagacity, and rare powers of organization and government. He knew no office hours, working day and night at what many were pleased to consider a hopeless task. In his brain originated the idea of guarding the entire coasts of the nation through the planting of a chain of fortresses to be garrisoned by disciplined conquerors of the sea. It is a matter of public record, and generally known to the country, that through his practical devotion to the cause this has been so nearly accomplished.

In reorganizing what there was of the service he prepared a code of regulations for its absolute control. The duties of every man employed were minutely defined. The lazy, the careless, and the unworthy were dismissed, and men chosen to fill their places with sole reference to integrity and professional fitness. Politics was abolished; that is, experts in the surf were regarded as of more consequence to drowning victims than voters of any particular political ticket. The station houses were repaired and increased in numbers as fast as the means afforded by Congress would allow; the appliances for life-saving were restored and improved from year to year through the best inventions and discoveries in this or any other country, and a rigid system of inspection and of patrol was inaugurated.

The record of the first season on the New York and New Jersey coasts, where the new system first went into actual operation, showed that every person imperiled by shipwreck was saved. Consequently a commission, consisting of Mr. Kimball, Captain Faunce, and Capt. J. H. Merryman, of the Revenue Marine, surveyed in 1873, by order of Congress, the vast and varied coasts of the oceans and lakes, investigating personally the characteristics of the dangerous localities, and holding consultations with underwriters, shipowners, captains of vessels, and veteran surfmen.

The report of this commission placed before Congress a minute account of the disasters to vessels on every mile of coast for the previous ten years; a bill based upon it, prepared by Mr. Kimball, became a law June 20, 1874. It provided for the extension of the field of this great national work of humanity; for the bestowal of medals of honor upon persons risking their lives to save others, and empowered the collection and tabulation of statistics of disaster to shipping which, by reference to the periodicity of marine casualties, aided in determining the points most needing protection, and in various other ways benefited both Government and maritime interests.

No history, be it ever so condensed, of the development of this noble service would be complete without grateful mention of Hon. S. S. Cox, of New York, to whose generous, humane heart and impulse, untiring efforts and energy, and singular abilities and eloquence the service owes its recognition by the Federal Government, its incorporation into our system as a fixed institution, and its introduction into the hearts of a grateful people.

From the little start the service received in 1871, through an appropriation of $10,080 secured by Mr. Cox, what immense results have followed!

We have to-day distributed along our ocean, Gulf, and lake coasts 265 stations, manned by gallant men, whose courage, skill, and humanity have made the service not alone honorable and humane, but have ingratiated it in the hearts of the people, where it is cherished as one of the richest fruits of an enlightened Government. I have before me the annual report of General Superintendent Kimball for the year ending June 30, 1899, and that I may illustrate the beneficence of the service I will quote from its pages.

There were 265 stations embraced in the Life-Saving Establishment at the close of the fiscal year. Of this number, 193 were situated on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, 56 on the coast of the Great Lakes, 15 on the Pacific coast, and 1 at the falls of the Ohio, Louisville, Ky.

The number of disasters to documented vessels within the field of station orperations during the year was 428. There were on board these vessels 3,903 persons, of whom 56 were lost. The estimated value of the vessels was $6,072,635 and that of their cargoes $2,032,005, making the total value of property imperiled $8,104,640. Of this amount $6,261,900 was saved and $1,842,740 lost. The number of vessels totally lost was 72.

In addition to the foregoing there were also 294 casualties to undocumented craft—sailboats, rowboats, etc.—carrying 671 persons, 7 of whom perished. The value of property involved in these instances is estimated at $138,535, of which $129,285 was saved and $9,250 lost.

Seven hundred and fifty-one persons received succor at the stations, the number of days' relief furnished aggregating 1,460.

From the foregoing it appears that 63 lives were lost within the scope of the service during the year, a larger number, with a single exception, than in any year during the last two decades. Forty-four persons perished in one district, embracing only the coast of Massachusetts, and one-half of this number were on board vessels which were destroyed on islands and outlying rocks in the night when they could not been seen from the mainland, and the first knowledge of which was gained from wreckage coming ashore. In a word, this overwhelming loss of life on a coast long noted for frightful disasters was the result of a single stroke inflicted in the dark, which was so sudden that it could not be parried, and so powerful that its awful effects could not be mitigated. This almost unprecedented tempest wrought its direst effects between Gay Head and Point Allerton. Careful investigation of all the circumstances of each casualty shows that the station crews there were uniformly vigilant, brave, and efficient.

During the following February another extremely severe blizzard prevailed along the Atlantic coast from Texas to Massachusetts, but in marked contrast as to results with that of November, principally because its progress northward covered several days (the 8th to the 15th), and, therefore, afforded shipmasters ample warning and time to seek harbors of refuge. While it prevailed, however, the station crews rendered assistance to 28 vessels carrying 230 persons, of whom none were lost. The exacting and dangerous labors of the surfmen were performed in all cases with skill and daring.

The record of the men on the Lakes is equally worthy of commendation. Disastrous tempests occurred on those waters during October and November, 1898, involving 28 vessels and 162 persons, of whom not one perished. Indeed, during the entire season only 3 persons were lost in 263 disasters on the Lakes, comprising craft of all descriptions.

On the Pacific coast there were lost within the scope of the service only 13 lives during the entire year, and 11 of these were from a small vessel which was capsized more than a mile from land and destroyed within ten minutes.

The results of disasters to vessels of all descriptions within the scope of the service aggregate as follows:

Total number of disasters	722
Total value of property involved	$8,243,175
Total value of property saved	$6,391,185
Total value of property lost	$1,851,990
Total number of persons involved	4,574
Total number of persons lost	63
Total number of shipwrecked persons succored at stations	751
Total number of days' succor afforded	1,460
Number of vessels totally lost	72

From this tabulation it will be seen that, were we to regard the service divested of all sentiment and clothed in a cold business light, the saving of property alone would justify the annual appropriation proposed for the fiscal year, which, including $40,000 for new stations, will amount to $1,611,180, which sum will be increased by $88,330 if this amendment raising the pay of surfmen be passed.

But let us pursue this report further and we will find additional grounds for our commendation.

There were during the year 97 persons rescued from positions of danger otherwise than from vessels, who would probably have perished but for the aid of the surfmen. Of these, 25 had fallen from wharves, piers, landings and the like; 9 were bathers who were in imminent danger of drowning; 39 were rescued from dangerous places from which they were unable to extricate themselves; 10 were on outlying rocks, cribs, or points cut off from land by the rising tide; 3 were overcome by exhaustion or exposure; 5 were adrift on broken ice; 1 had broken through the ice; 1 was recovered from the water apparently drowned, but was resuscitated; 3 were rescued from a building wrecked by an explosion, and 1 was taken from a drifting raft.

Five hundred and ninety-one stranded vessels were floated off, repaired when damaged, piloted out of dangerous situations, and in similar ways assisted by the station crews. Minor assistance was also afforded to 382 vessels and small craft. One hundred and ninety-three vessels running into danger of stranding were warned off by the signals of the patrolmen, the most of them probably having been saved from serious danger or total loss.

The surfboat was used 773 times, making 1,089 trips. The self-righting and self-bailing lifeboat was used 132 times, making 163 trips. The gasoline launches at the City Point Station (Second district) were used 80 times, making 90 trips. Smaller boats were used 432 times, making 526 trips. The river life skiffs at the Louisville station (Ninth district) were used 41 times, making 97 trips. The breeches buoy was used 11 times, making 55 trips. The wreck gun was employed 17 times, firing 29 shots. The heaving stick was used 28 times.

There were landed by the surfboat, 949 persons; by the lifeboat, 111; by the gasoline launches, 184; by the river life skiffs, 162; by other station boats, 151, and by the breeches buoy, 54.

In addition to the foregoing, there were miscellaneous rescues as follows: 11 persons, by wading out into the surf; 6 persons, by a ladder from shore to a stranded vessel; 6 persons, by a line from a sinking vessel to a pier; 2 persons, by means of heaving lines, and 1 person was hauled through the surf on the whip line when the hawser was not set up.

I wish I had the time to enter upon the deeds of heroism and mercy which have distinguished the service during the past year. I earnestly recommend to all the reading of the general superintendent's report. It does one good in these days of commercial activity and absorption to be reminded that there are men in our midst whose lives are devoted to works of humanity, valor, and self-sacrifice, not less disinterested and distinguished than the deeds of the heroes of history. Well has it been said that this service "has no peer in the world for its effective work, and no paragon in the history of nations for its inspiration."

The assertion is made boldly. Departmental records nowhere show such sure and satisfactory progress in all right directions as are exhibited in "the short and simple annals" of the Life-Saving Service. We can pause with profit to ourselves to consider for a moment, in summary form, the statistics of the service from the first little appropriation in 1871 to the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1899; and were it given to us to read between the figures chronicling these disasters and values and rescues of human life and property, if our imagination could but carry us to those awful scenes of self-sacrifice and heroism—could we see them even reenacted upon the stage of our fancy, though divested of the horror of reality—how deep would be our sense of reproach that so worthy an object and so noble a cause had received at our hands such scant consideration. Yet how our hearts would throb and swell with pride, tempered with gratitude, that through governmental foresight such deeds were made possible, and not less would be our joy that we had ever ready men to respond to humanity's call.

These figures speak for themselves:

GENERAL SUMMARY

Of disasters which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations from November 1, 1871 (date of introduction of present system), to close of fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

Total number of disasters	11,170
Total value of vessels	$119,540,500
Total value of cargoes	$40,888,099
Total value of property involved	$160,428,599
Total value of property saved	$132,021,447
Total value of property lost	$37,407,152
Total number of persons involved	85,916
Total number of lives lost	1908
Total number of persons succored at stations	14,627
Total number of days' succor afforded	36,659

Mr. Chairman, the saving of human life up to the present time by and through this service doubtless reaches the great total of 40,000; tens are lost to-day where thousands perished before the service was instituted. In view of this magnificent result can we be indifferent to our duty by failing to give more adequate pay to the men employed in it. For one I would go further even now, and place upon the pension list the families of those who have lost father and husband in line of duty in their ceaseless struggle for humanity with storm and sea. I would likewise retire, with a suitable provision for their comfort, those who have become disabled in the service through the service, or who have served faithfully for twenty years, if retirement is then desired.

The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] will fix the pay of all surfmen at $65 per month, the amount provided in my bill (H. R. 7436). It seems to me that the amendment is most opportune; that this is the time and place to secure this desired and deserved legislation. Delay may defeat it. My interest lies in the accomplishment of this act of justice. I care not for the hollow honor which for a few short moments may fall to my lot if my bill becomes a law as an independent measure. It is the end and object that absorbs my attention. Cheerfully do I second the amendment, and with joy will I see it enacted into law, that these sturdy men, who year after year are called upon to brave dangers before which the stoutest heart might quail, and brave them calmly and coolly, without the stimulus of excitement which in battle carries men along—oftentimes making fictitious heroes of natural cowards—may be encouraged in their noble work by this act of simple justice on the part of Congress.

There is nothing fictitious in the heroism of the life savers. They are aware of the possible consequences of their every act. They take desperate chances, and they know that they are taking them. They deliberately go forth to save the lives of others, well knowing they are imperiling their own; and this without the hope of adequate reward, whether they succeed or whether they fail and render up their lives in generous heroic endeavor.

It is to these surfmen who patrol our coast by night and day in all weather that we owe the wonderful work our statistics show. They are the men behind the guns.

The poet has sung of the glories of death for country; men rush to conflict and die under the inspiration of martial music; nations vote pensions and decorations to the heroes of battlefield and war. Then, why not pension these heroes of peace, who, seeing or hearing a brother man, though a stranger, in the struggle and despair of death, plunge into the dark and roaring waters to launch a boat upon a sea that threatens to overwhelm, knowing not who clings to that tottering aerie in the rigging of the doomed ship, expecting no reward save the consciousness that duty expected of them by the service has been done, the duty of manhood to itself?

How often have these attempts failed; how often have the brave men rendered up their lives for an unknown brother; how many mothers, widows, and children are crying aloud in their destitution for our help? Does not this Government owe these afflicted ones some consideration? These keepers and crews should be brought under a pension system. Of them Superintendent Kimball says:

"These crews are composed of poor fishermen who live scantily and find their main means of support in the slender pay they receive as surfmen. Grown old or disabled in the service, they sink into penury or dependence, and when they lose their lives in disasters in attempting to save others, or when they die in the course of nature, their death, after all their valuable and heroic service, leaves their families in poverty and want. It should be borne in mind that they are the very flower of their class—hardy and able seamen, dexterous and courageous, matchless in managing boats in heavy seas and in the perilous neighborhood of wrecks, and of such approved integrity that the property of mariners and passengers, and the cargoes of vessels saved by their efforts, suffer no loss at their hands."

The statistics I have referred to show thousands of lives and vast amounts of property saved by their exertions, and these exertions, laborious in themselves, are often made at the peril of their own existence.

It should be conceded that the right of sailor and soldier to pension is equally theirs, and that when age or infirmity has come upon them, or when they surrender life in the line of their duty, what they have done and suffered for others to the nation's honor and glory should be remembered to them and theirs by a grateful nation. The nation's gratitude should likewise be expressed to keepers and crews disabled in the discharge of duty, and to the widows and orphans of those who perish in attempts at rescue, by extending to them the benefits of a pension system.

I have in mind a case which seems to me particularly pathetic. It is but one of many, but will serve to illustrate the point I hope to make. It is that of a man who served some ten years in a volunteer crew of life savers on Long Island before the inauguration of the present system, and who for thirty years last past has been the keeper of the Potunk Station. Old age is now upon him. He was ordered some months ago to present himself for examination as to his physical condition. He did so. The following official note tells the tale:

DIVISION OF APPOINTMENTS, TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1899.

SIR: The certificate of medical inspection in your case having established the fact that by reason of your age you do not possess sufficient activity and physical endurance to properly perform the duties attached to your position, you are informed that your resignation will be accepted if tendered immediately.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

Mr. FRANKLIN C. JESSUP,
Care of General Superintendent
United States Life-Saving Service.

I supplement this cold, concise, heartless official announcement with a letter received from Mr. Jessup some little time ago:

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE, THIRD DISTRICT.
West Hampton Beach, January 14, 1900.

Hon. TOWNSEND SCUDDER, M. C.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly let me know what action has been taken regarding a retired list for the Life-Saving Service?

It is five months since I was relieved from said service. I find that my long term—thirty years—as keeper of Potunk life-saving station, to the neglect of all other business, has completely unfitted me for any other business. While I can do many things, I can not find anyone to employ me. I find no business man wants to employ an old man.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, very respectfully,

FRANKLIN C. JESSUP,
Ex-Keeper Potunk Life Saving Station.

P. S.—Please remember me to Mr. Rose.

How does the story told by these two letters impress this House? How does it impress the generous people of this land? Forty years of solitude on a lonely beach, separated from home, family, and friends; forty years of tramping up and down the shores, weary miles in season of storm and dangers; forty years of tension and anxiety, with eye and ear strained for sight or sound of human distress; forty years of faithful service, sacrifice, danger, daring, and heroism; forty years of struggle and fierce combat with wind and wave, to defeat their cruel harvest of death, and then the book is closed—"By reason of your age you do not possess sufficient activity and physical endurance" (for forty years more, perhaps); therefore "your resignation will be accepted if tendered immediately."

Not a month, a week, a day, but immediately! Mr. Chairman, these men render services as taxing and as honorable as ever performed by soldier on field of battle. Their field is ever one of danger and struggle; their battle is ever on, and life itself is given up in the discharge of their duty, yet when age overtakes them, when they fall in harness on their tempestuous battlefield, they are lost and forgotten, without provision or shelter—the discarded, worn-out, faithful servants of an ungrateful people. Let us wipe out this stain, purge ourselves of this ignominy. Let this great nation set an example to her children by suitably providing for those who have added so greatly to her honor and glory, who have been faithful to the trust she reposed in them, faithful to her and to humanity. [Loud applause.]

The Results of Three Years of Republican Supremacy.

HON. JOSEPH W. BABCOCK,
OF WISCONSIN.
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, May 28, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 9836) to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no brighter page in our national history than that which tells the story of the Administration of William McKinley. Its achievements at home and abroad have won new laurels for the Republican party. President Lincoln guided the country through four years of civil war to an honorable peace. He gave freedom to 4,000,000 slaves. He led the contending sisterhood of States to a union that nothing can sever. He belongs to the nation as no man but Washington had belonged to it, and it was the Republican party that gave him to the nation.

President McKinley has carried forward the work of the immortal Lincoln. Under him we have fought a successful foreign war; we have added millions of square miles to our territory; we have firmly established the national credit by placing the country upon the gold basis; our bonds command a higher premium and pay a lower rate of interest than those of any European power; our domestic and export trades have expanded so rapidly that production can scarcely keep up with the demand; our mechanics are working overtime, and an era of universal prosperity has followed the bitter years of depression under the last Democratic Administration.

We are approaching the time when the American people must choose their leader for the next four years. The same candidates are before them as in the last Presidential election. Which will they choose? Shall it be William McKinley, whose wise, firm guidance has gained us those victories of peace and war to which I have alluded; or shall it be William Jennings Bryan, who stands for a debased currency, for a cowardly foreign policy, for a surrender of the outlying possessions, won by the skill and prowess of our brave soldiers and sailors, and for principles and policies that would substitute anarchy and ruin for the reign of law and order? I can not doubt the answer that the people will give to these questions next November. They will triumphantly reelect President McKinley by an increased majority; and they will decree the continued Republican control of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have recited briefly the brilliant achievements of these three years of Republican rule. I purpose now to review, in some little detail, the work of the several departments of administration that has contributed to this result.

Mr. Bryan's chief attacks have always been against the financial policy of the Republican party. His argument has been that its opposition to free coinage of silver would make money scarce, depress prices and wages, stifle industry and enterprise, and make the poor poorer than ever. Let us look at the facts.

At the end of the third year of President Cleveland's last term the money in circulation was, in round numbers, a billion and a half of dollars. At the end of President McKinley's third year it was $2,000,000,000. In the third year of Cleveland the circulation of money was $21.53 per capita of the population. In the third year of McKinley it is $26.12 per capita. This does not look like making money scarce. At the end of President Cleveland's third year the gold circulation was $490,000,000; but at the end of President McKinley's third year it was $786,000,000, an increase of nearly three hundred millions.

Two-thirds of the increase of circulation has been in gold, the metal that Mr. Bryan said would make money scarce and throw the country into poverty and decay. To complete the refuation of Mr. Bryan's prophecies, there was nearly $75,000,000 more of silver circulation at the end of President McKinley's third year that at the end of President Cleveland's third year of his second term.

Let us now turn to Mr. Bryan's prediction of the stagnation of industry if his "16 to 1" policy was not accepted by the people. The figures of our domestic industry as a whole are not accessible. They are not necessary, as every intelligent man knows whether or not labor is plenty, wages good, and agricultural prices away above the quotations of three years ago.

For our foreign trade we have the figures. During the first three years of Cleveland's second Administration our imports amounted to $2,898,000,000; during the first three years of McKinley's Administration our imports amounted to $2,296,000,000, or under the Dingley tariff act, during prosperous times and great activity, our imports were $602,000,000 less than during the same period of the Cleveland Administration, when the country was filled with distress and want.

Now glance for a moment at our exports. During the first three years of the second Cleveland Administration our exports amounted to $3,578,000,000, and during the first three years of the McKinley Administration our exports amounted to $3,828,000,000—a difference of $250,000,000 in our favor in exports, and a difference of $602,000,000 in our favor in imports, which, added together, make a grand total of $852,000,000 in our favor during the three years of Republican rule.

During the first three years of the second Cleveland Administration our excess of exports over imports was $679,000,000; during the first three years of the McKinley Administration our excess of exports over imports was $1,531,000,000, showing the same results, or a net gain of $852,000,000. This condition is the result of a wise tariff law and the pronounced position of the Republican party on the money question, which has given confidence to all of our great manufacturing enterprises.

But I have not yet told the brightest part of the story. That part consists in the figures concerning our export of manufactures. Manufacturing implies skilled labor, skilled labor means high wages, and high wages mean a good demand for all the products of agriculture. In the three years of President Cleveland to which I have so often referred, our exports of manufactures amounted to $568,000,000, but in the three years of President McKinley they amounted to $998,000,000, an average gain of $143,000,000 per year.

A gratifying fact in the increase of our importations is that nearly one-half now consists of materials for use in our domestic manufactures. These crude materials do not compete with our own products; but, on the contrary, give increased employment to labor engaged in producing for the home market, and enable us to send our manufactures out into the markets of the world.

The first act of President McKinley after his inauguration was to assemble Congress in special session to provide revenue for the Government by a tariff that would not pauperize our own working people. The Democratic tariff of 1894 had so cut the revenue that we were in the humiliating and hurtful position of borrowing money to carry on the Government in a time of peace. A treasury that should have been full was empty, and loan after loan was syndicated in Wall street at huge profits to the money lenders.

A bankrupt government makes a bankrupt people, and that was just the condition that the Republican party found existing on its return to power three years ago. The "tariff for revenue only" had driven away the steady, growing revenue that was coming in under the McKinley tariff of 1890, and the promises of abundant employment, good wages, and large export of American manufactures had turned to empty performance.

Just eleven days after his inauguration President McKinley had both Houses of Congress in session, and sixteen days later the House sent to the Senate the Dingley tariff bill. The special message of the President had called for a bill that would supply ample revenues for ordinary expenses; that would pay the interest and reduce the principal of the debt, largely increased under the Democratic Administration, and that would insure the full and prompt payment of liberal pensions to the survivors, widows, and orphans of the civil war.

It called for a bill that would preserve the home market to our own producers; that would revive and increase manufactures, relieve and encourage agriculture, extend domestic and foreign commerce, and "render to labor in every field the useful occupation, the liberal wages, and the adequate rewards to which skill and industry are justly entitled." I quote the very words of Mr. McKinley in order to ask if those very demands have not been most bountifully fulfilled.

By aid of the Dingley tariff, Mr. Speaker, we have supplied ample revenues to the Government; we have paid the interest and provided for the reduction of the national debt; we have paid prompt and liberal pensions without oppression of the taxpayers; we have preserved the home market, revived and enlarged manufactures and commerce, rescued agricultural industry from its depression, and opened to labor of every kind its adequate reward.

When the schedules of the Dingley tariff were in preparation, the revenue experts came with tables and figures showing that a customs revenue of half a million dollars a day would be needed, but they confessed that they could not quite see how it was to be obtained without sacrificing some of our home industries, or fettering our manufacturing export trade by restrictive duties on its imported materials. Well! The Dingley tariff is producing considerably more than its required half a million of revenue a day, and no sacrifice has been made of home industry or of the export trade. The explanation is simple—we Republicans believed that the energy and enterprise of the people would supply the Government with revenue and themselves with home and foreign markets if we removed from their path the obstacles that experience had shown to lie in the Democratic tariff act.

The Wilson tariff of 1894 professed to be, above all things, "a free raw material" tariff for the encouragement of our manufacturing export trade. Yet our largest yearly export of manufactures under it was less than $230,000,000; and now, four years after the high-water mark of the Wilson tariff, our yearly export of manufactures is touching the $400,000,000 mark under the Dingley tariff.

This year, too, we are importing $300,000,000 worth of manufacturers' materials, a large part of which is to be sold abroad, after paying wages to American skilled labor. Mr. Bryan and his party denounced the Dingley tariff as calculated to destroy our foreign trade and to shut our industries in upon our own resources. But our exports to Great Britain and Germany, our largest customers, have increased materially, and so has the whole volume of our trade with them; as also with Canada, Italy, Japan, China, and other countries.

The Dingley tariff and the currency act—I yoke them together as the two great achievements of peace by our Republican Administration—a boundless industry, and a sound currency with which to conduct it. Not only a sound currency, but, as incident to it, the putting into circulation of many millions of dollars at a time when trade and commerce are active and need money in circulation; the saving of greater millions by a reduction of the rate of interest in the debt; the payment of $25,000,000 of old bonds; the substitution of long-time bonds, at a lower rate of interest, for the short-time bonds, calling for a higher interest rate; the facilities thereby afforded for many years for an increasing bank circulation, and the time gained thereby for eventually providing an equally secure but more flexible bank currency, when the national debt shall all have been paid.

I ask where would now be our finances, our revenues, our domestic industry, and our foreign trade if the Democracy had succeeded in 1896? Where will those great interests, each and all, be three years hence if a Democratic President and a Democratic House of Representatives should be elected next November?

President McKinley took over from his predecessor an unsettled controversy with Spain and did his best, though vainly, to bring it to a peaceful and honorable close.

We began the Spanish war with an army of less than 29,000 officers and men, and ended it four months later with an organized and fully equipped force of nearly ten times that number. This means that more than a quarter of a million of capable men were withdrawn from the farm, the mine, the factory, the store, and office, and the various other haunts of industry and civil life, and converted into marching and fighting units, with no other thought or purpose than to uphold the honor of the flag. It means that our wealth, our credit, our resources in hands and brains, our machinery and material of every sort, were turned with incredible swiftness and profusion from their ordinary uses to the painful but necessary exigencies of war.

I say nothing now of the patriotism, the self-sacrifice, the disinterestedness, the public spirit and generosity, among all ranks and classes of our people, whether individually or collectively, that marked their response to the trumpet call of war. The theme is too large if not too high for the present occasion. For the same reason I say nothing of the spontaneous rushing together of the North and the South, as though they never had been apart; of the Blue and the Gray, as though they never had been antagonistic colors; of the veterans who had worn those colors; and, more than all, of the sons and daughters of those veterans, who, in sight of an aroused and united country, forgot all they had heard about the division of that country before their time.

The war with Spain, Mr. Speaker, was a people's war, and well our people did their part in it. But the vote of the people in November, 1896, had placed upon William McKinley the duty, in 1898, of avoiding that war if it could be honorably averted; of preparing for it when it could no longer be avoided with honor, and of conducting it to that speedy and successful conclusion which the popular feeling and confidence demanded. And William McKinley did not fail, or ever falter, in any point of that duty. Like his great predecessor, Abraham Lincoln, he personally associated himself with every phase of the war, and in less than four months drove from the Western Hemisphere one of the oldest of the world's military powers, that had been intrenched here for more than four hundred years.

In the "war room" at the White House during the four months of hostilities we had an example of the intelligent and thorough way in which he met the grave responsibilities of his place. Into that room came all the information upon which the plans for the shifting phases of the war were based; out from it went the instructions under which those plans were executed. If, before the end came, the President looked aged and worn, as the newspapers of the time tell us, what better proof could we ask of the reality of the strain under which he lived and the fidelity with which he met the exigencies of that strain?

Even in times of peace the constitutional post of Commander in Chief is no sinecure; what it is in war we know from the recorded experiences of Presidents Madison, Polk, and Lincoln. Our system of government is so organized that when the country is at war the President is the one man of the multitude engaged in the direction of the war who is compelled to view and to act within the whole arena of the contest. His political functions, likewise, are more arduous in a time of war than in peace.

Scarcely more than a month after the outbreak of hostilities the Administration was ready with an expedition designed to "capture the garrison at Santiago and assist in capturing the harbor and fleet of the enemy." Up to that time it had looked as if the fixed military problem was to form and land in the late autumn an army large and strong enough to capture the powerful and well-defended garrison at Habana. But it is always the unexpected that happens. Cervera's fleet had gone into the harbor at Santiago, and its capture or destruction there would apparently leave the enemy without means of sustaining the great army at Habana.

That we were ready so soon to take advantage of the sudden opportunity was fortunate, and we owe it to the wisdom and energy of the Administration that we were ready. In two weeks from the time that the preparatory order was given, thirty-three transports, collected and fitted with extraordinary dispatch, left Tampa with 815 officers and 16,000 men, together with their equipage, and eight days afterwards were landed at Daiquiri. They advanced 8 miles to Siboney, to establish a base of supply.

Two days after the landing a cavalry brigade, acting as infantry, stormed and carried the trenches at La Guasima; a fight that brought renown to the white and colored regulars, the rough riders, and some of the gallant commanders, living and dead. Just a week later the strong position of El Caney was carried by assault after a struggle lasting from early morning until afternoon. Then came the crowning victory at San Juan Hill, which gave our forces command of Santiago. Negotiation then took the place of fighting, and on the 14th of July, three weeks after the landing, the campaign ended by the surrender of the Spanish forces, numbering 23,000 officers and men, on terms that comported at once with American interests, the honor of a brave enemy, and the dictates of humanity.

To estimate the importance of this Santiago campaign, we must remember that the Spanish forces in all Cuba numbered 11,000 officers and 215,000 men, including regulars, volunteers and guerrillas. What our forces did in three weeks, with much less than 20,000 officers and men, against an eighth part of the Spanish army, saved us the necessity of sending ten times the number to Cuba, and spending as many months as we spent weeks, in making a decisive impression. What we were spared we can now better appreciate by contrasting our experience with that of the large British army in South Africa, compelled to divide its force, as we should have been, against a multitude of positions, defended by inferior numbers, but favored by the nature of the country and their better knowledge of local conditions.

It was the result of the Santiago campaign that enabled us to spare 11,000 officers and men for the expedition to the far Philippines and to hoist our flag over Manila so early as the 13th day of August—less than four months after the outbreak of war. The same result gave us the means of sending 17,000 officers and men to Porto Rico, garrisoned by an equal number of Spanish troops, and of ending the war there within three weeks of the first landing by a part of the force. That the Spanish war was rushed on our part is true, and the rush caused some confusion and hardship, but never in the history of the world have such great results been achieved in so short a time and with so small a loss of human life. It is to the credit of President McKinley and his Administration that, having carefully studied the prospect, they took the unavoidable risks of an energetic policy.

Immediately after the preliminaries of peace were signed, the discharge of some 30,000 men, temporarily added to the Regular Army, began, as did the muster out of the volunteers. Exclusive of regulars, 64,000 officers and men were brought home from Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines, and new garrisons organized and sent to those stations. In Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines the Army has been obliged to administer the civil government. Customs, internal revenue, taxes, navigation, public schools, sanitation, road building, courts of justice, police, and local governments and functions of every sort have been in its charge.

By means of the telegraph, the telephone, and flash and flag signaling, and the building and management of nearly 7,000 miles of new lines, the Army has kept up communication for itself, the people, and the authorities at Washington. Army medicine and surgery have served both the troops and the local population. Among our troops the rate of mortality from disease was less than 26 in the thousand, scarcely more than half the rate of the civil war. Ocean transport service is a new thing to our Army administration, yet 300,000 persons have been transported without loss or serious discomfort, and at this moment our Army transport fleet supplies the model for the world.

At the outbreak of the war our seacoast ordnance consisted of 63 guns and 88 mortars. During the short time that the war lasted these were doubled, and 25 of the principal harbors mined. Seacoast fortification is still going on, and our chief harbors are already fairly secure. The troops in camp and field were armed and accoutered as fast as organized, some 250,000 complete sets of infantry equipments and 26,000 complete sets of horse equipments being turned out within a hundred days.

More surprising was the creation of 30 mounted field batteries of six guns each, with all their equipments, without using more than half the capacity of the public and private ordnance plants for that kind of work. The expeditions that went to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines took with them a supply of maps and of military, geographical and statistical information that proved remarkably accurate and serviceable, and reminds us, by contrast, of the way in which a British army has been thrown into South Africa, to find out, at its own cost, nearly everything that should have been known beforehand.

The Spanish war and its resultant native revolt in the Philippines have cast upon the military department the work of enlisting and organizing 260,000 volunteers, of whom 225,000 have been discharged, paid off, and sent home. For the Regular Army 100,000 men have been enlisted, of whom 34,000 have been discharged, paid, and sent home. For each of the 360,000 men enlisted and the nearly 260,000 discharged a written record exists, showing who he was and what he was at the time of enlistment, his physical condition when he entered the service, and his entire military history.

In addition to enlisting and recording him and keeping a record of his Army life, he has been clothed, armed, equipped, fed, lodged, paid, medically attended, and variously transported by land and sea. Multiply this record and service for each one by the whole number enlisted and discharged, and add the record and provisions made for more than 20,000 commissioned officers, and one may form some idea of the work that the military branch of the Administration has been called upon to perform.

Under the present Administration the Navy has shown itself worthy of its best traditions. The great victories of Manila Bay and Santiago, which shed undying fame upon this arm of the national defense, were not accidents, but the results of the thorough preparations of the fleets for the crucial test of war. For this preparation, this readiness to meet the supreme moment for which a navy is constructed and maintained, those who administer the affairs of the Navy should have credit.

The glory goes to our heroes who are in command afloat and to those officers and men who seized the opportunities of war to render conspicuous service; but in remembering them let us not forget those who labor without ceasing to secure the fleet in a condition of high efficiency and to place at the disposal of the commanding officers an abundance of the supplies without which the fleet is powerless.

More than a month before the Maine was destroyed in the harbor of Habana the Secretary of the Navy began to mobilize the ships of the Navy and to take such other measures as would place at the disposal of the officers in command the full power of our naval force.

Upon the passage of the bill appropriating $50,000,000 for the national defense, a board was organized for the purchase of auxiliary ships, and, after careful examination, 102 ships of various types were secured at a total cost of nearly $18,000,000. Of these vessels, all but two were merchant ships, pleasure yachts, tugs, colliers, and other craft of the commercial type, which were rapidly overhauled at the different navy-yards, and some of them provided with light-armor protection and suitably armed.

Some of these vessels were ready at the outbreak of the war, and within two months from the declaration of war all were in commission and in active service. Some were used as auxiliary war vessels, and others to supply the fleets with coal and ammunition, fresh water, and provisions. For the care of the sick and wounded the Solace was fitted out as a complete hospital, and to make repairs to vessels at sea the Vulcan was fitted as a modern machine shop. To meet the increased demands on the navy-yards the force was virtually doubled by the middle of April.

Besides the ships added to the Navy by purchase, 15 revenue cutters and 4 light-house tenders were transferred from the Treasury Department to the Navy, and 4 of the great Atlantic liners and 1 great Pacific liner were chartered. In all, 128 ships were added to the naval establishment. To man these vessels 225 officers were ordered from the retired list to active duty; 856 officers were appointed for temporary service, and the enlisted force was increased from 12,500 to over 24,000 men.

It was an enormous task, Mr. Speaker, to make all these additional ships ready for war service and secure the necessary guns for them, and to keep all the fleets supplied with coal, ammunition, and provisions. Yet this was only a part of the work which the Navy Department had in hand. For the protection of the coasts of the United States an auxiliary naval force had to be created, officered and manned by the naval militia of the United States. A coast signal service was also established, which kept our coast line from Maine to Texas under observation, to give warning of the approach of an enemy's vessel or of suspicious craft of any kind.

The operations of the Asiatic and North Atlantic squadrons are so well known that it is not necessary to speak of them in detail. We all know that their work was so well done that the power of Spain was swept from the sea, and Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, misgoverned for centuries, taken from under her dominion.

But the claims of the Administration to the approval of the people for its management of the Navy rests not alone on its war record. The upbuilding of the new Navy has gone steadily forward, and Congress has wisely and liberally cooperated in the work of materially increasing our naval strength. The entire history of naval warfare for a thousand years does not furnish any comparison to the two great naval engagements of the late war—one in Manila Bay and the other off the coast of Cuba. In these two engagements the Spanish navy was swept off of the face of the earth, with a loss on our side of only one human life. History records nothing like it, and all honor is due the American Navy.

Since the accession of President McKinley a Republican Congress has authorized the construction of 49 ships, with a total displacement of 155,480 tons. This includes 6 battle ships of the first class, 3 armored cruisers of the first class, 4 monitors, and 6 protected cruisers.

The current naval appropriation bill, as it passed this House, adds to this formidable list 2 battle ships of the first class, 3 armored cruisers of the first class, and 3 protected cruisers, with a total displacement of 90,000 tons. There have been completed and placed in commission in the same time a total of 32 vessels, with an aggregate displacement of 52,681 tons. No preceding Administration approaches this record of naval construction.

The present Administration received as a legacy from its predecessor a pension roll of some 974,000 beneficiaries, and, though death makes great havoc in the ranks of the old soldiers, the roll had grown to over 991,000 at the end of last June, the latest date for which I can find official information. The average loss to the pension roll from natural causes is about 45,000 names a year, so that the net gain of 17,000 in about two and a quarter years means that under this Administration nearly 5,000 new pensions per month have been granted.

Contrast the figures just given with those under the preceding Democratic Administration, which cut the payments by nearly $17,000,000 in its first year. In other words, while $156,000,000 had been disbursed for pensions in the last year of President Harrison, the payments fell to $139,000,000 in the first year of President Cleveland. The present fiscal year will end on the 30th of June, and there will then have been paid for pensions more than $140,000,000 in the twelve months. With 135,000 names gone from the roll since the present Administration has had charge of it, the quarterly payments for pensions equal those of the last Administration.

Including pensions granted directly by Congress, the Pension Office is now issuing new certificates to survivors and widows at the rate of 4,000 per month, and increases and increased ratings at the rate of 4,850 per month. No other country, in any period of the world's history, has had the fairness and courage of our own in doing justice to its defenders and their dependents first, and counting the cost afterwards. It is to the Republican party and Republican Administrations that the people owe the broad, generous pension policy from which we shall never depart and to which every government in Europe in which the masses have an influential voice must eventually come.

President Lincoln declared that the nation would take care of the soldiers and his dependents, and the facts and figures I have given show that the duty he foresaw and pledged the country to perform has fallen to faithful hands.

One achievement of the McKinley Administration, the importance of which is not generally known, deserves mention here. I refer to the collection from the Pacific Railway Companies of their indebtedness to the Government. This indebtedness had extended over a long term of years, and so much indulgence had been shown it that more than one-half of the $130,000,000 due was for unpaid interest. Many plans for its settlement had been before Congress at one time or another, but it was reserved for a Republican Administration, with its capacity for handling great questions, to succeed soon after its Democratic predecessor had failed.

The settlement was arranged by a commission, consisting of the Secretaries of the Treasury and the Interior, and the Attorney-General. So skillful was the management of the Government's case that within six months the sum of $124,421,607 was collected.

The names of the several corporations and the amounts paid by them are as follows:

Union Pacific, cash	$58,448,223.75
Kansas Pacific, cash	6,303,000.00
Central and Western Pacific:
Cash	11,798,314.14
Notes, amply secured	47,050,172.36
Kansas Pacific, divided; on deficiency due United States, cash	821,897.70

Since the notes for $47,050,172.36 were received by the Government, a large proportion of them have been paid.

It was alleged to the present Administration that its predecessor had consented to a proposition, advanced by the reorganization committee of the Union Pacific Railway Company, that the Union Pacific and the Kansas Pacific roads should be sold to new owners for $43,000,000, free of the public claims. This agreement was repudiated by President McKinley. The whole amount due from the Union Pacific and one-half of the amount separately due from the Kansas Pacific were consequently collected, or more than $22,700,000 in excess of the sum for which the last Democratic Administration was represented as being cheerfully willing to settle.

When we remember the enormous material benefits that have accrued to the country from the construction of these trans-continental lines of communication, and the advantage which the Government has had by way of reduced rates of transportation and service over them, the participation of the Government in the construction and maintenance of these enterprises has been fully justified.

Under President McKinley the best traditions of the State Department have been jealously preserved. Our foreign relations have been marked by vigor and robustness, but tempered always by wise and prudent counsel. The perplexing problems inseparable from a foreign war were skillfully solved, and triumphs no less important have since been won. Our trade relations with the Orient have been preserved from injury in the impending partitioning of China.

By promptly taking up the matter, and handling it with rare skill and delicacy, the Administration obtained assurances from the European countries occupying spheres of influence in China that our exports should continue to reach that market through the "open door" guaranteed to us by treaty. Through the State Department the path is thus blazed for further extension of our foreign markets. That Department is brought less into touch with the people than other departments, but its work is in some respects the most important of all.

Our ambassadors to Great Britain and the Continent have never been surpassed collectively by those representing any previous Administration. Choate at London, Porter at Paris, White at Berlin, Tower at St. Petersburg, Harris at Vienna, Draper at Rome, and Storer at Madrid form a diplomatic corps whose work would reflect credit upon the proudest nation of Europe. The great powers are always represented at Washington by some of their ablest diplomats—men who have made diplomacy a study and who devote their lives to the work. The United States have no school of diplomatic training. Our ambassadors and ministers are relieved at each change of Administration.

In few instances have they received special education for their duties; yet it is doubtful if Great Britain and the continental powers are better represented in the United States than are the United States in Europe. There is something in the American fiber—it may be the American spirit, it may be the character of our institutions, or it may be a combination of fortunate circumstances, I know not which—that makes the American the most adaptable of men. Without special training, he always rises to his opportunity. He has courage, tact, and intelligence. He may lack sometimes the courtly address and shifty methods that are associated with diplomacy, but he usually accomplishes his purpose, and he does this by methods more direct and more in keeping with the spirit of our Government.

Under the present Administration, the consular service has extended its good work in the promotion of trade. Its success has been so great that Great Britain and Germany are paying us the compliment of considering how their consular services can be made to rival our own. There is criticism of consuls and consulates here and there, and the traveling and commercial classes have not been slow to point out defects in the service; but as a whole, it reflects the spirit of the American people. Just as our industries have outstripped those of other countries, so the typical American consul has exhibited practical qualities which compensate for the lack of qualities of a more social character.

On the other hand, foreigners often complain that their consuls are overtrained; that they have been selected with reference rather to their diplomatic functions than to promoting the nterests of commerce. Our consuls are not perfect; but as a class they are keenly alive to every suggestion that may widen American markets abroad. This feature of the consular service has been made very prominent by the McKinley Administration, and there is now scarcely a corner of the world that is not being officially canvassed in behalf of American products.

The growth of manufactures in no way impairs the importance of our agricultural interests. Three years of Republican administration have added untold millions to our agricultural wealth. To bring the resources of the Government nearer to the farmer, the planter, and the stock grower, the methods of the great Department to which our agricultural interests are intrusted have been almost revolutionized under the present Administration. The subject is too large and varied for treatment in detail. I can but glance at what the Department of Agriculture has been doing these last three years.

Foreign markets for our agricultural products have been aggressively sought for and explored; producers here and consumers there have been supplied with information, opportunity, and inducement to come together; domestic consumption has been increased by merciless exposure of adulterations; crop reports, so seriously affecting prices, are now prompt and accurate, and kept from manipulation by speculators; new fruits and plants, likely to flourish and be profitable, have been liberally tested, studied, and distributed; the farmer has been warned and guarded against debased seeds and fertilizers; tobacco and sugar cultivation have received the attention which their importance demands; every part of the country has been classified according to its agricultural possibilities and advantages; the experimental stations in every section have been vitalized, and a real beginning has been made toward an economic use and reproduction of our great forest wealth.

The losses of our farmers from diseases and epidemics among horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs have been greatly reduced. Their losses from injurious affections of fruits, grains, plants, and vegetables have been reduced in a like proportion. A great extension of cattle and meat inspections has preserved and increased the home and foreign markets for live and dead stock, and enhanced the prices obtained on the farm and range. During all of the last three years ceaseless attention has been given to the great subject of the reclamation of arid lands and useless soils, and to the reseeding of those vast cattle ranges that have been eaten bare.

Weather predictions and warnings have been brought within the reach of almost every energetic farmer. He is promptly notified of untimely droughts, rains, and frosts, and the broad-gauge methods of the present Administration are shown in the carrying of these predictions and warnings into remote and sparsely settled regions of the South and West, which had been previously neglected. In these beneficent activities of this great Department of Government our island wards Cuba and Porto Rico have not been overlooked.

In the Post-Office Department rapid strides have been made, and new improvements and added facilities for rapidly handling the mails have been brought into service. The rural free delivery, that great achievement of the McKinley Administration which has brought the agricultural classes closely in touch with the great throbbing business centers of the country, is now an established fact and successful far beyond the expectation of its warmest friends.

I had the honor to advocate the establishment of the rural free-delivery system in its early stages, when the opposition to what was termed this "experiment" was pronounced and large, but to-day it is impossible for the Department to supply the demand for the extension of this system, and I believe that in the near future, nine-tenths of the rural or agricultural sections of the country will have their mail daily delivered at their doors.

This, Mr. Speaker, is only a part of the record of the Republican party. It stood at its birth for human freedom and for the largest liberty of the individual. Its corner stone was opposition to the extension of slavery. Aided by loyal Democrats, it stamped out secession, emancipated 4,000,000 of slaves, and restored the Union. It established the national banking system, it brought about the resumption of specie payments.

Its protective-tariff policy has made us the great manufacturing nation of the world, giving employment at the highest rate of wages to millions of American workingmen. It has carried to a successful conclusion the war with Spain. It has enacted financial legislation that has placed the country upon the gold basis, and firmly established our credit at home and abroad. It is essentially the party of the people. It represents every principle for which Jefferson and Jackson stood, and it is to-day, as it always has been, the party of liberty, progress, and enlightenment.

Contrast with this the record of the Democratic party. When the Republican party was born, in 1856, the Democratic party was the advocate and supporter of slavery. It opposed the national-banking system, it opposed the resumption of specie payments, and it has steadily supported every financial heresy with which the country has been confronted. It favored the payment of the national debt in greenbacks, when paper money was at a discount.

Four years ago it sought to destroy the national credit and to degrade our financial policy. It sought to recognize the so-called revolutionary government of Cuba, knowing that such recognition would embarrass, if not entirely prevent, our expulsion of Spanish rule there. Failing in this it recommended fresh issues of irredeemable paper money to defray the expenses of the Spanish war.

If placed in power it would initiate a foreign policy repugnant to the intelligence and the best interests of the people. It has no capacity for constructive legislation. Its notion of statesmanship is blind opposition to all Republican policies. The Wilson tariff act was largely responsible for the panic of 1893, which was not relieved until the eleciton of Mr. McKinley. It can not construct; it can only destroy. Its greatest strength has been to criticise, obstruct, and oppose the policy of the Republican party since its organization, seeking to defeat measures that all acknowledged wise, simply because they were Republican.

Twice only in forty years have the people placed it in power. Its occasional victories fall like a blight upon the country. They are invariably followed by distrust and confusion in business, and by policies that hamper the great industries to which the workingmen look for support, and the interests of which are inseparably connected one with another.

It is hardly conceivable that, with this record of ignorance and imbecility, the Democratic party should again be returned to power. The election of Mr. Bryan would at once check the abounding prosperity that surrounds us, and result in four years more of uncertainty, distrust, and paralysis of business. It is for the American people to decide which of the two parties they will place in power. Shall it be the Republican party, with its brilliant achievements of forty years, or the Democratic party, which has not to its credit a single act of legislation that has not been hurtful to the country?

Elections in the South.

SPEECH
HON. C. L. BARTLETT, OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 2, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the Indian appropriation bill—

Mr. BARTLETT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I undertook the day before yesterday to get an opportunity to answer some remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] with reference to my own State, and I intended on yesterday to do so, but I was not able to be present.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina has so established himself as the harlequin of this House that it is not necessary for me, where he is known or where his peculiar characteristics are known, to refute any suggestion he might make with reference to my own State. The other States that he arraigned as guilty of gross violations of the law because of election methods and election laws that exist there may take care of themselves, and are able to do so. His own State, which he maligns on the floor of this House, is ably represented and can take care of herself. The State of Mississippi has already taken care of the assaults made upon it, and the gentleman has been answered most fully.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman undertakes to call attention here to the fact that there have been unfortunate violations of the law in my own State, and undertakes to give as the reason for them that it is because of what he denounces as wrongful and outrageous election laws and election methods existing in Georgia, the gentleman, as usual, speaks without knowledge of the facts and makes statements that the facts do not warrant or bear out.

Now as to the law of Georgia, Mr. Chairman. Since Georgia got control of her own affairs in 1872, when a governor guilty of wrong and fraud upon the State fled between two suns and turned the government of the State over to her own people and to her own sons, no man has been able to truly charge upon her people a law which was wrong as to elections or to charge us with fraud at the ballot box. I challenge the gentleman from North Carolina in this House, since he has been a member, to point to a case that is sustained by the least proof or a particle of evidence that will refute what I have stated.

The gentleman who charges Georgia with being guilty of violations of law and who attributes the small vote cast in the last election to vicious election laws, which he denounces now as a member of this House, was a member of Elections Committee No. 1, which heard two cases of a contested election from the State of Georgia in the Fifty-fourth Congress. He heard the evidence and he heard the arguments; and after hearing it all he, partisan as he is, giving the utmost weight to every suggestion, to every suspicion, and to every indication that might point to fraud or wrong in elections, in order to turn Democratic members out of the House, with reason if he could, and without reason if he must, knew at the time that he made the statement with reference to the laws of Georgia that both of these cases had been heard in the committee room and that he signed his name to both reports, in which he concurred with every other member of that committee and declared that there was no suspicion of fraud in either.

And with this knowledge, Mr. Chairman, he had the effrontery to disregard the truth and make a statement that assaulted the election laws of Georgia and attempted to allege that unfortunate circumstances and crime that existed there in the past year—that lynchings that have unfortunately occurred, and not only have occurred in Georgia, but everywhere in the United States from New York to California, wherever the cause has existed—I say, when he made that statement, he knew the facts did not authorize him or sustain him in the allegation.

Mr. Chairman, no one knows better than the gentleman who now occupies the chair that these allegations are unfounded, because he was a member of the committee that investigated these cases, and as a fair and honest man, together with every other member of that committee, knows that the election laws of Georgia were fair and honest and that any complaints made against them for twenty years past were unfounded.

Mr. Chairman, we have a constitutional provision which provides the qualifications for voters, one of which provides that there shall be paid a capitation tax in order to qualify people to vote. Are we peculiar in that? I hold in my hand the law of Rhode Island, which not only imposes the tax, but makes it a crime not to pay it; and the supreme court of Rhode Island, no longer ago than November 27, 1899, declared to the legislature, when inquired about it, if such a law as that were constitutional, that it not only did not violate the Constitution of the United States, but it did not violate the constitution of Rhode Island. So the poor white voter in Rhode Island must not only pay his poll tax in order to vote; but if he does not pay it, he must go to jail. And yet the gentleman from North Carolina, with his great wisdom, with his great knowledge that he parades before the House, arraigns the State of Georgia and other States in this Union that lie south of the Potomac River for fraudulent election laws and fraudulent ballot-box methods.

Lawyer that he is, the walking encyclopedia that he claims to be, this Solomon that half knows everything, Mr. Chairman, did not call attention to a single election law or to a single case except in his own State. This apostate to the teaching and doctrines of his own people was satisfied, in order to accomplish his own purpose of reelection, or hope of election, not only to denounce his own people, but to denounce every other State of the South.

Why, Mr. Chairman, your own State is the advance agent in the laws that protect the ballot box and the intelligent people in the right to cast the ballot.

She set the first example in her Australian ballot law. She has required an educational qualification. So does Connecticut and various other States. Georgia has not yet advanced that far. She may or may not do so. But I tell you, sir, that when it comes to the laws of election and the holding of elections, the election laws of Georgia are just as fair and the holding and certification of the results just as true and honest as in the State of Massachusetts, whose honesty in respect to matters of election has not been questioned. Sir, I do not desire to criticise any one harshly, but they are in the State of Pennsylvania engaged in trying a few ballot-box stuffers, many others having fled the realm in order to escape punishment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me tell you what happened in Georgia on the 22d of December, 1899. There were but two Republican members in the house out of 175. With those exceptions, every man was a Democrat; and every man was a white man. Every man owed his place in that house to the nomination and the votes of the white Democracy of Georgia. No, sir, not altogether; for there were some in that house who owed their election as nominees of the Democratic party to the votes of colored people, who voted for them in preference to the Populist candidate.

There was introduced in that house a constitutional amendment copied after the provision of Louisiana and North Carolina. That proposition was fully debated; and on the roll call (two-thirds being required in order to pass it) there appeared in the house of representatives of the State of Georgia only three men voting to put upon the statute books of the State of Georgia a provision which would disfranchise the negro. That is public history. And on that day ministers of the gospel and other representative negroes in the city of Atlanta met together and offered up thanks to God for the action which their old masters and the sons of their old masters had taken. "We owe it," they said, "to them and to nobody else that the right of the ballot which was given to us by the Constitution of the United States has not been taken away."

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes; I am always glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. I am very much gratified to learn of the action of the State of Georgia to which the gentleman from Georgia refers. Now, does he not believe that if North Carolina, Mississippi, and other Southern States would act as generously as Georgia has done there would be less trouble in those States?

Mr. BARTLETT. Why not apply the question to Massachusetts or Connecticut or Pennsylvania?

Mr. LACEY. It is not a negro question there.

Mr. BARTLETT. Ah, my friend, these various gentlemen must take care of their own States. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in the State of Georgia we have got along with a ballot law which works no injustice to anybody. Those who pay the poll tax have the right to vote. And in the battles between the Populists and the Democrats in our State one-half of our colored voters have aligned themselves with the Democrats.

Yet the gentleman from North Carolina, with this fact of public history before him—it having been published in the newspapers of every metropolitan city in the country with conspicuous headlines that Georgia had refused to disfranchise the negro—stands on the floor of this House and denounces us as violators of the law, because, forsooth, we have, as he says, outrageous election laws.

Now, I want to call the attention of this House to an incident which happened about three years ago. The governor of Georgia was stricken and was thought to be dying. His friends stood around watching with anxious hearts to determine whether he would live or die. He was carried from the executive mansion on a stretcher to a room where a surgical operation was to be performed upon him. His wife and children had bid him good-bye. The physicians held out no hope of his recovery. The great cold waters of the sea of eternity were splashing at his feet. He could almost hear the opening of the great beyond. His surgeons laid him bare upon the table; the surgeon's knife glistened before the sufferer's eye. But at that moment he remembered that in the executive office there lay an application for the reprieve or pardon of a humble negro—a person poor and friendless—so much so that the court was obliged to appoint a lawyer to defend him. While lying there on the surgeon's table the governor called out to his secretary, "Do not forget that negro" (naming him), and he named then a period of reprieve for that old negro; and when God had spared his life that reprieve went into effect, and the sentence of the negro was commuted to a life penalty instead of death. [Applause.]

When that man was nominated again by the Democratic party, and was assailed by men who had formerly been Democrats when the banner of the Democratic party was in his hands, there marched to the polls all over that State men whose skins were black, led by men who went to the Republican convention for the last five to ten years to nominate a Republican candidate for President, men who were the trusted political friends of President McKinley, white and black in Georgia, and cast their ballots for the candidate of the Democratic party, because, Mr. Chairman, when it came to administering the law and meting out justice, the black man, without friend or help, received at the hands of the governor of Georgia consideration equal to that of any other man in the State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope I may have ten minutes more. I beg the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the House and I thank my friend from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, and it is not an interruption, I should like to say that this is a very interesting subject to me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I confess that I have been in the line of thought with the gentleman, and that Georgia has done wonders for the probable checking of wrong upon this question. Now, if it is consonant with the gentleman's ideas, will he explain why so small a vote is cast in Georgia?

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. That was the purpose of my addressing the House. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] undertook to give it as irrefutable evidence that the vote in Georgia was suppressed, and that our infamous election law, as he calls it, made the vote small, and that, therefore, people being roused to indignation because they could not vote, committed crimes, or people who could vote committed inexcusable and unnamable crimes, as he charged, upon people who could not vote. Gentlemen, I will tell you the reason for the small vote.

I had the honor of aiding in enacting as a statute of Georgia what is known as the primary election law of that State, by which the different parties hold primaries to nominate candidates. Every man of Georgia upon the floor of this House and every man who holds an office in Georgia by the election of the Democratic party does not receive that office as the nominee of any clique or county convention or court-house call. He receives that office as the choice of the majority of the Democratic party in its Democratic primaries, and every election held under the primary law is guarded by men who have to be appointed and sworn, and it is made as much a crime to vote twice or to vote illegally or doing any wrongful act at a primary election in Georgia as to do the same thing at the subsequent regular election.

Now, we have these primaries all over the State of Georgia to choose candidates from governor and Congressman down to justices of the peace and bailiffs, and the contest is in the Democratic party between the candidates for office, who go out amongst the people, discuss the questions involved, and the voters come out in the primary election and cast their ballots; and when the nominations are declared and the elections come in October or November, in an off year or a Presidential year, if you please, the people being satisfied, there being no opposition in nine cases out of ten in the counties or in the Congressional districts of the State, in those districts where there is no opposition the people do not get out to vote.

Pardon me for referring to my own case. Mr. Chairman, in 1894 I was nominated by my people in the various primaries in my district. Nearly every vote was polled, there being three candidates for the nomination. Each one of the three got out his friends, and the ballot was full, honest, and square.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my friend one further question. How extensive was the colored vote in that primary?

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, I will answer that question, speaking only for my own district. I could name the counties. In two counties in my district colored men who acknowledged that they were Democrats, or wanted to vote in the Democratic primary, and thereby declared their allegiance to the party and to support its nominees, did vote and were allowed to vote; and those we knew to be Democratic colored men, who not only supported us in the primary, but when the election came in 1894 and 1896, with nobody but the Populist candidate running against us, they voted for me as the Democratic nominee. And I have a letter which I wish I had here, that I could read, from one of the white Republicans, amongst many in my district. He not only supported me, but wrote to every county, and, though his business was a hundred miles away from the place where he was to vote, on the election day he left his business and came back to the polling place, and said to me, as he walked to the polls, "I am here to vote for you, as I promised."

So, Mr. Chairman, when the elections came in my own district, the first time, having nobody but the Populist candidate against me, the negroes did not vote, or the vote was divided. The next time we had again the Populist candidate, a man who went out amongst the negroes and undertook to array them against the whites; but the representative colored men in my district, through their executive committee, through the men who go to the national conventions, stumped that district for me with their colored friends and colored supporters and they voted for me. When 1898 came I did not have any opposition, either in my own party, the Populist party, or the Republican party, and every vote in that district that was cast, amounting to but about 3,500, it is true, was cast for me except three. So I give my own case as an answer to the gentleman's question.

My people have honored me by giving me every office I have asked for since the day I was 24 years old. I have never sought anything at their hands without receiving it, and sometimes they have been generous enough to force upon me offices that I did not seek.

They have honored me by giving me every office that I have applied for and some that I did not.

I know the importance of a full vote. My own county possesses a Democratic white registered vote of 4,500. I sat down and wrote to every registered Democratic voter on that list and begged him to come out and cast his ballot, stating to him that the smallness of our vote was a matter of criticism by the opposition. I sent a printed appeal with a ticket with my name upon it, begging them to come out and vote. Out of a registered Democratic vote of 4,500 I received 1,000 votes. One thousand men only went to the polls, not because they objected to me, but when I met them on the street and asked "Why did not you vote?" the reply always was: "You have no opposition, and it is not necessary for me to vote."

When I did have opposition, Mr. Chairman, they closed their stores, they shut up their houses, they quit their business, and not a man went back until he had cast his ballot. When I did not have any opposition I could not by the most earnest appeals induce them to come out and vote. The reason the small vote is cast is because a nomination by a white Democratic primary settles the election in every district almost, and opposition has not existed except in rare instances by the Republicans and in some instances by the Populists, and wherever there is opposition by the Populists one-half of the negroes vote with the white Democrats.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That, I suppose, would show that the colored vote is getting to be quite intelligent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Wait a minute.

Mr. GRIGGS. We educate them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Here is something by the smartest and most intelligent negro I know. Here is a statement by Booker Washington about the negro, and here is what he says about the governor of North Carolina. Let us see what he says:

Is there any reason why the negro in the South should oppose the Southern man in politics? Unconsciously we seem to have gotten the idea into our blood and bones that we are only acting in a manly way when we oppose Southern white men with our votes. * * * In some way, by some method, we must bring the race to the point where it will cease to feel that the only way for it to succeed is to oppose everything suggested or put forth by the Southern white men. * * * I believe there are thousands of white Democrats in North Carolina who are 50 per cent better friends to the negro than Governor Russell, and I see no necessity in continuing to follow Governor

Russell, who has no power to protect, or if he has the power, does not exercise it, rather than those other white men who can protect us if we cease to continually and forever oppose them.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I trespass a little more on the time of the committee?

Mr. LITTLE. I hope that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed ten minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Georgia be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. What I have said has been with reference to my own district. I prefer rather to speak of it than those of my colleagues, but it is the same with their districts as it was with mine. In the primary that we had, where there were candidates for all the county offices, I had 12,700 votes cast for me, and that was because there were candidates running for every office.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. What was the population of your district?

Mr. BARTLETT. One hundred and sixty-five thousand, I think.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Counting 1 vote to 5 of a family, there were 33,180 voters.

Mr. BARTLETT. And 26,000 registered.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. You received 3,008 votes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. And there were three against you?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Do you know who they were? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. They were Prohibition Populists, extreme upon the subject of the sale of liquor and equally extreme on the subject of Populism in the South. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. And they are against you because you are not a Prohibitionist. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say in answer to some of these things that have been said with reference to lynchings in the South and in Georgia, I shall not refer to the conditions generally. I have taken pains to investigate the matter, and I do not want to offend anybody; I do not want to be understood as criticising other States. God knows that I would repeat every day that grand prayer that we repeat from the prayer book every Sunday when we go to church: "From all envy and hatred and malice, good Lord deliver us;" and I would commend it to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], if he ever has an opportunity to enter the portals of a church, to ask forgiveness for the wrong he has done his own country. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, here we are. In my own town of 40,000 people there was a case where a poor, helpless white woman had been assaulted, not by a negro, but by a white man. He was arrested and put in jail, and in that community a public meeting was held, and nobody could stem their indignation; they broke the jail open and carried him out and lynched him. He was a white man. They might have done that thing, and doubtless would have done it, if his skin had been black. Lynchings not only occur in the South, but in the West, in the North, in New Jersey, in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Ohio, in Michigan, and in many other States.

I have here gathered accounts of lynchings that have occurred in all these States; and whether it occurred in the cold climate of New York or Maine, or whether in the cold climate of Minnesota or Michigan, whether it occurred in that State from which the Presidents have come of late—the State of Ohio—one touch of humanity makes all white men kin. [Applause.] No State or community is free from lynchings or mob violence when the honor of their homes and the virtue of their wives and daughters are assaulted. Their homes, their daughters and wives, the neighbors' daughters and wives and their virtue are to be sacred and not to be subjected to criticism because you can not find a cold law that will bridle and check the hot temper of fathers and brothers, whether they live in Ohio or live in Georgia.

Another instance which occurred since this Congress has been in session. A white lady on her way home was waylaid by a colored brute. We do not know whether he committed any wrong or outrage except murder. Her throat was cut, her head beaten into a jelly, and she was thrown into the river, where her body lay until, in the course of nature, decay made it float to the top. They found the murderer; they traced it to him; they put him in jail in that county, the principal county in the district I have the honor to represent, and in a city in the State of Georgia tried him on the 19th day of December by a white jury. He was defended by my own law partner, appointed by the court, for the man did not have a dollar in the world—defended ably too, so much so as to evoke for the attorneys the thanks of the court and of the law-abiding people; and to-day his case is in the Supreme Court, where they are exhausting every remedy in his behalf.

I give you the two cases, one where a white fiend outraged a white woman and was lynched by my people, in violation of law, if you please, and a negro brute who murdered a white woman ten years afterwards, and was tried and convicted by law. I ask gentlemen on that side of the House to listen not with censure; we ask your sympathy. We know if you had these things existing in your community you would need ours; and you would get it, and not the carping criticism that we received at the hands of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a number of instances of lynchings in States other than the South which I will not quote, because it will do no good or serve no good purpose; but I want to say this: The South has had great trials and tribulations. We helped found, organize, and build up this great country. Our people in every war from the Revolution down have sought with arms, with their treasure, and her sons to uphold the liberty of our people and the banner of our country. It has been declared by the President of the United States, himself a Federal soldier, that the time had come when these animosities, thank God, should be banished forever in the graves of our soldiers who fought together at San Juan and various places where we battled with the foreign foe. But, Mr. Speaker, if all this does not prove to you, if what our representative men state and the facts do not bear out what I have said, if this does not convince you that we are determined to solve this terrible problem which is put upon us in God's own time to suit our judgment, our duty to God and man and our families and to this great Government, we can not help it.

To those who extend to us the sympathy, forbearance, and patience that we may be entitled to by reason of the condition of affairs that places upon us these great problems for our solution, we thank you. To those who believe what the gentleman from North Carolina has said, that we are vicious violators of the law, that we maintain our supremacy of law and order by vicious election methods and by violation of the law, we have to say we leave you, we leave him, to the calm indifference of our contempt. [Applause.]

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has but one minute left.

Mr. LINNEY. I was not present during his criticisms of me, and I want to ask him a question. Will he tell the House why it is that in the State of Texas, a Southern State, where there are probably as many negroes as there are in Georgia, that there are no lynchings, and about 95 per cent of the electors in that State cast their vote every year, when so few cast votes in Georgia? Now, I want that as a matter of information, without getting mad. [Laughter.] Do not get mad as you do in election precincts, but state it philosophically.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, the gentleman from North Carolina is putting on the cap and bells again to play before the House. I have here a list of the lynchings in Georgia and Texas. In Georgia there are 11, and Texas has 7.

Imperialism.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 17, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes—

Mr. KITCHIN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Trusts in industrial life are what imperialism is in governmental affairs. Trusts bring naturally independent business enterprises under one control, though it may destroy many of those enterprises and ruin their owners. Imperialism often brings widely separated countries under one control, though States may be destroyed and their people deprived of their rights of local government. A man who is a tyrant at heart may gladly favor trusts in business and imperialism in government.

The Republican party was once true to a great principle, but of late it has been true in obedience to the demands of concentrated wealth, and steady in disregard of the rights of the people when in conflict with those demands. Its President once declared—as Democrats still declare—that "forcible annexation" was "criminal aggression." That sentiment was applauded from sea to sea. His party has violated that sentiment and his declaration, and he has since then, and while blood was flowing in the Philippines, called the policy he then denounced by the sweetened words "benevolent assimilation."

The Republican party once made slaves under our flag free; it has recently raised our flag over slaves and brought the Sultan of Jolo, with his many wives and concubines, under our jurisdiction.

It gave the country the greenbacks, the best of all its acts; it has recently provided for their destruction, against the protests of the Democracy. The great national banks desired their destruction.

The Republican party has, under this Administration, unnecessarily adopted and pursued a policy which in principle is subversive of our theory of government. The great principle which distinguishes a true republic from a tyranny is "that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The grandest body of patriots that ever assembled on this continent wrote that doctrine in the Declaration of Independence. One community has no right to govern or control another community without its fairly expressed consent. The people of any considerable community have a right to govern themselves; but, in my opinion, the God of nations and peoples never endowed one community or state with the right to govern a different community or state against its consent. The monarchies, tyrannies, and empires of earth have disregarded the natural rights of man and of peoples, usurped the powers of oppression, and inflicted upon unwilling states governments contrary to the consent of the governed.

Such governments have not only resulted in robbery and oppression of their distant territories, but also in robbery and oppression of their home people. Oppression abroad engenders oppression at home. A government can not survive half tyranny and half liberty. A government strong enough to do wrong abroad with impunity is strong enough to do wrong at home with impunity. The authorities who govern distant people without their consent will endeavor to govern their home people without their consent. That government which directly oppresses or suffers oppression of her colonies or territory will by indirection oppress or suffer oppression of its own home people. A people without their own local government never breathe the air of liberty, equality, and justice.

The whole life of our country until the last eighteen months was the noblest protest in the annals of men against the tyrant's creed that one State may govern another State without its consent and participation. When that protest becomes approval, mankind in horror may look forward to its political destiny, for what was common man's dearest hope will prove his direst curse. Sirs, if this country is to pursue a policy of imperialism, so rashly begun by an Administration elected by the trusts, let the praises of our Revolutionary heroes be torn from our histories, and instead of the record of the glorious fight of our ancestors for liberty, let it be written that their descendants destroyed the light of liberty and, for the sake of gain, put forth the sword of oppression instead of the declaration to save. Let Washington and Jefferson be forgotten. Let the monuments of Lexington and Guilford be dynamited. Aye, sirs, snatch from its pedestal the Goddess of Liberty Enlightening the World, send it back to France, and publish to mankind that America has become the enemy of man.

When the virtues that once adorned the consuls of Rome were abandoned for the luxurious vices that characterized her later emperors, her fate was determined. It saddens the heart and shames the spirit of our best citizenship when, after contemplating the simple virtues, rugged honesty, and pure patriotism of the fathers of this Republic, he turns to the consideration of the weakness, the changes of position, the drifting with events, and the vanity of our present Administration. Oh, that we had had as President a man of heroic nature when the flatterers were around, when the temptation came! Oh, for a Washington or a Jackson then!

The great American spirit would not be wounded; our country would not be suspected of indifference to the great rights of man; American soldiers would not be wasting away in the Philippines; the ambition of the individual would have yielded to the wisdom of the patriot. Having liberated Cuba, we would have the glad praise of all the world, and the liberty-lover wherever he is would point his countrymen to glorious America, the land of Washington, the country that makes people free! To-day you will search the wide world over in vain to find a single intelligent man, acquainted with our insular experience, who will call America now the giver of liberty to states.

In this Administration, in my opinion, the demands of capital have prevailed over the rights of man. It has followed a policy that says the people who must pay allegiance to our flag have not the protection of our Constitution. A policy against which every patriot, every lover of humanity must rebel. The advisers of the President probably told him that such opportunities never came to Washington or Lincoln; that great glory would come to him if he only seized them; that there was money for our wealthy in the exploitation of the Philippines. They probably touched his vanity. They did not remind him that he had said "forcible annexation" was "criminal aggression." Therefore, when Spain was whipped he had her held up as if by a robber, and required the cession of the Philippines at the price of $20,000,000. He compelled the trade at the point of the bayonet. The most charitable historian can not make of it a pleasant chapter.

The cession of the Philippines was not the necessary, nor was it the natural result, in view of our history and traditions, of the Spanish war. At the close of that war we had possession of only one town, Manila; but had we been in possession of all the islands Spain had ever claimed it would not have changed this particular matter. It was not incumbent on us to take these islands or to hold them after the war. The Spanish commissioners were surprised when they were demanded. Nothing required us to acquire them except the avarice of those who advised the President. The habits of the world's robbers and tyrants enticed the President, and instead of their being "benevolent assimilation" in the business, there has been a great deal of useless slaughter.

Ever since their acquisition they have been a source of bloodshed, trouble, and increased expense.

The President in his speech before the Ohio Society in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York on March 8, 1900, said that the war with Spain was "unavoidable," but he did not assert that the Philippine trouble was unavoidable. He did say the whole matter was the "people's question." I do not believe that the high officials of any government on earth have the proper consideration of the people in entering war. They often bring on war, and tax the people of their blood and money for its prosecution, appeal to their patriotism, and try to make them think it is "their question."

In my judgment, had this Philippine question been submitted to the people by a referendum, or otherwise, it would have been repudiated by such a majority that would shock not only the conscience but the fears of those who caused it. Why should we want as a part of our country a thousand islands in the Tropics, 7,000 miles from our shores, with 10,000,000 of inferior people of an inferior race, whom Spain had for a hundred years been struggling in vain to civilize and permanently subdue?

In that speech the President calls them "our wards," and says, "Nations do not grow in strength, and the cause of liberty and law is not advanced by the doing of easy things. The harder the task the greater will be the result, benefit, and the honor." He also speaks of "breaking up our camp of ease and isolation." He thinks "the burden is our opportunity." What will the country think of one who advances a policy which will make our task harder and "break up our camp of ease and isolation?" I agree with him that his Philippine policy puts upon us harder tasks and heavier burdens and destroys our ease and isolation.

For that very reason every American patriot should oppose it. To put harder tasks upon our people, to "break up their ease and isolation" in order either to exploit or to govern these distant islands with their inferior people, exhibits a purpose as purely imperialistic as ever entered the minds of Cæsar or Alexander. It means heavier taxation upon our people, unnecessary risks and responsibilities upon them, and an absolute disregard of their right to lower taxes and peaceful conditions, and it means the beginning of many of the causes that wrecked proud nations in the past. How are these Filipinos to be treated? How is Porto Rico to be treated? Again are we reminded of the vacillation of the Republican party and the weakness of the President. In his message to Congress of December 5, 1899, prepared with solemn deliberation, he said:

> The markets of the United States should be opened up to her (Porto Rico's) products. Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Porto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

Plain duty! How was it plain? Why, under the Constitution. It was right in the sight of God; it was right between the two peoples; but it was a plain duty under the Constitution. Thus did the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee understand it, for he at once introduced a bill for free trade with Cuba. This bill was right. Much had been said by the President and leading Republicans about liberty and blessings following the flag. What liberty and what blessings were meant?

Why, those enjoyed under our Constitution. Never before had anyone claimed that our Constitution was not coequal with our sovereignty. Never did anyone pretend to think that the President or Congress, creatures of the Constitution, had powers above and beyond the Constitution until the demon of pride, selfishness, and greed entered Republican hearts. The spirit of the trusts was abroad. Trusts' interests, not the interest of humanity, had the consideration of the Republican party, and, as if touched by the magician's wand, in a day it changed its position in reference to Porto Rico.

One day the "plain duty" under the Constitution was to give them free trade with us. The next day the trust interests came into the Republican party's vision again, and it was proclaimed that the Constitution did not protect the Porto Ricans and that those suffering people should be heavily taxed on their trade with us. The Republicans at first put those taxes at 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff rates. The President at once swung into accord with that. A shout of opposition was heard throughout the country. The Republicans in Congress, fearing that opposition, reduced it to 15 per cent. The President accepted that. Porto Rico was then, and is now, part of the United States. The Constitution says that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

No wonder the almost unanimous press of the country criticised the Porto Rican bill, for the President, who had proclaimed that blessings followed the flag, and his allies had boldly taken the position that although our flag flies in Porto Rico and we have sovereignty and exercise jurisdiction over it, yet her people have not the greatest of all blessings, politically speaking—the rights of the Constitution. They have taken the bold position that our Government can treat our island possessions in any manner we please, however unjust or oppressive may be our measures, provided our Army and Navy are sufficient. They say the inhabitants of those islands, whatever may be their grievances, can not appeal to our Constitution, but only to our discretion. Their position is that Congress can prescribe for the Porto Ricans trials without juries and without indictments; that soldiers in time of peace can be quartered in their private houses without their consent, but they can not appeal to the great Constitution that protects us. He that approves such a doctrine with a crown on his head would be a most cruel tyrant.

The President's "plain duty" so soon by him rejected! Vacillating, unstable President! How can his course be explained? In the Senate on March 8, 1900, Senator TILLMAN was asking of Senator FORAKER, of Ohio, a kindred question, when the Senator from Ohio said not to ask him, but to ask his colleague (meaning Senator HANNA), for he, Senator FORAKER, was not the keeper of the President's conscience.

I suppose if any mortal man can explain the President's various changes of positions on important public matters that man is the chairman of the Republican national executive committee. Would that he had a better political chaperon!

Whether explained or not, the change occurred, and many conscientious Republicans who had declared that they never would vote to tax trade with Porto Rico, under the party lash fell into line with the policy which was intended to give the deathblow to the constitutional rights of our recently acquired territory. The courts had repeatedly held that our Constitution was over all our territory. Ruling a people and denying them constitutional rights is as base imperialism as the world ever knew.

Members of Congress may surrender their opinions at the dictates of a party leader, but the honest, God-fearing, liberty-loving man at home, uninfluenced by bosses, has not surrendered his right to think, and to act upon his best intelligence, nor will he be coerced by any false ideas of loyalty to a President who denies the protection of our Constitution to people under our flag and who pay allegiance to our sovereignty. Evidence has appeared sufficient to show that the acquisition of the Philippines was not from high or holy motives, but for the purposes of exploitation for the benefit of the few.

But to Porto Rico again. Suppose your son, living here as a merchant, freely trading with the people of North Carolina, should move to Porto Rico and continue from that island to sell goods to a North Carolina merchant. Is it right, is it constitutional, to compel him or the North Carolinian, both still American citizens, on American soil, under the American flag, to pay a tariff tax upon the goods they buy and sell to each other? No, sir; it is neither constitutional nor right; and all the influence of the Administration, all the sophistry of its defenders, all the greed of its supporters, can not make it right, can not make it constitutional. To hold that it is constitutional is to adopt the creed of the plunderers of earth—the creed of imperialism. It would be approving the power to destroy the Porto Rican's property without his consent, taxing him without representation. We oppose such doctrines in the name of every honest man, of every liberty lover throughout the world. They destroy justice. They build up and fortify tyrants. They menace our posterity.

We oppose them because we oppose rule by brute force and oppose large armies and their heavy expense. To-day three-fourths of all the taxes raised by the Government are paid out on account of war. More than $300,000,000 annually are paid out for the Army, the Navy, fortifications, and pensions—a sum more than the taxable property of North Carolina. Imperialism means vastly heavier burdens on the people; means breaking up our "camp of ease." It should be at once resisted. The people should rise in their might at the fall elections and repudiate it. Imperialistic tendency has kept our Administration silent while the English have proceeded to blot from the map of South Africa two republics of free men who had followed the example of our ancestors. The great American heart was in sympathy with the Boers, but no sympathy was ever expressed for them by those influential in Administration circles, because such sympathy could not exist in the hearts of those who sustain the President in his policy toward Porto Rico and the Philippines.

Men who hate kings and tyrants, men who hate injustice and oppression, men who love the government of our fathers as handed down to us, men who desire their posterity to share in a republican form of government, men who hate imperialism and love constitutional government, men who believe in America for Americans and desire to avoid entangling alliances with foreign powers, men who oppose heavier tasks and who do not want to quit our good, safe American "camp of ease and isolation," should seize the first opportunity to express their views and repudiate the Administration that has antagonized the dearest principles of our country.

WAR TAXES.

Two years ago, when the Republicans passed the war-tax act, we were told that it would be a temporary measure, for mere war purposes. The Spanish war has been over for eighteen months. The enormous taxes under the war-tax measure have brought a large surplus in the Treasury. The people are tired of paying these obnoxious taxes. They are tired of being taxed by stamp taxes upon their notes, duebills, checks, mortgages, deeds, medicines, etc. A faithful compliance with the understanding of the country when the war-tax bill became law requires the modification of that measure and the repeal of many of its taxes. I have introduced a bill to modify that act; other Democrats have introduced bills to repeal and to modify it, but not one of them has been able to pass the Ways and Means Committee. In that committee they slumber under Republican vigilance.

However much we may desire an early adjournment of this session of Congress, adjournment should not occur until the war-tax act has been greatly modified and many of its taxes repealed. We should relieve the people of many of its burdens. We on this side stand ready to vote for modification, for substantial decrease in its burdens. We invite you to bring in a bill for the relief of the people, and promise to aid in their relief.

ADMINISTRATION SCANDALS.

The present Administration has been the propagator or the victim of many scandals. It has been shown that the Government, about the time of the Spanish war, paid extravagant prices for ships, for some of them about twice their value, and purchased ships which were of little account, and that the recipients of these good bargains were nearly always Administration supporters. The Merrimac, which Hobson sank at Santiago, was one of them. Her cost was $192,000, but the Government paid $342,000 for her; in other words, $150,000 was made by those who sold her to our Government.

The attention of the public has again in the last week been attracted to the Enquirer, a yacht, for which the Government paid $80,000, and after the war listed it for sale at $25,000.

It has been but a little over a year since the Eagan scandal was performed. Brigadier-General Eagan, who had said General Miles had lied, etc., was found guilty by a court-martial of conduct grossly unbecoming an officer, but the President, more in the nature of a reward than as a punishment, suspended him from service for six years with full pay of $5,500 per year, so that he will, for doing absolutely nothing for six years, receive from the Government the sum of $33,000, at the end of which time he will be old enough to retire on three-fourths pay. Instead of dismissing him in disgrace, as he ought to have done, the President conferred upon him a punishment in the nature of approval of his conduct.

But a few weeks ago it was discovered that in Cuba, which is not ours, but now under the control of our officials, were drawing not only their regular salaries as our officers, but were also being paid large sums out of the Cuban revenues. In other words, they were, without the knowledge of the American public, increasing their pay by taking from the money belonging not to us, but to the Cuban people, whatever sums they required; and high Administration officials had approved it! This is a characteristic of tyrannous imperialism.

The beef scandal is still fresh in the public minds, and a bitter recollection to our soldiers who went to Cuba and Porto Rico. Spoiled beef was issued as rations to the soldiers. Because General Miles sustained in part the complaints of the soldiers about the character of beef furnished them, General Eagan severely denounced his superior officer, General Miles, which brought about the trial by court-martial of Eagan, above-mentioned.

The Neely scandal is still on. The papers are still full of the stealings in the Cuban postal service. High officials of that service are involved. C. F. W. Neely, Republican from Indiana, is under arrest, charged with stealing something like $100,000 from the Cuban revenues. He was financial agent of the post-office business in Cuba, appointed by the President. Rathbone, the director of the posts in Cuba, another appointee of the President, has been suspended on account of his conduct in connection with the frauds there. It is probably true that the gang of plunderers connected with the postal matters in Cuba under our imperial rule there, for the benefit of the Cubans, stole three or four hundred thousand dollars. The end is not yet in sight. "There is money in it."

One of the worst outrages against humanity in recent years occurred in Idaho at Cœur d'Alene—not in any of our newly acquired territory, but in the State of Idaho—beginning more than a year ago when the writ of habeas corpus was suspended, martial law declared, and hundreds of workingmen were by the military authorities of the United States huddled together, imprisoned in a "bull pen" for months, because of trouble arising from differences between the men and the mine owners. These men were imprisoned without indictment or charges preferred, and held without trial or opportunity for a hearing. Terrible it was, but a characteristic of militarism.

The people should take this Government out of the hands of those who believe it is right to take any territory or do anything if "there is money in it" and place it in the hands of those who believe in the Constitution, and in doing right and in administering justice, in making no arrest without warrant of law, and in dealing honestly with all mankind, whether "there is money in it" or not. For one I have confidence in the people and rely upon their integrity and courage, and so relying I confidently look forward to the election this fall of Mr. Bryan.

The Trust Amendment.

SPEECH

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 31, 1900.

The House having under consideration joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I avail myself of the order for general debate granted by the House to place in the RECORD an open letter addressed to me as chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and which purports to be a reply to a letter of one Peabody, a British merchant and charterer of foreign ships in our foreign trade.

I may only add that of course anything which will benefit American shipping and American labor will injure the business of Mr. Peabody and the Britico-American interests he represents.

The letter is as follows:

PELHAM, N. Y., June 4, 1900.

Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,
Chairman Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: My attention has been called to a printed pamphlet containing an open letter to Representative William H. Moody, written by Mr. Henry W. Peabody, an American charterer of foreign ships in our foreign trade. The letter in question has been published in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, extracts from and comments upon which have also appeared in the public press. Mr. Peabody's letter professes to discuss "The Amended Shipping Bill" which you favorably reported from your committee on March 31, 1900. As that letter contains many serious misstatements as to fact, and much illogical argument, and as I have therein been personally singled out for attack, I venture to ask, in view of the large circulation it has received through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that this open letter to you be accorded space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the refutation of the attacks that have been, through inaccurate statements, made against the bill, as an act of justice to the bill itself, in justice to the real facts, and in justice to its many friends and advocates, among which latter I am one of the most earnest although of the very least importance.

HOW THE BILL WILL INDUCE SHIPBUILDING.

In the first two pages of his pamphlet Mr. Peabody presents a fair summary of the chief features of the bill. On the third page, however, he says its object "is not to increase our merchant marine quickly and materially, but to induce orders for vessels to be built in the United States." I would like to be told how the "inducing of orders for vessels to be built in the United States" would "not increase our merchant marine quickly and materially." All that has been lacking for forty years has been the "inducement." This "inducement" Mr. Peabody admits this bill will create. We possess everything else with which to "quickly and materially" increase our merchant shipping. The materials needed exist in our soil in the greatest abundance and cheapness. Our mills are capable of shaping these materials in unlimited quantities. We have a considerable number of shipyards capable of almost unlimited increased capacity. We have the skill to build ships of the best. We have capital in abundance, and we have a foreign trade to carry that attracts the cream of the world's shipping to-day, but a fraction of which is of American construction. In this accurate premise that the pending bill will "induce orders for vessels to be built in the United States" Mr. Peabody himself refutes his assertion that it will "not increase our merchant marine quickly and materially."

SHALL AMERICAN OR FOREIGN LABOR BE EMPLOYED?

Right here exists the cardinal difference between the bill you have favorably reported and the bill as Mr. Peabody would have it amended. His desire is and his entire public criticism has been aimed to have the bill open wide the door for the admission to American registry of foreign-built vessels during a period of one or more years after its passage. Your bill provides for the building of these vessels by American labor in American shipyards and from American materials. Mr. Peabody would prefer to be permitted to go abroad to obtain the ships with which he would have an American merchant marine built up. He desires that foreign labor shall do that which your bill provides American labor shall do.

FULL AMERICAN OWNERSHIP ESSENTIAL TO AMERICAN REGISTRY.

Mr. Peabody professes to see great danger in the provisions of section 26 of the bill, which defines the words "person" or "persons," or "citizen" or "citizens," or "corporation" or "corporations," or "associations," or "partnerships," in that "corporations of any foreign country" are recognised. One would infer from Mr. Peabody's disingenuous manner of presenting the matter that foreigners would come in and enjoy our subsidy, and thus make more difficult American competition with foreign vessels. The bill provides throughout that only vessels under American register shall enjoy the benefits of the act, and no vessels not wholly owned by American citizens are entitled to registry. Mr. Peabody strangely overlooked section 17, which declares "that a vessel receiving compensation under this act shall not be sold to any foreign subject, citizen, company, or country, or transferred to any foreign flag, without the written permission of the Secretary of the Treasury." Not only does the bill include this provision, but in the case of such foreign vessels now built or building as are to be admitted to American registry, it is stipulated that full ownership shall first be vested in American citizens.

ATTACKING THE ONLY AMERICAN LINE IN OUR TRADE WITH EUROPE.

Mr. Peabody's assertion that "the cream of the subsidy is designed to fall to those vessels of the International Steamship Company" is not only erroneous but seems purposely designed to prejudice the public against that line—the only line, by the way, engaged in our trade with Europe under the American flag. This line has been repeatedly singled out for the most virulent, malignant, and unjustifiable attacks ever since the shipping bill has been before the public. It has been asserted, but without a word of truth, that it is controlled by the Standard Oil and the Pennsylvania Railroad companies.

CONTENDING AGAINST MOST WEALTHY AND POWERFUL FOREIGN LINES.

That line has been pictured as part of a monopolistic trust, whereas it is battling single-handed and alone against the most powerful steamship lines in the world. These other lines—all under foreign flags—are backed up with unlimited wealth and the support of their several Governments to whatever extent may be necessary to enable them to successfully compete in our trans-Atlantic trade. The American line in question is struggling at considerable pecuniary loss to succeed and to still further increase its tonnage under the Stars and Stripes in the face of this concentrated and united opposition. In doing so it has been subjected to the unbridled abuse of every free trader, every free-trade newspaper, every enemy of American shipping, and every defender of foreign shipping in the United States. If the stockholders of this line are ready to invest still further in American ships in the hope of ultimately earning a profit, and are ready to subject themselves to the fiercest and most concentrated competition of the most wealthy and powerful ships in all the world under foreign flags, the American people will applaud and commend them.

DEADLY PURPOSE OF THE OPPOSITION.

The deadly purpose of this opposition is manifest when we study the statistics of the United States for the last fiscal year. Of the total foreign trade of the United States, 66.07 per cent is with Europe—more than two-thirds of our total foreign trade is with Europe. Of our imports from Europe, valued at $337,884,524, only $15,430,242, or 4.35 per cent, was carried in American vessels. Of this, the ships of the American line carried imports valued at $14,813,033. Of our exports to Europe, valued at $936,602,093, but $27,558,076, or 1.30 per cent, was carried in American vessels, the ships of the American line alone carrying exports to Europe valued at $25,077,749.

ONE AMERICAN LINE CARRIES ONE-QUARTER OF ALL FOREIGN COMMERCE CARRIED IN AMERICAN SHIPS.

The value of the imports and exports carried in the ships of this line was $39,890,782, out of a total of $160,612,206 carried in all of the American ships engaged in our entire foreign trade. The ships of this American line carried within a fraction of 25 per cent of all of the imports and exports of the United States that were carried in American ships. If, therefore, the four steamships of the American Line—which rendered such exceptional and invaluable auxiliary naval service to our Government during the war with Spain—can be driven out of our trade with Europe, the proportion of our carrying under the American flag in that trade will drop from the present 2.15 per cent of the total to but two-tenths of 1 per cent. That is to say, the foreign ships now monopolize 97.85 per cent of our carrying trade with Europe, and are striving with all of the power and influence at their command to increase their proportion of our carrying to 99.8 per cent, leaving for the stray American vessel that will dare to venture into that trade the carrying of 0.2 per cent of our imports and exports.

By driving these ships out of our foreign trade the proportion of the entire foreign trade of the United States carried in American vessels will be reduced from 8.9 to just 7 per cent, leaving for foreign ships the carrying of 93 per cent of our exports and imports, and the earning of the estimated $200,000,000 in freights that are taken from the United States each year. No wonder the foreign steamship lines, and all other friends of foreign shipping, and every enemy of American shipping, concentrate their opposition on the American line—the single heroic carrier of the American flag in our trans-Atlantic trade!

SHIPS RENDERING GREATEST SERVICE RECEIVE LARGEST COMPENSATION.

It has been demonstrated before your committee that this American line is ready to greatly enlarge its tonnage under the American flag. That is precisely what the United States desires, for defensive and commercial reasons. It is precisely what the foreign shipping interests and their friends desire to oppose at all hazards. It is untrue that the American line is to receive "the cream of the subsidy," but if it were true it would only be because it furnished the cream of the service under the American flag required under the terms of the bill. The individual or the corporation receiving the most, under the terms of the bill, must perform the greatest service. In performing that service no line is permitted to enjoy the exclusive right to any route or character of trade, but each ship of every line is subject to the competition of all other American vessels, whose owners will be entitled to receive exactly the same compensation for the same service from the Government.

To drive the only American line in our trade with Europe out of that business has been and still is the determined purpose of the most active and powerful enemies of American shipping. With them Mr. Peabody seems to have joined hands. To drive the only American line out of our trade with Europe will be to prevent the threatened increase in the number of American ships in that trade, and with which purpose Mr. Peabody seems to be in full accord. It may be necessary to drive American ships entirely from our trade with Europe in order to still further accentuate our dependence upon foreign shipping for our foreign carrying. In this un-American and unpatriotic scheme Mr. Peabody evidences his persistent activity. He is in full accord with every enemy of American shipping in seeking to accomplish this infamous purpose.

DEMAGOGIC APPEALS TO CLASS PREJUDICES.

Mr. Peabody employs the arts of the demagogue for the purpose of discrediting the friends and possible beneficiaries of the proposed bill. He appeals to class prejudices, and especially endeavors to discredit capital, in his desire to defeat the passage of the measure in question. This is illustrated in the following paragraph quoted from his letter:

"The foreign-built vessels which it is proposed to admit to registry are owned by five or six wealthy firms or corporations in New York City, said to aggregate 318,000 tons register, but about one-third this tonnage has very recently been absorbed by the great English Leyland Line."

A BILL IN THE INTEREST OF AMERICAN LABOR.

This American charterer of foreign vessels adroitly avoids stating the real reason for the admission of certain foreign-built vessels to American registry, regarding which it is important that a clear knowledge should be had. The great underlying purpose of any legislation designed to revive the American merchant marine should be that of utilizing our own abundant native materials, of employing our own labor in mill and shop and in shipyard, in the construction of the ships, so that we shall be entirely independent of all other nations in the essential possession of adequate means for the construction of all of the vessels our commerce may require.

Two great national purposes are thus served, to wit: (1) The creation and maintenance of American shipyards in a state of constant efficiency for the building of both our merchant and our war ships, the very possession of which is a safeguard against foreign aggression, and the large employment in which will unquestionably be of immense permanent benefit to the nation and its people. (2) The steady reduction in the cost of building merchant and war ships, resulting from the constant employment of a larger number of establishments in that great industry. This last accomplishment alone will repay the nation over and over again for whatever temporary aid it may give to incite our people to put their capital into ships and shipyards.

THE UNITED STATES THE WORLD'S SHIPBUILDER.

After the steady employment in American shipyards for a number of years has reduced the cost of construction in the United States to or below the level of foreign prices, then this country will become the leading shipbuilding nation of the world. That event will be hastened by the Government aiding in the initiatory steps that must precede any extensive employment of American capital in the foreign carrying trade of the United States, a fact fully admitted by Mr. Peabody throughout his letter.

CARDINAL PRINCIPLES UNDERLYING THE BILL.

When the bill under consideration was drafted the great cardinal principles of home construction as well as American ownership were steadily kept in view. It was found, however, that a substantial amount of foreign-built tonnage, sailing under foreign flags, was in the possession of American citizens, and that other tonnage was then in course of construction in foreign shipyards for the American owners of existing foreign-built tonnage.

WHY AMERICAN CITIZENS OWN SHIPS UNDER FOREIGN FLAGS.

The reason that American citizens had purchased, and the reason they were having built, this foreign tonnage was that it cost less than American tonnage, and the cost of operating the ships was much less under foreign flags than the cost of their operation under the American flag. The construction cost is found to be between 20 and 25 per cent less abroad than in the United States, the principal cause for which is the high wages paid in American shipyards, labor receiving between 90 and 95 per cent of the money actually spent in the construction of ships. The higher wages paid and the better and larger quantities of food furnished to those employed on board American ships make the cost of their operation between 30 and 40 per cent higher than the cost of operating competing ships under foreign flags.

Those American citizens, therefore, whose business interests required the employment of ships in our foreign trade were forced to purchase them at the same cost and run them at the same cost that their foreign rivals were able to do in order to successfully compete with them in the business. This explains why it is that American citizens do, to the extent of 200,000 or 300,000 tons, own ships now under foreign flags. To have the ships their trade required built in the United States and to run them under the American flag in our foreign trade meant to so handicap their owners in competition with their foreign rivals as to drive them out of the business.

These conditions of competition and these reasons explain fully why it is that the mere granting of American registry to foreign-built vessels owned by our citizens would be valueless. Even if they possessed the privilege, our citizens could not profitably take advantage of it. But to give a subsidy to foreign-built vessels so owned, if placed under the American flag, is an entirely different proposition; and this is the proposition advocated by Mr. Peabody. He would protect the owners of the ships, by subsidy, against foreign competition, but he would withdraw protection from American shipbuilders. It need scarcely be added that Mr. Peabody is a prospective shipowner—that he has no prospective personal interest in American shipbuilding.

HOW TO INDUCE THEM TO HEREAFTER HAVE THE SHIPS THEY NEED BUILT IN AMERICAN SHIPYARDS.

In the drafting of the bill it was suggested that if those American citizens who then owned vessels under foreign flags could be encouraged to thereafter have the ships they required for their business built in the United States it would be a very desirable accomplishment. The ships were in existence, and they were owned by our citizens for their immediate needs. The question was what could be done to induce them in the future to build their ships at home. If their present ships, it was suggested, could be brought under American registry and compensation provided sufficient in amount to offset the higher cost of operating them under our flag, and further compensation provided for such ships as were built in the United States and run under our flag, such American citizens as possessed a foreign carrying trade would then find it to their interest to build in the United States. And this explains the provision for the admission of such ships to American registry as were owned by or under construction for our citizens when the bill was drafted.

The proposition to open our registry to the wholesale admission of foreign-built ships for a period of years after the bill has gone into effect was entirely foreign to the purposes animating those who drafted the bill. The bill does not provide for the construction of one foreign-built ship after its passage; it provides then only for the construction of American-built ships.

ONLY HALF COMPENSATION TO FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

The bill provides that foreign-built ships thus admitted to American registry shall receive but one-half the compensation that is provided for ships of American construction. This limitation is made because the cost of building ships abroad—the cost of buying foreign-built vessels—is less than the cost of building or buying American vessels. Mr. Peabody, however, having in prospect the purchase of foreign-built ships, desires that such ships shall be given compensation under the bill equal in amount to that provided for American-built ships.

MR. PEABODY'S PERSONAL INTERESTS.

We now understand the underlying purposes animating Mr. Peabody in his opposition to the bill as it stands. He happens to be engaged in chartering foreign vessels in our foreign trade, particularly in our trade with Australia. While Mr. Peabody objects to what he chooses to designate as "special privileges" being given to existing American owners of vessels under foreign flags, he happens to be an influential participant in a combination of firms, most of which are foreign companies, which have, by methods more or less questionable, compelled shippers to either employ the vessels belonging to the combination or submit to the boycotting of their exports to the serious injury and financial loss of the shippers' business, proof of which has been widely published in the newspapers, and, so far as I have seen, never denied by Mr. Peabody or by anyone acting for him.

Mr. Peabody comes to Congress complaining of "special privileges," in which he admits he is not a participant, but in the rather sorry guise of a participant in a "trust" or "combination" obviously restrictive of trade and injurious to American producers and exporters, and which certain sufferers from the methods employed by the combination in which Mr. Peabody is a participant have boldly characterized as "blackmailing."

AS MR. PEABODY DESCRIBES HIMSELF AND AS HE IS.

Mr. Peabody stated his objections to the bill when the public hearings were given by your committee, referring to his own business interests and connections. The latter have been more fully exploited since that time, in connection with the combination of which he is a member, the whole of which is very accurately embraced in the compass of an editorial which appeared in the Philadelphia Press, under date of May 29, 1900, and which reads as follows:

WHY HE OPPOSES THE BILL.

"Not all of the opponents of the shipping bill now pending before Congress are actuated by selfish motives, but selfishness is the inspiration of the most active opposition. The London Times and the London Shipping Gazette have acknowledged that British shipowners are opposing the bill. Representatives of subsidized German lines have been openly working against the measure. Such opposition is easily understood. The London Financial Times explained it recently by stating that the foreign shipowners regard with anxiety the probability of the passing of the bill, as that would mean brisk competition from the United States. The foreign shipowners know the absolute falsity of the statements made in Congress by such men as Representative Fitzgerald, who declare that the bill would not increase to any extent American shipping in the foreign trade and would not lead to a reduction of freight rates. If it were not absolutely certain that it would accomplish these ends the foreign companies would not employ lobbyists to oppose the bill and to prepare such a report against it as the ridiculous one Mr. Fitzgerald fathered.

"There is some honestly mistaken opposition. It comes from free traders, who have opposed every protective measure that has built up American industries. The proofs that are everywhere in evidence of the woeful mistakes of the free traders makes their opposition of comparatively little consequence. It is the selfish opposition that masks itself behind pretended patriotic motives that misleads the public. Such is the opposition of men like Henry W. Peabody of Boston, whose 'argument' against the bill was inserted in the 'Congressional Record' recently by Representative Moody of Massachusetts. It is a bad bill in the opinion of Mr. Peabody, who says that he has been engaged in the shipping business for forty years. He testified before the House Committee on Merchant Marine last January to this effect:

"I certainly appreciate that our merchant marine has decayed and that we have nothing worthy of the name. I am in favor of a subsidy. I consider it necessary that subsidy should be applied to the merchant marine in order to give it a new life. My firm is engaged in business which requires them to charter vessels and steamers, and they are almost invariably of the British flag. We can not conduct our ships under the American flag as cheaply as the English or the Germans or the Norwegians can conduct their ships, and that disadvantage it is necessary to offset by a subsidy. That is due for one thing to higher wages and better living. It is a poor investment to go and buy a vessel and pay 35 per cent more than our competitors are paying for their vessels abroad. This bill is a step in the right direction. It will replenish the merchant marine, but it will not re-create it. It does not give me or my associates an opportunity to operate under it. I believe that if subsidies were provided and the people who have not any vessels to-day had the opportunity for one, two, three, or five years to buy them in foreign countries, and then contract at the same time they put them under American registry to build in this country a similar amount of tonnage, you would see a replenishment that would run up into millions. I would be glad if the limit should not be put even at $9,000,000.

"That is Mr. Peabody's argument given before the House committee. His objection to the bill is that he could not buy at 35 per cent less than they could be built for in this country all the ships he wants to abroad for the next five years, and by hoisting the American flag get subsidies at once. That would be a fine way to build up the American merchant marine. The bill does not give Mr. Peabody and his associates 'a right to operate under it.' Why? The following blank contract will explain:

"It is hereby agreed between R. W. Cameron & Co., Henry W. Peabody & Co., Arkell & Douglas, and Mailler & Quereau, and ——— of ———, that the latter will confine exclusively ——— shipments from the East coast of the United States to ports of ——— by vessels loaded by above firms for a period of ——— years, and said firms agree to allow said ——— 10 per cent on the net amount of freight paid by ———, not including the primage. This rebate to be computed to the 31st of December of each year, and will only be payable six months thereafter, subject to the above conditions, and upon a declaration by ——— on the annexed form, with copies of bills of lading attached. No claim for rebates will be recognized unless made within twelve months from date of shipment. Statement of rebates claimed may be sent to either one of the four firms to this agreement. Privilege is given under this agreement to ship any special lines of merchandise by steamer from New York for transhipment at British or Continental ports without prejudice to claim for rebate as above noted. This agreement becomes operative from date of signature.

"R. W. CAMERON & CO.
"HENRY W. PEABODY & CO.
"ARKELL & DOUGLAS.
"MAILLER & QUEREAU,

"We hereby accept above agreement and terms contained therein.

"———.

"Mr. Peabody's firm is with the three others signed to the above blank contract engaged extensively in shipping to and from China and the Orient. They are in a combination or trust with secret agreements with shippers to give rebates in the way the Standard Oil monopoly was built up. They could not continue that monopoly under the shipping bill, owing to the trust clause and for other reasons. Hence Mr. Peabody, in his letter to Mr. Moody, printed in the Congressional Record, denounces the measure as a bad one.

"Of course, he has no selfish reason for opposing it!"

FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS AND AMERICAN REGISTRY.

As Mr. Peabody himself points out in his letter, from the very foundation of our Government—even when ships were built much more cheaply in the United States than abroad—American legislation has been continuously directed against the admission of foreign-built vessels to American registry. Pronounced free traders still suggest this as the only panacea required for the upbuilding of our marine in the foreign trade—this is especially true of the less practical and the more theoretical of free traders. In connection with the shipping bill this proposition has been so fully thrashed out that its insufficiency and impracticability are now admitted by far the larger number of all those best posted, even including the less radical advocates of the free-trade school of economics. So, it has occurred that at no time has the opposition to free ships been more pronounced all over the United States than it is to-day. The ten Republican members of your committee, including yourself, unite in showing the futility of the free-ship policy. In your report, on this policy, you say:

"We think it plain, therefore, from the nature of the case and from national experience, that it is of the greatest importance that the vessels which are to carry the foreign trade of the United States shall be built in the United States, shall sail under our flag, and shall be manned as far as practicable by our own citizens, although the immediate expense of their construction and the expense of operating them under our flag shall be greater than in carrying on the business with foreign ships."

In the report in favor of the passage of practically the same bill as the one that your committee favorably reported, filed by the Senate Commerce Committee, through its chairman, Senator William P. Frye, on the free-ship proposition, he makes this statement:

"If this admission be conditional, and foreign-built vessels admitted to registry be excluded from the coasting trade, such vessels will enjoy no privileges over foreign vessels, but will, on the contrary, be subject to the restrictions of our laws. All the watch officers of such vessels must be American citizens, the higher American scale of wages must be paid, and the higher statutory scale of provisions must be furnished. The repeal of the laws requiring officers to be American citizens and providing a scale of provisions, together with a reduction of wages to European levels, are propositions not to be entertained. But even if Congress should approve them, American ship owners would still be only on even terms with competing nations already established in the ocean-carrying trade. More is needed to gain a share of the trade lost for years. In either of its forms the free-ship policy is thus impracticable."

In a report filed by three of the seven Democratic members of your committee—Representatives Chanler, Small, and Ransdell—on this bill, they are even more emphatic in their opposition to the free-ship policy, regarding which they say:

"Another remedy which has been proposed is the repeal of that provision of our navigation laws which denies foreign-built vessels to American registry. It has been contended for years by many that our citizens should have the right to buy ships in any market and have them admitted to registry and sail under our flag. We regard it as useless to discuss the practical results or to lay down the arguments which have been advanced upon each of these contentions. It is scarcely a practical question. No political party has or would enact such legislation. The Democratic party did not enact into law this proposition when it had the power to do so, nor will it do so at any time in the future. It is equally true that the Republican party would decline to adopt this remedy. Such a law would be recognized as an irreparable blow to the shipbuilding interests of the country, and would result in the encouragement of foreign labor at the expense of the American workmen."

The other four members of your Committee—Representatives Fitzgerald, De Vries, Speight, and Daly—united upon still another report on this bill, in which they say, on the free ship proposition, in part:

"While we do not propose in this report to advocate the idea of free ships, we think we would be derelict in our duty if we did not point out the fact that in our investigation of this question we found that every Government except the United States allowed its citizens to purchase vessels in whatever market they pleased."

There is nothing in our statutes forbidding American citizens from "purchasing vessels in whatever market they please." We know that 300,000 tons of ships have been so purchased by Americans. These ships enjoy every privilege in our foreign carrying that is enjoyed by American ships, save alone the privilege of American registry and sailing under the American flag. Neither registry nor flag give an advantage to our ships in our foreign trade. Under the British policy of free ships Great Britain has increased her proportion of the world's ocean shipping from one-third to three-fifths. Foreigners have, to a very limited extent, bought British ships, but Britons seldom, if ever, buy foreign-built ships. Free ships only helps British shipbuilders. Free ships have failed to build up the merchant marine of other nations. With these facts in mind it must be obvious that the denial of American registry to foreign-built ships owned by American citizens has worked no hardship upon the latter, and has been of no injury to the country.

But, with this unanimous rejection of the free-ship policy, for Mr. Peabody to come forward when it is proposed that the Government shall lend assistance in the upbuilding of our merchant marine, and propose the ruination of American shipbuilders by the free registry of unlimited numbers of foreign (largely British) ships, shows how utterly his long chartered use of foreign ships has put him out of touch with the dominant—indeed, the almost unanimous—American sentiment of opposition to free ships.

AMERICAN SHIPYARDS OPEN TO MR. PEABODY.

In will be quite easy for Mr. Peabody to have all of the ships he may wish to employ in his trade built in American shipyards. And if the orders being executed in American shipyards should so fill them up that they could not immediately execute an order from Mr. Peabody, he may be sure that other shipyards will be quickly established to secure a share in the new business and to promptly meet the new demands. More than that, to permit the wholesale or unlimited admission of foreign-built vessels to American registry, even on condition that equal tonnage shall be constructed in American shipyards, would not nearly so greatly stimulate the establishment of new American shipyards as would the denial of that privilege.

GREAT PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The great purpose of the bill under consideration is to have every new ship for the foreign trade of the United States built in American shipyards. At best, Mr. Peabody would have but half of them so constructed; the remainder he would have Congress permit our people to purchase abroad and place under American registry. The bill, voicing the wishes of a vast majority of the American people, would give all of the new work to American citizens. Mr. Peabody, for his own selfish ends, would give half of the new work to aliens in foreign—chiefly British—shipyards!

LET AMERICANS HAVE THE NEW SHIPS—LET FOREIGNERS RETAIN THE OLD.

The more new ships that are built under the stimulus of this bill, the better will the American merchant marine thrive and increase. The more foreign-built vessels—especially those now in existence—that are admitted to American registry, the more new foreign ships—chiefly British—will be built to take their places. It were better for the inexperienced Americans to have the advantage of the newest and the most economical ships with which to meet foreign competition, than to have the half worn-out foreign-built ships with which to compete with the new foreign-built vessels in the hands of the more experienced foreign rivals. This bill places the new ships, of American construction, in the possession of our citizens. Mr. Peabody would rather place old foreign-built ships in unlimited number in the possession of our people.

ANIMUS AND SELFISHNESS DISCLOSED.

The animus pervading the mind of Mr. Peabody is as apparent in his remarks in his letter as is his unpatriotic selfishness. This is shown in the following quotation from his letter:

"I may here state my greatest objection to the bill. It is class legislation, bestowing a privilege upon a few millionaires who invested in foreign-built steamships under the foreign flag because of much lower cost than could be procured in this country, or conducted under the American flag, and it seeks less to reestablish our merchant marine than to enforce business for the already occupied shipyard."

Note that Mr. Peabody unqualifiedly admits in the last quoted statement that it costs more to build ships here than abroad; also, that it costs more to run them under the American than under a foreign flag. You can not fail to note the contradiction he indulges in when he says that the bill "seeks less to reestablish our merchant marine than to enforce business for the already occupied shipyard." If it enforces business for the already occupied shipyard will there not be new shipyards established, and will not that help to reestablish our merchant marine? This last quoted contradiction of Mr. Peabody's is like the first one quoted, to wit: "Its object is not to increase our merchant marine quickly and materially, but to induce orders for vessels to be built in the United States." Mr. Peabody must have a peculiarly constituted mind to indulge in paradoxes of this transparent character. They show both the desperation of his opposition and the paucity of his ammunition.

RESULT OF A GREAT DEMAND FOR AMERICAN SHIPS.

Mr. Peabody knows, and admits in his letter, that no American, either the owner of an American or a foreign built ship, can secure any compensation under the provisions of this bill until he has had new tonnage built for him in American shipyards. If all of our shipyards are so "occupied" as to render them incapable of new construction, and no new yards are established—an utterly improbable because preposterous suggestion—then the bill, if enacted, would be valueless, and of benefit to no one. Mr. Peabody is well aware that if the demand for American ships exceeds the supply—and this the bill is expected to stimulate—then there will be a large accession of new shipyards, in order that the supply of new ships can keep pace with the demand. That is a truism so trite as to be obvious to a mind less obscured than Mr. Peabody's seems to be.

The sequence of events—that of demand exceeding supply, and of new plants being established to meet the demand—is anticipated. That very condition is the one that is largely depended upon to effect a steady reduction in the cost of building ships in American shipyards. This reduction will be most advantageous to our people and to our Government. Mr. Peabody's proposition, on the other hand, would, if adopted, defer if not defeat the expected reduction in the cost of American shipbuilding by minimizing the demand for American ships through the unlimited purchase of foreign-built ships.

DEMAGOGIC SLURS CAST UPON CAPITAL AND CAPITALISTS.

Mr. Peabody's frequent reference to the prospective beneficiaries of this bill as "wealthy" and as "millionaires" is so phrased as to discredit wealth and capitalists, and is demagogic in the extreme. Would Mr. Peabody exclude from any participation in American shipowning "wealthy" people? Would he also debar "millionaires" from any participation? Would he suggest that people without means, or only those with very moderate means be encouraged to embark in American shipowning for our foreign trade? He would seem to believe that the possession of wealth, or of millions, justified the suggestion that its possessor should not seek a profit from its investment. Mr. Peabody and his friends, surely, do not expect to acquire a considerable amount of foreign tonnage and obligate themselves to build an equal amount in American shipyards, as he says they will do if the bill is amended as he suggests, without the employment of a large amount of money—possibly a million or so?

PIONEER SHIPOWNERS WILL SUFFER LOSSES AND SMALL PROFITS.

The pioneers in the revival of our merchant marine will be those who will pay most dearly for their experience. They will, while gaining experience, pay heavily because of their ignorance. It is only men with large means and enduring courage and enterprise who will, at the beginning at least, embark large amounts of capital in such an uncertain venture as the running of ships in our foreign trade. There must, just as Mr. Peabody himself states, be an incentive to induce investment. Profits will be slow and uncertain in the beginning; investors are sure to meet obstacles and losses entirely unexpected and unprovided for, and these will defer for a considerable time any substantial profit from the establishment of new lines and new ships in our foreign trade. It will be largely those who can afford to wait for their profits, and who can afford to go without a return upon their investment for an indefinite period of time, who, in the beginning, will invest large amounts. Naturally, then, these must be men of large means. And it will be to the national advantage if the bill that is passed incites large numbers of capitalists and large amounts of capital to investment in American-built ships for our foreign trade.

MR. PEABODY'S MISREPRESENTATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

It has been Mr. Peabody's custom to represent the friends of the bill as being opposed to the recommendations of the Administration—especially of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. It would be strange if the President and the Secretary of the Treasury should secretly reveal to Mr. Peabody an opposition that they seem to carefully conceal from the known friends of American shipping and from their own close political and personal friends. Yet Mr. Peabody would have us believe that he had been selected by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury as the sole repository of their confidence with respect to this bill.

It is noticeable that with each new outgiving regarding this bill Mr. Peabody becomes more and more inaccurate in his statements—more and more inexact in his quotations from, or assertions regarding the attitude of, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. He now says that the bill is "not in any sense the fulfillment of the clear-cut recommendations of the Administration in messages to Congress in December, 1898 and 1899; that to recreate our merchant marine, American registry be granted for a short term of years to foreign-built vessels of American ownership, provided the owners become bound to have built in this country like tonnage," etc.

There is only one person who sends "messages" to Congress, and that is the President. In neither of the messages referred to by Mr. Peabody is there the slightest warrant for the statement that the President favors the granting of American registry for a short term of years to foreign-built vessels of American ownership. In his last message the President gave great prominence to this subject and discussed it at some length, and in the previous message it was far less conspicuous. The President does advocate Government aid, as being what other nations are doing for their merchant ships, but he does not even remotely recommend the free American registry of foreign-built ships. Mr. Peabody's statements on this point have been permitted to pass unchallenged so often that he evidently assumes he may deviate from accuracy to serve his own ends without exposure. The very assurance of his latest reference is so amazing, however, that one is forced to dispose of his inaccuracies once and for all. For instance, Mr. Peabody actually has the audacity to suggest, in the letter under review:

"It is well for those to inform themselves, who too readily accept the assertions of the interested parties that the bill is an Administration measure, when it is so unlike the plan recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as part of the President's two last annual messages to Congress."

In his annual message to Congress in 1898, President McKinley said on the subject of American shipping:

"The annexation of Hawaii and the changed relations of the United States to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, resulting from the war, compel the prompt adoption of a maritime policy by the United States. There should be established regular and frequent steamship communication, encouraged by the United States, under the American flag, with the newly-acquired islands. Spain furnished to its colonies, at an annual cost of about two millions of dollars, steamship lines communicating with a portion of the world's markets, as well as with trade centers of the home Government. The United States will not undertake to do less. It is our duty to furnish the people of Hawaii with facilities, under national control, for their export and import trade. It will be conceded that the present situation calls for legislation which shall be prompt, durable, and liberal.

"The part which American merchant vessels and their seamen performed in the war with Spain demonstrates that this service, furnishing both pickets and the second line of defense, is a national necessity, and should be encouraged in every constitutional way.

"Details and methods for the accomplishment of this purpose are discussed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the attention of Congress is respectfully invited."

One will search in vain in the foregoing utterances for any suggestion of the free admission of foreign-built vessels to American registry for a number of years, as alleged by Mr. Peabody. Even if the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury had been in favor of the free registry of foreign-built ships, there is nothing in the President's reference to the Secretary's report suggestive of an indorsement of such a proposition. But, as will be shown, the Secretary of the Treasury made no such recommendation.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE AS DISCUSSED IN THE PRESIDENT'S LAST ANNUAL MESSAGE TO CONGRESS.

Second in importance, in his last annual message to Congress, the President discusses our merchant marine. At that time the pending shipping bill had, in all its chief provisions, been before the country for over a year. It had been favorably reported to each branch of Congress by the House and Senate committees having the bill in charge, early in 1899, and some ten months before the President's last annual message appeared. The bill had been indorsed all over the country by commercial and other associations, and had been widely commended and advocated by the press. If it was at variance with the President's views of what should constitute the wisest legislation on this subject, doubtless he would have employed the opportunity presented in the transmission of his message to Congress to wisely advise that body. That the President considered the subject of importance second only to the need of currency legislation, and pressing for immediate solution, is clear from his extended and earnest utterances. On this subject he said:

"The value of an American merchant marine to the extension of our commercial trade and the strengthening of our power upon the sea invites the immediate action of Congress. Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory so long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress on the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to the country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievements and with its rank among the nations of the earth.

"The past year has recorded exceptional activity in our shipyards, and promises of continual prosperity in shipbuilding are abundant. Advanced legislation for the protection of our seamen has been enacted. Our coast trade, under regulations wisely framed at the beginning of the Government and since, shows results for the past fiscal year unequaled in our records or those of any other power. We shall fail to realize our opportunities, however, if we complacently regard only matters at home and blind ourselves to the necessity of securing our share in the valuable carrying trade of the world.

"Last year American vessels transported a smaller share of our exports and imports than during any former year in all our history, and the measure of our dependence upon foreign shipping was painfully manifested to our people. Without any choice of our own, but from necessity, the departments of the Government charged with military and naval operations in the East and West Indies had to obtain from foreign flags merchant vessels essential for these operations.

"The other great nations have not hesitated to adopt the required means to develop their shipping as a factor in national defense and as one of the surest and speediest means of obtaining for their producers a share in foreign markets. Like vigilance and effort on our part can not fail to improve our situation, which is regarded with humiliation at home and with surprise abroad. Even the seeming sacrifices, which at the beginning may be involved, will be offset later by more than equivalent gains.

"The expense is as nothing compared with the advantage to be achieved. The reestablishment of our merchant marine involves in a large measure our continued industrial progress and the extension of our commercial triumphs. I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacture; which, with the increase of our Navy, means more work and wages to our countrymen, as well as a safeguard to American interests in every part of the world."

Again one will search in vain in those clear-cut, earnest, and statesmanlike utterances for the least shred of indorsement of the policy of admitting foreign built ships to American registry.

SECRETARY GAGE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

To accurately understand Mr. Peabody's contention one must clearly understand the act under which the New York and Paris were admitted to American registry, because it is upon this that Mr. Peabody bases his assertions. The recommendation of Secretary Gage particularly referred to by Mr. Peabody reads as follows:

"Extended application of the principle of the act of May 10, 1892, by virtue of which the St. Louis and St. Paul were constructed in this country upon the registry of the foreign-built steamships New York and Paris, this extension to continue for a short term of years and to be so guarded as to preserve the coasting trade to American-built vessels."

The act of May 10, 1892, provided for the admission of steamships of not less than 8,000 tons, capable of not less than 20 knots speed per hour, "of which not less than 90 per cent of the shares of the capital of the foreign corporation or association owning the same was owned on January 1, 1890," by American citizens, the act further requiring that all of the stock of the company shall be vested in American citizens before the registry is granted. It will be very clear, from the foregoing quotation from the act, that an essential feature was that the ships should have been owned almost wholly by American citizens at a date long antecedent to that of the passage of the act.

Mr. Peabody's contention is that after the passage of the bill under consideration Americans shall be permitted to acquire registry for foreign-built ships they may purchase. But Mr. Peabody would care nothing whatever for the privilege of registry if it were unaccompanied with the privilege of receiving compensation from the Government equal to that given to American built vessels. The act of May 10, 1892, makes no provision anywhere for the payment of subsidies to vessels so registered. More than that, in making his recommendation quoted, Secretary Gage did not contemplate the payment of subsidies or compensation of any kind to the owners of vessels so registered.

It is impossible for Mr. Peabody to offer a scintilla of proof, either direct or indirect, that Secretary Gage's recommendation or his intention in making it contemplated the wholesale admission of any and all kinds of foreign-built vessels for a term of years. The act of May 10, 1892, admitted only vessels of the largest size and the highest speed. To argue from that that the Secretary, in basing his recommendations upon the provisions of that act, meant to have it understood that he was in favor of the admission of any kind of foreign vessel to American register, and the payment of subsidies thereto equal to that paid to American-built vessels, is a stretch of imagination only possible with a man so easily capable as is Mr. Peabody of adjusting an expression into an entirely different meaning from that intended by its author.

There is absolutely no shred of foundation for Mr. Peabody's contention in respect of Secretary Gage, and, even if all that Mr. Peabody says in this respect were literally true, Congress in its wisdom may decide differently from what Mr. Peabody would were he the lawmaking power in toto. Certain it is that, after hearing all that Mr. Peabody has had to say with respect of Secretary Gage's meaning, the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Senate Commerce Committee have each seen fit to favorably report the shipping bill unamended as Mr. Peabody suggested.

INDORSEMENTS BY PUBLIC BODIES.

Mr. Peabody sees fit to attack the accuracy of the indorsements the bill has received from public bodies, like chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and the like. A rampant free-trade organization in New York asserts that it instituted inquiries regarding indorsements of the bill to see if they had been correctly reported. From those making no replies, this free-trade club assumed no indorsement had been given, and this, Mr. Peabody is ready to believe, although in most cases the indorsements were not only adopted at regular meetings of the organizations in question, but certified copies of the same were forwarded to their Representatives in Congress, by whom they were filed, due recognition of which from time to time has appeared in the Congressional Record.

The friends of the bill are justly proud of the indorsements the bill has received, including so many and such strong organizations in all parts of the country. The indorsements and advocacy of the bill in the public press is equally gratifying to its friends and advocates. As one of those friends and advocates, I take delight in appending to this letter a list of such of the organizations as I happen personally to know have indorsed the bill or its principles.

SPECIFIC CASES QUOTED BY MR. PEABODY.

In order to minimize the effects of an indorsement of the bill by the New York Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Peabody is compelled to quote the malicious perversion of the strength of the vote cast from the most malignant and venomous free-trade evening daily newspaper published in the United States—a paper that is so un-American and so hostile to American merchants that its open espousal of foreign dry goods, as being superior to and cheaper than those obtainable in New York, led, more than a year ago, to the almost entire withdrawal of the advertising patronage of the firms in New York whose goods were thus misrepresented. Although this paper at first attempted to coerce and bulldoze and later cajoled and finally beseeched its former advertisers to renew their patronage, to this day but one of the many firms that withdrew has gone back.

The loss sustained by this newspaper, because of its untruthful and un-American statements, has aggregated hundreds of dollars a day during this long period. This is the character of newspaper which Mr. Peabody, professing to be a protectionist, quotes in order to bolster up a lame attempt to question the strength of the vote in the New York Chamber of Commerce in favor of the ship subsidy bill. The fact remains, despite the quotation, that the New York Chamber of Commerce did specifically indorse the principles of the bill after Mr. Peabody had spent weeks in futile preparations to secure a different vote.

The National Board of Trade is an organization representing a great many smaller State and local boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and business mens' associations in different parts of the country. Its annual conventions, held in Washington City, are notable for their large attendances and the character and influence of the representatives of large businesses who attend as delegates. One of the marked features of their annual gatherings is the fervor and enthusiasm with which protective measures for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine are urged upon the attention of Congress.

At the last convention of this board, Mr. Peabody appeared as a delegate, and attempted, as usual, to prevent the adoption of a resolution favoring the passage of the pending bill. He met with his usual failure. Mr. Peabody has attended a number of gatherings of business men in order to oppose resolutions favoring this bill, but I believe he has yet to record his first success. Ignominious defeat has been the usual result. Chagrined by his defeat before the National Board of Trade, smarting under its overwhelming unanimity, he resorts to the columns of the Boston Herald—one of the most tireless advocates of free trade, and one of the most uncompromising opponents of any form of protection—in order to quote what he affects to regard as an act of discourtesy to Secretary Gage in the board's refusal, on Mr. Peabody's amendment, to add to the resolution in favor of the passage of the bill the words "According to the recommendations of Secretary Gage in his last annual report."

Thus deprived of the chance to say that the National Board of Trade did not indorse the shipping bill, Mr. Peabody is forced to continue his misrepresentations of Secretary Gage in a futile attempt to make it appear that the provisions of the bill are contrary to the Administration's recommendations.

NO COMMERCIAL ORGANIZATION QUOTED AGAINST THE BILL.

In quoting from the newspapers referred to, as explained, Mr. Peabody states that he "cites these cases to show the fictitious value of the votes, and much matter furnished by the committee to the press, to appear as editorial, as unreal advocacy." Mr. Peabody's despair must be acute when he is compelled to resort to such trifling in order to attempt to misrepresent the action of two large and influential associations. The evidence of the unanimity with which commercial organizations in all parts of the country support this measure may be assumed from the fact that Mr. Peabody apparently could not find one to quote as being on record in opposition to it. Had he known of one, however obscure, we may be sure he would have exploited it to the limit.

A BOSTON INDORSEMENT.

Says Mr. Peabody, in his open letter:

"The Boston Chamber of Commerce and Merchants' Association of Boston, as I am officially informed, have not passed any resolutions regarding this bill."

My information is that the Boston Chamber of Commerce favors subsidies for the promotion of the American merchant marine. It also advocates the free registry of foreign-built ships. They are of one mind with Mr. Peabody, evidently. It should be stated, however, that the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston is the representative in that city of one of the leading foreign steamship lines, whose interests are opposed to the passage of this bill, of course. Another officer of the same association represents a foreign corporation interested in shipping. The influence of these gentlemen may be relied upon to favor the foreign interests they represent rather than American interests. As to the Boston Merchants' Association, I am informed that on January 16, 1900, a resolution which I will quote, was adopted by its board of directors:

"Resolved, That the Boston Merchants' Association approves the principles in Senate bill 738, introduced by Senator FRYE December 6, 1899, and urges the early enactment of legislation framed upon the principles contained in said bill."

The secretary of this association explains that it is his judgment that the resolution in question refers to the Frye shipping bill, almost identical with that favorably reported by your committee, although the number of the bill quoted in the resolution varies from that of the Senate shipping bill. For my part I am willing to leave the matter for adjustment between Mr. Peabody and the association in question, having but to add that the most influential and representative organizations of this character in Boston are on record in favor of the bill.

THE USUAL MISREPRESENTATION.

Mr. Peabody's references to myself are as untrue, as to the facts as stated, as are all of his other statements herein refuted. Fact and fancy are, as usual, so garbled as to suit his purposes. My success in securing the adoption of resolutions in favor of the bill at the few meetings I have attended being in such direct contrast to his own utter failures, evidently I am singled out for personal misrepresentation merely to give vent to the envy and malice which seems to be consuming the gentleman.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS INDORSING THE BILL.

Mr. Peabody seems to be keenly aware that political conventions in all parts of the country are adopting resolutions in favor of the shipping bill, and he therefore endeavors to discredit them. He even views with unfeigned alarm the possible adoption of similar resolutions in the national platforms of the great political parties. Doubtless he would make a partisan question out of the shipping bill, if thereby he thought he could discredit or defeat it. Even in this hope he seems to be doomed to his usual bitter disappointment. There will be no "politics" in the shipping question this year.

STILL ANOTHER MISSTATEMENT.

Mr. Peabody states that "the shipowner promoters of the Frye bill are mostly interested in the Atlantic trade." My information is that all of the American shipowners interested in the Pacific trade are heartily in favor of the bill. In fact, I have yet to learn of an American shipowner engaged in foreign trade who is not in favor of the passage of the bill.

"TO ADMIT AS FEW FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS AS POSSIBLE."

"Not only is it seen that the object is to admit as few foreign-built vessels as possible," says Mr. Peabody in his letter. Herein he is accurate. That is the very object of the bill—"to admit as few foreign-built vessels as possible." Therefore Mr. Peabody opposes it. He would have the bill admit as many foreign-built vessels as possible. The distinction is clear. The provisions of the bill are such as to give to American workingmen all the employment possible. Mr. Peabody would give as much employment as possible to foreign workingmen in foreign—chiefly British—countries. In this Mr. Peabody is in full accord with every enemy of the bill—in exact accord with every foreign interest opposed to the bill.

MANY NEW SHIPYARDS WILL BE ESTABLISHED.

Mr. Peabody professes to believe that the friends of the bill are afraid that its passage may stimulate the establishment of additional shipyards in the United States. One of the most pronounced hopes of its friends is that many new and extensive shipbuilding plants will be at once established as a result of its passage. They also believe that existing shipyards will be greatly enlarged. Shipyards are in process of establishment to-day, the success or failure of which hinges upon the passage of this bill. Arrangements are perfected for the establishment of a number of others as soon as the bill becomes a law. It is the greatest hope of the friends of the bill that this will occur. It is the greatest fear of the friends of foreign shipping that it will occur.

Foreigners would far rather see Americans—if they are determined to have a merchant marine—buy second-hand foreign-built ships that would be at a disadvantage in competition with new and more economical ships than to see Americans themselves build new ships and leave the old ones in the hands of their foreign rivals. Mr. Peabody aligns himself with every opponent of the bill in suggesting the purchase of second-hand foreign, rather than the construction of new American-built ships for our foreign trade.

AN ABSURD PROPOSITION.

Mr. Peabody would have it appear that if 2,000,000 tons of shipping could at once be added to the American flag—by foreign purchase—it would be a good thing. But, as a practical man, he well knows that such a thing is entirely outside the range of probability, for the reason that immediate purchasers of such tonnage could not be found in the United States. The bill under consideration will cause the admission of from 200,000 to 300,000 tons of foreign-built shipping to American registry and the earliest possible construction of from 400,000 to 500,000 tons of new ships in the United States for the foreign trade.

The average construction in the United States during the last decade for the foreign trade has not exceeded 20,000 tons per annum. To increase this, by the passage of this bill, to 100,000 tons per annum, at once, will be an immense increase. As success attends the venture, the increase will still further expand. But, considering that the immediate additions through registry of foreign-built and the construction of new tonnage will double the present capacity of our foreign-going merchant marine, under this bill, it will be seen that ample provision has been made. When confidence has been given to capital by the performances of this large increase in tonnage, Congress may be depended upon to adjust its laws to the new conditions—conditions not now foreseen.

OWNERSHIP IN SHIPPING OPEN TO ALL OUR CITIZENS.

What has just been said should not be misconstrued. The terms of the bill permit any American citizen, during ten years succeeding its enactment, to acquire as many American-built vessels as he desires and to run them in the foreign trade, receiving compensation therefor equal in amount to that given to other ships under our flag, in proportion to size, speed, and number of voyages made. No preference is shown to any ship, or to any line of ships; all are upon the same basis of compensation, and that basis is cargo carried, size of vessel, speed attained, and voyages made.

COMBINATIONS AND TRUSTS IN PERIL.

As a charterer of foreign ships sailing to and from the United States, it may be that Mr. Peabody foresees such keen competition created by the new American ships built because of the passage of this bill as to very substantially reduce freight rates in the trade in which he has been so conspicuous in maintaining them by an artificial combination or "trust," as already shown. Indeed one of the immediate effects of the passage of this bill will probably be to break all trusts or combinations in restraint of trade on the ocean in which the American people are interested. Such a consummation would be injurious to Mr. Peabody's personal interests, but of the greatest value to American producers and exporters. This may help to explain the persistence of Mr. Peabody's opposition to the bill. Whatever the underlying motives inspiring Mr. Peabody in his opposition, its effect, if successful, will obviously redound only to the advantage of foreign shipowners, a fact that should never be lost sight of in the consideration of his alleged reasons for opposition.

AN ANONYMOUS QUOTATION.

If Mr. Peabody heard, as he alleges he did, some one friendly to the bill say at a public meeting that he was "only concerned in taking care of the fellows who have already invested in foreign ships," and that "the shipbuilders would never consent to carrying on that principle and opening the door to the present investor in foreign ships," much more value would have attached to the quotation if the person quoted had been named. Such anonymous flings are accepted at their real value by discerning people. What the friends of this bill are concerned in is building up an American merchant marine just as quickly and extensively as possible—not by the purchase of foreign, but by the construction of American, ships.

OUR "MULTIMILLIONAIRE SHIPBUILDERS."

The pending bill will create a large and steady demand for new American ships for a number of years. Mr. Peabody speaks of our shipbuilders "with their multimillion dollars capital," who are now "full of business without the foreign trade." In order to persuade Congress to permit the American registry of an unlimited amount of foreign tonnage, he proceeds to argue that Americans with multimillions of capital invested in shipbuilding would not desire to extend and enlarge their plants, and that new shipyards would not be established. If our shipbuilders are multimillionaires, and still continue in the business of building ships, it would be folly to assume that they are opposed to a measure that will increase their opportunities for a larger and more profitable business. And, if it were so, there is no monopoly of shipbuilding possible in this country. We have hundreds of seaports well adapted to the building of ships, and unlimited capital to be secured if the business assures a profit. The experienced foreign builders of ships are in no wise estopped from establishing great plants in the United States for the construction of ships if native builders are indifferent to the opportunities for a profitable increase of American shipbuilding. In short, Mr. Peabody's own argument in respect to the vast capital possessed by American shipbuilders, when analyzed, is self-destructive.

"FULL SUBSIDY" PLEA FOR FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Viewing the matter solely from the point of view of a probable purchaser of foreign-built ships, if his objections to the bill are heeded and his amendments adopted, Mr. Peabody desires that such ships shall receive "equal subsidy" to that given to American-built ships, although he knows and admits that foreign vessels are built "at much lower cost" than are vessels of American construction. If the privilege were open to our citizens to purchase and register as American a foreign-built ship for from 20 to 25 per cent less than they could obtain an American-built ship, and yet receive the same subsidy for the foreign-built ship, of course they would in every case prefer the foreign-built vessel, just as many of our citizens would purchase foreign-made goods if admitted free of duty which they refrain from purchasing because of the duty, purchasing American productions instead.

It will be readily apparent that with an American owner of a cheaper built foreign ship receiving precisely the same subsidy that the owner of a dearer American built ship receives, the latter would be at a disadvantage in competition with the former. Thus our law, if amended as Mr. Peabody proposes, would be for the benefit of the foreign rather than the American built ship. That is to say, the chief purpose of the bill, to secure an American built merchant marine, would, if amended as Mr. Peabody desires, be defeated by its passage.

APPREHENSIVE REGARDING "CORPORATIONS FORMED ABROAD."

Because the National Association of Manufacturers—one of the strongest organizations in the country—unanimously and most heartily favor the passage of the pending bill, Mr. Peabody searched the utterances of its president, Mr. Theodore C. Search, for some expression to which he could suggest an unfriendly criticism. As a result he finds, so he says, that Mr. Search once said that "Corporations formed abroad, controlled by American capital, may also participate" in the benefits of the bill. Although himself allied with foreign owners of vessels in a combination or trust in restraint of trade, Mr. Peabody has a holy horror of "corporations formed abroad," even if "controlled by American capital." Clearly, Mr. Peabody was hard put to it there.

"MAKESHIFT VESSELS" PURCHASABLE ABROAD.

Here is one of Mr. Peabody's most important and profound arguments: "When the Government needed ships it procured them abroad at once," he says; and he adds: "And these makeshift vessels are a poor sop to offer our people for registry for denial of privilege to buy the latest type." How little Mr. Peabody thought, in penning that sentence, that he was then giving his whole case away. If the best that the United States Government could do, in a great emergency, with unlimited means and the most expert buyers, was to secure "makeshift vessels" that "are a poor sop to offer our people," what chance would inexperienced Americans have, in seeking foreign-built ships, to secure those "of the latest type?"

Our Government at the time of their purchase was searching everywhere, ready to pay spot cash, and urgently needing vessels of "the latest type," and yet, according to Mr. Peabody's description, the result was the purchase of merely "makeshift vessels." And yet Mr. Peabody calmly advocates the purchase of 2,000,000 tons of foreign-built vessels for American registry. Where would our citizens obtain them, if the United States Government could not secure them? And this is the reliance—the broken reed—Mr. Peabody would have the American people look to with which to build up an American merchant marine. Does not Mr. Peabody see that he could not have put forward a more urgent and a more potential reason for the rejection of his free-ship proposition than his own admission that the best that can be procured, by the ablest buyer and with the most expert men employed, are "makeshift vessels?"

With this experience, would it not be the height of folly for the United States to put upon our statutes an act admitting an unlimited quantity of foreign-built vessels to American registry, thus creating the delusive hope that vessels of "the latest type" were procurable? Does not the experience of the United States unerringly point to the rejection of all suggestion of dependence upon foreigners to sell us ships of "the latest type" with which to build up our merchant marine? Surely. Self-dependence, it is manifest—dependence upon the shipyards and the ships of the United States—is the only safe dependence of our people for an effective American merchant marine, and it is the only safe reliance of our Government for auxiliary cruisers in time of emergency. "Makeshift vessels!" Mr. Peabody has furnished, himself, the very best reason why free-ship legislation should be rigidly excluded from our statutes.

TOO MANY ADVOCATES OF THE SHIPPING BILL.

Mr. Peabody states that the publication of the names of the active advocates of the bill would "take too long," and therefore he names only a few! He affects to regard as something reprehensible the fact that the bill has many warm advocates. Doubtless if it had but a few he would as glibly point to that fact to discredit the bill, because unsupported by any considerable number of our citizens.

THE OPPONENTS OF THE BILL.

To name the opponents of the bill, Mr. Peabody neglected to state that he would be compelled to go abroad for the list, or else secure it from the active and powerful American agents of foreign shipping interests, whose presence in Washington he affects to be utterly oblivious of. He probably is unaware of the attendance of a man at the public hearings on the bill who has been publicly and repeatedly charged with being "the paid attorney of foreign steamship lines," and which person has not, so far as I am aware, ever denied the charge. If this "paid attorney of foreign steamship lines" prepared the report in opposition to the bill signed by the four minority members of your committee, doubtless Mr. Peabody is unaware of that.

THE POOREST AND THE CHEAPEST FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Contemplating the purchase of foreign-built steamships adapted only for the carrying of cargoes at slow speed, Mr. Peabody does not see any virtue in or necessity for the payment of extra compensation under the bill to high-speed vessels of the greatest value to the Government as auxiliary cruisers in time of necessity. His sole concern is for the poorest, the cheapest foreign-built vessels obtainable, and for the very biggest subsidy from the Government that he can get. It is not remarkable that such a man, in closing his open letter on this subject, should appeal to his loyalty to "his party" as his chief claim to consideration, instead of appealing to his patriotism.

A PATRIOTIC AND MUCH-NEEDED BILL.

If the bill has any merit, or any claim to the consideration of the American people—and this I emphatically claim it has—it is on the high ground of urgent public necessity and the utmost possible public benefit, in which individual profit is a mere incident to the strengthening of our national defense and the creation of a great, powerful, prosperous American industry of the very highest value to the entire American people and of incalculable value to the nation. The bill is an essentially patriotic and urgently necessary measure, and I advocate its adoption solely upon those grounds.

Attached hereto, and a part of this letter, I submit three appendixes, namely: 1. A list of the associations and organizations known to have passed resolutions favorable to the passage of such a bill. 2. A most patriotic and timely article from Harper's Weekly of April 14, 1900, on "Subsidies for American Ships," by Hon. Arthur Sewall, of Maine, the Vice-Presidential candidate of the Democratic party four years ago. 3. A report written for the Republican Club of the City of New York by Mr. A. L. M. Bullown, and which report was unanimously adopted as the views of that club.

I have the honor to remain, with the highest respect and esteem,

Very respectfully, yours,

ALEXANDER R. SMITH.

APPENDIX No. 2.

TO OPEN LETTER TO GEN. C. H. GROSVENOR BY A. B. SMITH, CONTAINING ARTICLE ON "SUBSIDIES FOR AMERICAN SHIPS," BY HON. ARTHUR SEWALL, VICE-PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN 1896.

[Harper's Weekly, Vol. XLIV, No. 2260.]

SUBSIDIES FOR AMERICAN SHIPS, BY ARTHUR SEWALL, LATE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

In the grand vista opened up by this country's expanding importance among the nations of the world there are plainly visible two features of vital concern to the people; first, the finger of destiny pointing to the parting of the ways between isolation from the affairs of the foreign world and a participation in the councils of the great human family; second, the necessity for the restoration of the United States to the proud position once occupied as a leading maritime power. The two are so closely intertwined as to be inseparable. Expansion in territory means increased opportunities for the use of American capital in the direction of maritime commercial expansion. With the acquisition of Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and Hawaii, the United States are brought face to face with the question "Shall we continue to allow other nations to have 90 per cent of the carrying trade of this country while we content ourselves with 10 per cent, or shall we, with the universally recognized foresight of the American man of business, see to it that our commercial expansion runs parallel with the expansion of territory that is part of our destiny?"

Every year the American nation pays to foreigners $200,000,000 for the cost of freight on our exports and imports. The humiliating sight is seen of the farmer growing wheat at a cost of 30 cents a bushel and paying foreign carriers 30 cents or thereabouts a bushel to get it from the Pacific slope to the consumer abroad. Some little profit is derived from the transportation of the wheat to our seaboard, and after that the harvest is reaped entirely by foreigners, with whom the American carrier can not compete because of the lack of profit with conditions as they are to-day. Add to this loss of what should legitimately belong to the American carrier the profit that goes to the firm that insures the wheat, and the bank through whose hands the financial transactions are carried to a conclusion, and some idea is gained of the way we are being beaten by foreign competition in this field that we should rightfully monopolize.

It is time that we brought the maritime power of America to the old honored position it held before the civil war gave it a setback from which it has never since recovered. Without going into the technicalities of the subsidy bill now pending before Congress, it is to the interest of every patriotic citizen to consider what the effect would be of the restoration of the Stars and Stripes to their old place on the commercial seas. Besides the saving of that $200,000,000 that we annually put into the pockets of foreign shipowners for the American carrying trade, the expansion of our maritime fleets means an almost unlimited boom to every mechanical industry in the country. When it becomes profitable for the American capitalist to put his money into the shipbuilding industry there will start up all along our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards vast yards that will give employment to great armies of skilled artisans; the sound of the steam hammer and the glow of the blast furnace will be heard and seen in numberless places where now is only waste land; our railways will be loaded down with freight from the interior to the seaboard, intended for the material of the shipyards; coal will be required in enormous quantities; the iron and steel mines of this resourceful country will be called upon to redouble their efforts to supply the demand for metal in these days of steel and iron ships; the ax and saw will be plied with increased energy in our great lumber regions for the masts and decks of the ships; the engineers will be called upon to furnish the hearts of the steam-propelled monsters that will be turned out as fast as modern skill and energy can build them; in a word, the mechanical industries of the entire continent will be stimulated as they have not been for years. Scarcely a means of employing labor will be left unaffected by the boom. A new era will have dawned in the industries of the nation.

Nor would the benefits from this new order of things cease with the building of the ships. There would accrue to the American skilled mechanic all the advantages that follow in the train of a great established industry. The ships that are built here would be kept in repair here. The cost of maintaining a great fleet of ships is enormous. With the establishment of our own ship yards this money would be spent here instead of being disbursed abroad. The greater the increase in the number of vessels flying the American flag, the faster the wheels of industry will revolve and the better will be the condition of the labor armies.

It is a time in the nation's history pregnant with interest to all who wish for the onward march of commercial prosperity. New avenues of commerce of vast importance are opening up in the Far East, and nearer home in the Antilles and the Pacific. Through these avenues there should steam a continual procession of ships flying the American flag, built in American yards, American from keel to topmast, carrying American freight to American possessions, bringing back the products of American enterprise and energy in these new days, and keeping every penny of the profit of production, of carriage, of sale and barter in the American family. Expansion under those conditions is the only right kind. Let our foreign carrying trade be protected as well as our coastwise trade. We as a nation have declared for protection. Let us be consistent and protect every American ship that sails the seas.

The apathy that has made us almost nowhere in the running as a maritime nation can only be electrified into life by the adoption of radical measures. The American capitalist has stood aloof from the shipbuilding industries because the cheaper cost of labor and of men to man the ships has enabled the foreign shipbuilder to do business on a basis that permits of no profit to the Americans with their higher scale of pay. Therefore it is necessary to attract capital to the shipbuilding industries by some national effort, the reward of which to the nation will be the immense increase in the national industries that I have pointed out. This is what is intended by the subsidy bill. It is argued that the bill will benefit a few. It will benefit the entire nation, as I have shown, by the establishment of great workshops where now there are none, and the immense impetus given to the mechanical arts of the country.

But chiefly the benefit derived will be one that should appeal to every patriotic heart. Why is England mistress of the seas? Not alone because of her mighty navy, but because also of her vast maritime fleets. War ships are out of date in ten years. But the plant that makes it possible to create a navy is always on hand. The maritime nation has a huge auxiliary navy ready for instant call in time of national danger. The value of these craft was amply proven in our late war. With the establishment of shipyards on our splendid seaboard we should be prepared for any emergency. There would be dry docks and coaling stations, repair shops and places of rendezvous, arsenals and depots of supplies, all at our command in time of peace or war. The navy would spring into life as if by magic, just as it did during our civil war, when we were in the heyday of prosperity as a maritime nation. Swift cruisers would be at our command in unlimited numbers, as they are at the command of Great Britain. There would be no reason why the Stars and Stripes should not wave more proudly than any flag afloat, for nowhere could there be found a country whose resources for building its own ships were more ample than ours. The days of the early fifties, when we were the leading maritime nation of the world, would be with us again. Instead of our sending abroad 90 per cent of the money expended by us for ocean freights and putting 10 per cent into our own pockets, the situation would be reversed and the coffers of our merchants would receive the money that now goes to foreigners. Our destiny leads us unerringly on to the two great fields of expansion—territorial and maritime—and this destiny should be heartily welcomed by every patriotic American as the true pathway to national and commercial progress.

APPENDIX No. 3,

TO OPEN LETTER TO GEN. C. H. GROSVENOR BY A. B. SMITH, CONTAINING REPORT ADOPTED BY THE REPUBLICAN CLUB OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, IN FAVOR OF SUBSIDIES FOR AMERICAN SHIPPING IN THE FOREIGN TRADE, UNANIMOUSLY AND ENTHUSIASTICALLY ADOPTED AT THE CLUB'S REGULAR MONTHLY MEETING, MAY 14, 1900.

GOVERNMENTAL AID TO AMERICAN SHIPPING.

"The construction of the American merchant marine and the conservation of our shipyards are as vital to the national interests as the erection of seaboard forts." (Jefferson, 1799.)

"During the last fiscal year American vessels carried the smallest percentage of our exports and imports in our history." (Report of Commission of Navigation, 1899.)

"The people look to the Administration to exert its influence and diplomacy in opening up new markets for the distribution of manufactured products which exceed our own capacity to consume; and they will heartily sustain Congress in imperatively needed legislation to develop a merchant marine for the carriage of our vast and increasing foreign commerce under the protection of the American flag, to the end that the freightage now paid to foreign ships may remain to the American shipbuilder, the American shipowner, the American seaman, and the American mechanic." (Massachusetts Republican platform, 1899.)

"That for the national defense, for the reinforcement of the Navy, for the enlargement of our foreign markets, for the employment of American workingmen in the mines, forest, farms, mills, factories and shipyards, we favor the enactment of legislation which will regain for American ships the carrying of our foreign commerce." (Iowa Republican platform, 1899.)

Those nations which from the earliest antiquity most influenced the surrounding world have been mercantile nations—the Tyrians, the Carthaginians, the Italian Republics, the Dutch, the Hanseatic Cities, Great Britain, and the United States. The ocean is the stage on which the fittest survive. The histories of ancient and mediæval nations need not be reviewed. Those which were great, were great because of their intercourse with distant peoples.

What we shall consider is the progress of modern commercial history from the beginning of the present century. This is about contemporaneous with the commencement of our nation. Then England ranked preeminent as the greatest naval power in the world. The Americans—English in ideas, in sympathies, and in ambition—watched with pride the dawning of an American marine power.

American shipbuilding grew rapidly in respect and influence, and soon we became rivals of Great Britain in the sea-carrying trade. Then questions of internal interest—the acquisition of more American territory, the development of agriculture, mining, and manufacturing, afterwards the profound questions of national integrity, the eradication of slavery, and the reestablishment of the perfected Union—occupied all the energies of our people.

A prosperity, such as before no nation ever knew, engrossed us with our home affairs, so that we neglected utterly those policies which might have ranked us as a naval power without an equal. So marvelous was the country's growth, and so rich was the reward of enterprise, that the United States willingly encouraged, by grants of lands and of money, such plans as promised (the) to develop the unknown regions of our Western country.

So Congress granted the Pacific railroad systems large subsidies of bonds and territory. Encouraged with coal and iron these railroad systems brought back gold and silver.

Such was the success of the national encouragement of American transcontinental traffic that since 1860 over 240,000 miles of railroads have grown under its fostering influence. This is a greater mileage than exists in all of Europe.

The policy was condemned by hostile partisans and short-sighted statesmen as unwarranted and extravagant.

Yet the Government, in return for its enormous outlays, has been paid every dollar, with interest, being over $100,000,000.

The impetus to the country's growth, and the access to its wealth, can not be counted in mere dollars. Every State added to the Union since 1860 owes its admission to Statehood largely to the influence of our national subsidized railroads.

The development of our inland resources was as natural as it was wise. We knew no foreign competition, and we followed the lines of the least resistance. But while we devoted our attention to these questions almost exclusively, the energies of England, France, Germany, Russia, and Japan were being directed to other fields of national endeavor.

The following table gives an idea of the marvelous increase of the commerce of the United States in spite of these conditions. It will serve also to show the rapid decadence of the influence of our ocean merchant ships engaged in foreign trade.

Date.	Total imports and exports.	Per cent carried in American ships.
1825	(About) $ 196,000,000	92
1835	(About) 272,000,000	84
1845	(About) 231,000,000	82
1855	(About) 537,000,000	75
1865	(About) 1,605,000,000	27
1875	(About) 1.200,000,000	26
1885	(About) 1.100,000,000	15
1895	(About) 1.500,000,000	12
1899	(About) 1.700,000,000	8

It will be noticed that the decade including the civil war, as if with one fell stroke, reduced the percentage from 75 to 27 per cent.

During this period ship construction had been revolutionized. The battle of the Monitor and the Merrimac marked a new era in marine history. It dazed the world. From that time metallic ships were to replace those made of wood. It was a discovery like gunpowder and the printing press.

It was to have an influence on future civilization.

England was prompt to take advantage of her opportunity. The United States was plunged in a war for existence, and although our country was rich in iron and labor and in harbors we had neither capital nor experience.

Ocean sailing vessels had given place to ocean steamships, and so fast had been the progress of mechanical contrivance and so exact the skill required by ship constructors that only at the cost of persevering patience and consistent expenditure could this country hope to keep pace with England, the veteran mistress of the seas. The bounties to European shipping were increased, while the United States took no steps to encourage its ocean traffic, dwindling so fast into insignificance.

Unless radical restorative measures be at once adopted, extinction seems inevitable.

Transoceanic carriage is growing in importance. It has become a measure of national prosperity.

In twenty-five years the seagoing steam tonnage of the world has increased from about 4,000,000 to nearly 20,000,000 gross tons, an increase of over 300 per cent. This is at the rate of about 15 per cent yearly. Notwithstanding this increase in ocean steamboat capacity, in the same period the sea tonnage of the United States decreased relatively about 20 per cent.

Last year the American people paid to the owners of foreign vessels over two hundred million dollars for ocean transportation.

What prosperity that should mean to the American shipbuilder, the American shipowner, the American seaman, and the American mechanic.

At the commencement of our Government it was determined that only American ships should navigate the great internal waterways of the country. It also became part of our national policy that only United States ships should engage in the coasting trade.

These were policies of profound political prudence. Seaboard cities are the gateways to a country's interior. Our seaport cities are among the richest in the Union. To have left our coasting trade subject to the competition of rival nations would have done much to discourage our energies and to undermine our national self-reliance and independence. It would have made our seaboard cities the business places of foreign capital and foreign labor. American labor would have been degraded from its high place and the American citizen would have been forced to compete with the poorly paid subjects of less generous and less progressive nations. The wisdom of these policies then adopted, and adhered to consistently ever since, is proven best by the fact that over our Great Lakes there is carried a far greater commerce than over any internal waterways in the world.

The boundary States and terminal cities of these waters have become our richest granaries. Buffalo and Duluth and Minneapolis and Chicago are to-day richer in their accumulated enterprise than any grain ports in Europe. The American tonnage at present enrolled for the coasting trade of the United States is the largest in our history and far greater than the coasting tonnage of any other nation.

The national encouragement of internal and coastwise shipping and the consequent accumulation of commerce has caused the States surrounding the Great Lakes to become as fertile as the districts of the Ganges in India, the Nile in Egypt, even when those were the centers of almost fabulous opulence. Here no foreign ship nor outside power can interfere or compete with our well-paid, well-conducted American shipping. The States bordering on the Mississippi River have been equally fortunate. More American ships sail the Detroit River than enter both London and Liverpool from all the world. Through the locks of Sault Ste. Marie there passes nearly three times more tonnage than passes through the Suez Canal. If such results have been accomplished for our inland waters, like effects must follow from similar causes concerning oceanic traffic. What the policy of encouragement and fair play has accomplished for our lakes and rivers will be experienced by our harbors and seaboard cities. With national encouragement of American shipping, New York, instead of London, will become the financial and commercial metropolis of the world.

England's greatness is shown by her determination to retain and enhance her maritime superiority over the United States. Soon after the war of 1812, England learned that in the ascendency of nations, land warfare must give way to the scientific encounters of marine machinery. Britain learned that with our virgin soil and newborn energies, with our inexhaustible mines of gold and coal and iron and copper, and our millions of acres of prairies and forests, America must soon supplant all Europe in its developments. That with ocean-hugged shores and protected harbors, we must soon possess all those advantages which would make ours the workshop and supply store of the world. Then the statesmen of England resolved that the influence of Great Britain must not wane.

With farseeing diplomacy, and depending upon the fealty of her subjects, the wisdom of her statesmen, and the experience of her sailors, she adopted those measures which have been copied by all great nations excepting our own. She called upon the subjects of the entire British Empire to contribute to this purpose. And the Irish and the Indian peasant alike poured into the British treasury funds, that its maritime power might be increased, and that the British Government might pay bounties to the English shipbuilder, and that England might create and propagate forever a marine population who knew the seas and could navigate them, who knew far-distant lands and would settle them, that England might carry the products of her factories and mines to every corner of the habitable globe, make trade treaties with the natives, and purchase from them and exchange with them their wares.

The nations whose material prosperity have been most marked have favored with most determination a generously subsidized shipping.

The national parsimony of the Italian Government in refusing assistance to Christopher Columbus is the signal example which forever will lower, in the estimation of history, the country of his birth. On the other hand, Isabella of Spain, with imperial spirit and noble generosity, in lending encouragement to the dauntless discoverer of America, made hers the richest country of mediæval Europe.

The policy of the granting of bounties and subsidies for the encouragement of the building and management of merchant vessels when once started has been consistently adhered to by the great nations of Europe.

In 1839 Great Britain began systematically this policy of national assistance. As she watched the prospect of American rivalry, she increased her vigilance and solicitude for her prestige on the seas. The Cunard line of steamships was the first line which received an annual national subsidy. It has accomplished much for England and for international commercial prosperity. But England's purpose is political as well as commercial. England's colonies did not cause so much the developing of her marine power, as did her sustained ocean traffic make possible a continuance of the relationship to her colonies, which is the marvel of history.

Next to England the most remarkable instance of recent national endeavor in the direction of commercial ascendency is the present maritime condition of Germany. After the unification of the German Empire under the leadership of her great chancellor, Bismarck, despite her inland position, her lack of experience in the construction of ocean steamships, her policy of domestic concentration, which had hitherto prevented her from colonizing or exploiting transoceanic countries, Germany, in 1865, voted an annual subsidy of 4,500,000 marks (about one and a half million dollars) for fifteen years to the North German Lloyd Steamship Company for new lines to Asia and Australia. The subsidy was increased last year to about 6,000,000 marks.

Another subsidy of nearly a million marks for a line of steamships to Africa is to be increased this year. A purpose of this subsidy is to develop German export trade in South Africa. The German Empire is endeavoring to control commercially those parts of Asia and Africa which most need the supplies of Europe and America. Germany's sea-going steam tonnage is the fourth largest in the world, and under the benign influence of governmental encouragement has increased since 1874 nearly 700 per cent.

France ranks third in the list of nations in respect to the amount of steam ocean carriage capacity. Besides subsidies of about four million dollars per year to the Messageries Maratimes and the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, her two principal steamship companies, she has for some years annually expended nearly as much more for less important lines.

Italian shipbuilders labor under peculiar disadvantages. Italy has little coal or iron of her own. Nevertheless Italian legislation fosters national navigation and shipbuilding. And although the laws of ship subsidy regulation did not become operative in Italy until 1886, the Italian steam merchant marine has increased in 20 years about 400 per cent.

Japan's enterprising spirit for some years has won the world's admiration. She has paid large subsidies to her principal ocean lines, and by a law enacted in 1896 gives general construction and navigation bounties. To-day her navy ranks seventh in the entire world.

Together the seven maritime nations of Europe and Japan last year expended in bounties, subsidies, subventions, and mail contracts, for the encouragement of their shipping interests, more than $26,000,000.

The following schedule will indicate approximately how much the separate nations paid for this purpose for the year ending June 30, 1899.

Great Britain (nearly)	$6,000,000
France (over)	7,000,000
Japan (about)	3,500,000
Germany (nearly)	2,000,000
Austria (nearly)	2,000,000
Italy (over)	2,000,000
Spain (nearly)	2,000,000
Russia (nearly)	1,500,000

It will be noticed that, although legislation on this subject is comparatively recent, the tendency to strengthen it is very marked.

To ascertain why the United States, so successful in most lines of industry, should be so far behind in shipbuilding and mercantile navigation, and how this state of affairs may best be remedied, is the purpose of this paper.

We have seen that in 1825 the merchant vessels of the United States carried over 90 per cent of our imports and our exports; how gradually until 1855 it fell to 75, and in 1899 the proportion carried by American-built and American-owned vessels dropped to about 8 per cent. This means that foreign vessels have replaced those of the United States, and that they receive and take away from this country more that $200,000,000 each year as freight and charges upon our imports and exports. This is at the rate of over $600,000 per day.

Unless our Government determines to secure the restoration and the extension of American ocean navigation, so fast passing out of existence, other nations will very soon absorb the ocean-carrying of our entire foreign trade. Unless legislation is enacted to enable American-built vessels to compete with the subsidized and bountied merchant ships of foreign countries, the carriage of our imports and exports may be transferred from us forever.

Dare we permit such a state of affairs longer to continue? American pride and self-interest, political as well as commercial, forbid it. Then, too, should not the American nation contemplate with anxiety the relationship of Great Britain and ourselves? Great Britain's steam tonnage amounts to about 60 per cent of the steam tonnage of the entire world; that of the United States to less than 4 per cent. Great Britain, too, deems it necessary with a navy equal to that of any three world powers combined to maintain her mighty fleet of auxiliary cruisers. It is now time that the American people assume their proper position regarding the great foreign trade now in full view, and for which the great nations of Europe are striving with all their might.

The United States must take its stand at once, and it can not afford to recede a single step. Political as well as commercial reasons demand it.

In his last message President McKinley said:

"The expense is as nothing compared to the advantage to be achieved. The reestablishment of our merchant marine involves in a large measure our continued industrial progress and the extension of our commercial triumphs. I am satisfied the judgment of the country favors the policy of aid to our merchant marine, which will broaden our commerce and markets and upbuild our sea-carrying capacity for the products of agriculture and manufacture, which, with the increase of our Navy, mean more work and wages to our countrymen, as well as a safeguard to American interests in every part of the world."

Mr. Alexander R. Smith, the earnest advocate of American shipping, says:

"Our legitimate interests in the development of the markets of Asia are as great as those of any European power. Our geographical opportunities for sharing in those markets are superior to those of any European nation." Let us see.

The markets of eastern China supply 500,000,000 people. England, France, Germany, and Russia are jealously contending for this trade.

We sell them but $20,000,000 per year.

Japan's foreign trade amounts to $250,000,000. Her population is only about 40,000,000. These two markets represent about one-half only of the population of eastern Asia.

The United States stands at the portals which open upon the most populous, most fertile, and most promising regions in the world. We control 800 miles of coast line of the Philippine Islands. Our trade with eastern Asia should amount to over $1,000,000,000 annually.

Manila should become the distributing center of the eastern world—the London or the New York of the Pacific.

Each year we are closer to Asia and Australia. What markets for our commodities do not Central and South America offer! With the prospect of an American canal through the Isthmus, the distances to the Far East and western coast of South America soon will be diminished to our advantage; that the Pacific coast and the Gulf coast will vie with the Atlantic harbors in their shipping interests, and new San Franciscos will grow up on our western ocean. New York and Philadelphia will be nearer to Asia (and) than Liverpool and London.

Governmental aid promotes and protects the development of the foreign trade of all the great nations of Europe. It is not left to individual enterprise or combination.

Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy, and Japan annually grant about $5,000,000 to develop the Asian trade. For the same purpose the United States expended last year $48,451, a melancholy commentary on the neglect of national duty! The same considerations apply to the efforts to develop trade with South Africa and the lesser Americas. Any systematic effort to develop our trade in these markets will require encouragement similar to that granted by competing nations.

Concerning an American ship subsidy plan, the political effects are certain. The present state of our national affairs makes it advisable that the United States shall impress favorably those communities with which we do business. A well-disciplined, highly organized modern steamship, capacious, swift, majestic, deeply impresses those who contemplate it and its creation. Besides the effect on the outside world, the stimulation of our own national pride and the awakened sense of conscious excellence will tend to national dignity and respect.

Another effect of the encouragement of the merchant marine is the reenforcement of our Navy by the establishment of a shipping to be used in times of war as well as in times of peace. No steamship should be entitled to a subsidy benefit unless it be so constructed that in case of emergency and when needed for war purposes it may be utilized by the United States. What the country needs is reliable and capacious vessels which will increase the wealth and respect of the nation in times of peace, and which can be utilized in times of war for attack as well as for domestic protection.

An American-guarded seaboard and the influences of American ships and American seamen will lessen largely the cost of our military equipments. The question of foreign invasion or attack can be eliminated from our remotest anxieties only by the establishment and maintenance of American vessels capable of being utilized as ships of war.

A further benefit is that the encouragement of a merchant marine will mean the training of Americans as citizen seamen. The training will be dignified by the knowledge that they will form part of the standing navy of their country. The American seaman at present receives about double the pay of the European sailor. He should continue to earn it in efficiency and responsibility. "The officers of our ships should be active, intelligent, and interested agents for the discovery of new markets and the promotion of our trade."

Of course Great Britain, Germany, and France will not surrender their maritime supremacy without a determined effort. According to Senator Frye, the rivalry of the United States will reduce freight rates at least 25 per cent. It is estimated that the amount of our foreign commerce is about 50,000,000 tons. The average ocean freight is $4 a ton. Twenty-five per cent reduction of rates will save to our people $50,000,000 annually. Lower freights will make necessary larger and more modern vessels in order to maintain profits. This means the development of new machinery, perhaps of a new motive power. It will mean that the economy of coal and energy must still continue to reduce the cost of transportation. The cheaper freight charges become, the easier will be our competition with other countries, and our agriculture products and our cereals will replace those of other countries. Europe and Asia and Africa will demand our wheat, our corn, and our rice.

Under a system of generous subsidy encouragement, enough to establish shipbuilding plants capable of producing the highest development of the perfect steel vessel, enough to pay to our mechanics and our seamen wages commensurate with his accomplishments and his responsibility, enough to maintain for him all his high privilege and immunities as an American citizen, the industry of shipbuilding and its hundreds of allied trades and occupations will receive such an impetus that our factories long will be kept lighted and our forges ring with the demands for new ships from every side. Our national facilities, our coal and wood and steel, our opportunities for labor in the harbors of the East and especially of the Gulf, must soon invite all other countries to purchase from the United States steam vessels as they do now steam engines and machinery.

As the United States has developed its railroad systems and its internal waterways and its coasting trade, so, too, with a fair start and even opportunities, it will accomplish its proper share in transoceanic commerce.

"Subsidy has been and is the motor that drives all the merchant marines of Europe."

Concerning subsidized steamships the United States minister at Buenos Ayres writes: "I discovered that Germany has by this means increased her exports to the Argentine Republic in eight years from two and one-half to fifteen millions. It matters little what specific term we apply to the stimulant to assure outreach of marine steam. The stimulant is necessary."

A country's merchant marine should be a source of national strength, therefore it is entitled to national consideration.

It should be a source of national wealth and ought to be encouraged.

As it is an element of national integrity it must be maintained.

Jefferson, while Secretary of State in the Administration of President Washington, submitted to the Congress at its request a report on commerce and navigation and said:

"Our navigation involves the highest considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable; but as a resource of defense essential. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear from their land board and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on the seaboard they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected.

"This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen and artists, and establishments in readiness for shipbuilding. If particular nations grasp at undue shares, and more especially if they seize upon the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protective measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defense, its productions will be at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, can not be resumed in the moment we desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies we lose the permanent means of marine defense, and time will be requisite to raise up others when disgraced, or losses shall bring home to our feelings the disgrace of having abandoned them."

When Jefferson wrote thus American ships carried 75 per cent of our foreign commerce under protective legislation.

Sir J. H. Heaton, a member of the British Parliament, considering the subject of ship subsidy, writes as follows:

"For many years American mails (as well as American goods) were carried to Europe almost exclusively in British vessels. Early in the century the British Government adopted the sagacious policy of subsidizing the shipping companies which ran vessels to the colonies and to foreign countries. Infant settlements like Port Jackson (Sydney), of the Cape, could not, of course, supply trade enough to make the voyages remunerative. And now that such settlements have shot up into rich and powerful colonies the subsidies are continued on a more lavish scale, on two conditions: First, that the subsidized vessels shall be constructed so as to be easily converted into cruisers in case of war; second, that they shall carry the mails.

"This policy of State aid was so brilliantly successful in developing trade and maintaining the supremacy of the British mercantile marine that it was adopted in turn by all the great powers, with the single exception, until quite recently, of the United States. As American ships were not subsidized their owners could not compete with the Cunard and other companies, the art of shipbuilding languished, and the American carrying trade was transferred to foreign bottoms. In 1891 only 13 per cent of the exports from the United States was carried in American ships, which at one time had engrossed 90 per cent.

"As a consequence of refusing $5,000,000 a year in subsidies during thirty years to native shipowners, or $150,000,000, the United States had to pay, in the same period no less than $3,000,000,000 for freights, while their mercantile marine dwindled into insignificance. The fact that the country bore this heavy drain upon its earnings so long without feeling it, as if it had been a flea-bite, affords the highest possible proof of its amazing vitality and vigor. At the same time, one is puzzled to understand why the proverbial shrewdness of the American, unfailingly exhibited in his private affairs, was missing for more than a generation in this important section of national business."

In a recent speech in the United States Senate, Senator Depew said:

"The markets for the products of our farms and factories accessible by the Atlantic Ocean will soon be filled. But across the Pacific are limitless opportunities. Within a distance from Manila not much greater than Havana from New York live 900,000,000 people, purchasing now annually from all nations of the things which we produce to the sum of $1,000,000,000, of which we furnish 5 per cent. That 5 should be 50 per cent."

The opportunities are so splendid; the prizes so rich; the numbers so prodigious, that the mind is dazed and the imagination confounded. A mere recital seems like a wild exaggeration. The numerals are so much as we have not before seen or written.

Our forefathers saw with prophetic vision the magnificent future that their children were to inherit and they made provisions for it. They delegated to Congress the right at all times to regulate the commerce and the navigation of the nation. Our possessions in the West and in the East Indies should make it essential for us to familiarize these people with our power, our methods, our language, our ships. We should make them feel that they can obtain from the United States and its possessions whatever is necessary for the wants of a growing people, and they should have an interest in supporting that Government which is the common benefactor of all its peoples. They will then willingly contribute directly to the support of that adjunct of the Government which will enable them to cooperate and to become more closely united. They will then take a pride in their own institutions and feel their independence of outside powers.

Considering the history of the past two years, What would we not have accomplished with an adequate merchant marine? That war with Spain has cost us nearly $300,000,000. With how much less could we not have provided our Navy with a merchant marine "so strong and so effective that any enemy would have recognized the utter futility of resistance and have promptly evacuated Cuba upon our demand without the loss of a man or a dollar!"

It is not well to anticipate the dismal side of history; but eternal vigilance is the price of safety. As suddenly and unexpectedly as the war with Spain was forced upon us, so again we may feel it to be our duty, on short notice, to prevent the oppression or the extermination of a helpless people. Perhaps our own citizens, or those whom we have pledged ourselves to care for and protect, may be attacked or abused. When this happens, the American people will again stand together, determined not to look carelessly on the suffering of their fellow-men. Should the enemy happen to be Great Britain, or Germany, or France, or Russia, or Japan, shall we be unprepared? Will the other nations, reading the history of this war, make no effort to take advantage? Will we do nothing except hope for a repetition of the unparalleled performance at Manila and at Santiago? Our nation which has accomplished so much, establishing precedents and making laws, now feels it to be its paramount duty to provide for the recruitment and aid of our Navy before disaster and defeat make clear to us our perilous weakness upon the sea.

We therefore earnestly recommend that Congress promptly adopt measures to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary.

The Record of the Democratic Party in Relation to the Annexation of Noncontiguous Territory.

OF
HON. W. B. SHATTUC,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 14, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11537) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes—

Mr. SHATTUC said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Of the many inconsistencies presented by the record of the Democratic party none is more striking than that of its present attitude in opposition to the expansion resulting from the Spanish-American war. In some remarks submitted to this House on March 31 I called attention to the fact that the party which is now opposing expansion had in fact added every foot of territory to our original area, except that of Alaska, and in practically every case had done so without reference to the "consent of the governed;" and this fact has also been presented in much detail by others. Driven to the wall by this presentation of well-known historical facts, the response of the leaders of that party has been that the area which it added was contiguous and practically unoccupied territory, while that recently added (as an incident of the war with Spain) is noncontiguous and already occupied by people of another race and different characteristics.

In making this defense of their new attitude of opposition to expansion, they seem to imagine that the people of this country have forgotten comparatively recent history. In some former remarks upon this subject before this House I pointed out the fact that the Democratic party in three national conventions and two national platforms in 1860 adopted a resolution demanding that the next administration should obtain possession of Cuba, and without reference to the "consent of the governed." I now propose to examine more closely and somewhat in detail the history of that party with reference not only to Cuba but to other islands and noncontiguous territory, and show by indisputable evidence that its attitude from the very foundation of the party to the termination of the slavery period was in favor of the acquisition not only of Cuba but of other islands and noncontiguous territory—any spot, in fact, in which it could extend slavery and by so doing increase the vote of the slave-holding party in Congress.

I propose, first, to relate, in brief and consecutive form, the history of the Democratic efforts to acquire Cuba, the Hawaiian Islands, Yucatan, and the Danish West Indies, and to put on record such extracts from official documents and messages as will preserve in permanent form the expansion history of this Democratic party which is now denouncing expansion (which came to us, excepting Hawaii, as incidents and results of the war with Spain) in the very territory of which its most distinguished leaders tried to obtain control. From Jefferson to Buchanan, the constant and consistent record of the party is for the acquisition of island as well as non contiguous territory, and it was only with the termination of slavery that the party, as a party, abandoned this effort. It was only after the possibility of the extension of this curse of mankind—slavery—had passed away that we find a Democratic President so far departing from the established principle of expansion as to be willing to haul down the American flag in Hawaii, where it had been hoisted in compliance with the wishes of the people of those islands and the approval of those of the United States, with the "consent" of both the governed and the governing.

No man is more revered by the Democratic party, if it is capable of genuine reverence for anybody or anything, than Thomas Jefferson. Its leaders annually celebrate the date of his birth, and point to him as the father of their party; yet Jefferson clearly favored the annexation of Cuba and put himself plainly on record in favor of it. In a letter written August 10, 1807, during his second term as President, and addressed to Madison, his Secretary of State, discussing the possibilities of a war with European countries, he said:

I had rather have war with Spain than not, if we are to go to war against England. Our Southern defenses can take care of the Floridas, volunteers from the Mexican army will flock to our standard, and rich pabulum will be offered to our privateers in the plunder of their commerce and coasts; probably Cuba would add itself to our confederation.

Two years later, writing again to Madison, who was then President, he said:

I suppose the conquest of Spain will soon offer a delicate question to you as to the Floridas and Cuba, which will offer themselves to you. Napoleon will certainly give his consent without difficulty to our receiving the Floridas, and, with some difficulty, possibly Cuba.

A week later he writes again:

That Napoleon would give us the Floridas to withhold intercourse with the residue of these colonies can not be doubted, but that is no price, because they are ours in the first moment of the first war; but, although with difficulty, he will consent to our receiving Cuba into our Union to prevent our aid to Mexico and the other provinces. That will be a price, and I would immediately erect a column on the southernmost limit of Cuba, and inscribe on it a ne plus ultra as to us in that direction. We should then only have to include the North in our confederacy, which would be, of course, in the first war, and we should have such an empire for liberty as she has never surveyed since the creation, and I am persuaded no constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government.

Opportunity did not then offer for the Democracy to follow the advice of Mr. Jefferson and extend over Cuba the Constitution, which he was persuaded was "so well calculated for extensive empire and self-government," and therefore we find him again in 1823 writing to President Monroe a letter from which the official Democratic text-book issued by the Democratic party in the year of our Lord 1898, only two years ago, quotes triumphantly the following sentences:

It is better, then, to lie still in readiness to receive that interesting incorporation (Cuba) when solicited by herself. That addition to our confederacy is exactly what is wanted to round our power as a nation to the point of its utmost interest.

A few months later he wrote again to President Monroe:

I candidly confess that I have ever looked upon Cuba as the most interesting addition that could be made to our system of States.

Mr. Jefferson's advice in regard to Cuba was evidently not lost upon President Monroe, who, in a letter of June 30, 1823, quoted by Prof. James Morton Callahan, of Johns Hopkins University, in his recent work on Cuba and International Relations, says:

I have always agreed with you in the sentiment that too much importance could not be attached to that island (Cuba), and that we ought, if possible, to incorporate it into our Union, availing ourselves of the most favorable moment for it, hoping also that one would arise when it might be done without a rupture with Spain or any other power. I consider Florida and Cuba as forming the mouth of the Mississippi and other rivers emptying into the Gulf of Mexico within our limits, as of the Gulf itself, and in consequence that the acquisition of it to our Union is of the highest importance to our internal tranquillity as to our prosperity and aggrandizement.

As the country grew and the sentiment against slavery strengthened, the supporters of that Democratic institution in Congress saw more clearly every year the importance of following the advice of the founder of their party and extending over Cuba and whatever other territory they could annex that Constitution which Jefferson had described as "so well calculated for extensive empire and self-government." Even as early as 1826, in discussing a bill looking to a canal across Florida, it was urged that such a canal would protect Southern interests in case Cuba should pass into the possession of a foreign power, and, in reply to this, Randolph said:

If all constitutional restraints are to be pushed aside, let us take Cuba, and be done with it.

As the control of the slave power in Congress grew more attenuated with the growth of representation from the North, agitation for the annexation of Cuba increased. Everett, in his "Miscellaneous Essays," published in 1845, says:

The subject of Cuba will be brought, we fear, by the irresistible power of circumstances but too frequently to the notice of the people of the United States.

In the same year the Democratic Vice-President, Dallas, at a public dinner, toasted "The annexation of Cuba." In December of that year Mr. Levy (alias Yulee), a Senator from Florida, offered a resolution directing the President to open negotiations with Spain for the cession of Cuba, while a similar resolution was offered in the House.

President Polk, who came into office in 1845, cordially supported the Democratic sentiment in favor of additional slave territory, and, finding that the territory added through his war with Mexico could not be relied upon for that purpose, immediately after that war planned for the annexation of Cuba. Professor Callahan, discussing this question, says:

As soon as the struggle with Mexico was closed, Polk, ready to accept more land, undertook to annex Cuba. On May 30, 1848, at the beginning of a new Presidential canvass, and even before the ratification of peace with Mexico, he brought the subject before his Cabinet, and favored a fair purchase, and on June 6 he brought the subject before the Cabinet again. A day or so later news of the peace with Mexico arrived. * * *

Polk was a man of oral confidence, and he and Buchanan, his Secretary of State, preferred to wrap the negotiations with Spain as to Cuba in secrecy.

Polk's instructions to Saunders, then minister to Spain, were profoundly confidential; they were written June 17, 1848, but held back from the clerks for record until February 25, 1849. In his instructions Polk told Saunders to begin his negotiations by a confidential conversation concerning the distractions in Cuba; * * * to avoid any absolute refusal in treating which might embarrass the United States hereafter in acquiring Cuba, and to suggest that, on account of the situation in the Spanish cabinet and the relations with foreign governments, it was proper to avoid record of the Cuban negotiations.

That this statement of President Polk's negotiations for the purchase of Cuba is accurate can not be doubted, and the assertion is sustained by such distinguished authority as the present leader on the Democratic side of this House, Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, who, in the index to his Messages and Papers of the Presidents, says of Cuba:

President Polk made a proposal in 1848 for the purchase of the island by the American Government for $100,000,000.

President Polk's negotiations were unsuccessful because the Spanish Government did not desire to part with Cuba; but the slave power in Congress continued the agitation in favor of the scheme, with the election of Pierce, who succeeded him in the White House in 1853. Speeches were made in the House and Senate in favor of the acquisition of Cuba. Senator Mason, afterwards of Confederate fame, in a speech favoring the acquisition of Cuba said that its acquisition should not be attempted by forcible or unlawful methods, but added that "in the fullness of time the fruit will ripen and fall from the parent stem." Cass expressed a willingness to purchase Cuba, even at an extravagant price, and said:

It is pretty well known that I have a capacious swallow for territory, although we can wait if necessary and spend the time digesting our last acquisitions (the result of the war with Mexico), that sit lightly on the stomach and promise to promote the health of the body politic beyond expectation.

Soulé urged that the Government should not delay too long in plucking the Cuban fruit referred to by Mason as likely to "ripen and fall from the parent stem in the fullness of time," and asked:

Will the plucking of it when ripe be less marauding than the plucking of it while still green?

Mallory, also representing the slave power, was even more radical than Soulé, and, referring to the advantages of Cuba and the necessity of its acquisition, remarked that "Heaven helps those that help themselves."

President Pierce, when he came into office, made no concealment of his desire to extend the control of that constitution which Mr. Jefferson had characterized as "so well calculated for extensive empire and self-government," and in his inaugural address said:

Our position and attitude might render the acquisition of certain possessions not within our jurisdiction eminently important for our protection.

In the month following the election—

says Callahan—

Buchanan had told Pierce that he should make the purchase of Cuba the chief aim of his Administration, and thus render his name as illustrious as that of Jefferson, who had procured Louisiana for the Union.

With a view to this, apparently, Buchanan was sent as minister to London, Soulé to Spain, and Mason to France; and on April 8, 1854, Marcy, Pierce's Secretary of State, sent Soulé confidential instructions as to the purchase of Cuba, saying that the President considered $100,000,000 a liberal price, but that he would not have the annexation fail even if an additional thirty millions were required. Soulé entered upon the negotiations as directed, but they were again rejected by Spain, and this combination of supporters of the slave power evidently concluded that if fair means were unsuccessful others should be attempted; and, as a consequence, Ministers Buchanan, Mason, and Soulé were directed to hold a conference and announce the sentiment which they represented upon this subject. They held that conference at Ostend and gave to the public the celebrated "Ostend manifesto," which said:

Our past history forbids that we should acquire the island of Cuba without the consent of Spain unless justified by the great law of self-preservation. * * * After we shall have offered Spain a price for Cuba far beyond its present value, and this shall have been refused, it will then be time to consider the question, Does Cuba, in the possession of Spain, seriously injure our internal peace and the existence of our cherished Union? Should this question be answered in the affirmative, then by every law, human and divine, we shall be justified in wresting it from Spain if we possess the power.

A declaration of which Lossing, the historian, says:

The bold iniquity of the proposition amazed honest men in both hemispheres.

Even the failure of these attempts of Pierce's Administration to obtain Cuba by purchase, or, if public sentiment would consent, by force, did not discourage the Democratic party, for in the national convention nominating Buchanan as Pierce's successor, it declared that—

The Democratic party will expect of the next Administration that every proper effort be made to insure our ascendency in the Gulf of Mexico and to maintain permanent protection to the great outlets which are emptying into its waters—and that the Administration of Franklin Pierce has been true to Democratic principles.

President Buchanan, who followed Pierce, continued the efforts, openly and secretly, in favor of the annexation of Cuba. In a message to Congress, on December 6, 1858, he said:

It has been made known to the world by my predecessors that the United States have, on several occasions, endeavored to acquire Cuba from Spain by honorable negotiation. * * * The island of Cuba, from its geographical position, commands the mouth of the Mississippi and the immense and annually increasing trade, foreign and coastwise, from the valley of that noble river now embracing half the sovereign States of the Union. With that island under the dominion of a foreign power this trade, of vital importance to these States, is exposed to the danger of being destroyed in time of war, and it has hitherto been subjected to piratical injury and annoyance in times of peace. Our relation with Spain, which ought to be of the most friendly character, must always be placed in jeopardy while the constituted colonial government over the island shall remain in its present condition.

While the possession of the island would be of vast importance to the United States, its value to Spain is comparatively unimportant. * * * The publicity which has been given to our former negotiations upon this subject and the large appropriation which may be required to effect the purpose render it expedient, before making another attempt to renew those negotiations, that I should lay the whole subject before Congress. This is especially necessary, as it becomes indispensable to success that I should be entrusted with the means of making an advance to the Spanish Government immediately after signing the treaty, without awaiting the ratification of it by the Senate. I am encouraged to make this suggestion by the example of Mr. Jefferson previous to the purchase of Louisiana from France, and by that of Mr. Polk in view of the acquisition of territory from Mexico. I lay the whole subject before Congress and commend it to their careful consideration.

In another message, December 19, 1859, he says:

I need not repeat the arguments which I urged in my last annual message in favor of the acquisition of Cuba by fair purchase. My opinions on that measure remain unchanged. I therefore again invite the serious attention of Congress to this important subject. Without a recommendation on this policy on their part, it will be impossible to institute negotiations with any reasonable prospect of success.

In his message of December 3, 1860, President Buchanan says:

I reiterate the recommendation contained in my annual message of December, 1858, and repeated in that of December, 1859, in favor of the acquisition of Cuba from Spain by fair purchase. I firmly believe that such an acquisition would contribute essentially to the well-being and prosperity of both countries in all future time.

Nothing is said in any of the three recommendations of President Buchanan as to any attempt to inquire into the wishes of the people of Cuba or to obtain the "consent of the governed" before the Government of the United States should be extended over the island. So anxious was he, however, upon this subject that, in a special message to Congress on January 21, 1859, in answer to a resolution of inquiry calling for correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Spain regarding the purchase of the island, he says:

It appears that no such correspondence has taken place which has not already been communicated to Congress. In my last annual message I stated, in reference to the purchase of Cuba, that "the publicity which has been given to our former negotiations on this subject and the large appropriation which may be required to effect the purpose render it expedient, before making another attempt to renew the negotiations, that I should lay the whole subject before Congress." I still entertain the same opinion, deeming it highly important, if not indispensable, to the success of any negotiation which I might institute for this purpose that the measure should receive the previous sanction of Congress.

During the Buchanan Administration the annexation of Cuba continued to receive attention in Congress. A bill was introduced by Senator Slidell providing for an appropriation of $30,000,000 to facilitate the acquisition of Cuba, and was favorably reported. In the discussion which followed, Robert Toombs, who once promised to call the roll of his slaves at the foot of Bunker Hill, expressed a desire for Cuba, both for its wealth and as a stepping-stone across the Caribbean, and saw no objection to its acquisition by treaty or by war.

It ought to be declared to be our settled policy—

he said,

as far as it can honestly and fairly be done, to unite all the Tropics under our flag.

Reuben Davis, of Mississippi, favored the acquisition by force rather than by purchase.

I propose—

that we shall take it now—take it in its perfection, redolent with the rich colors of its budding flowers and tropical fruits and productions.

Taylor, of Louisiana, desired it in order to increase the slavery influence in Congress, and plainly said so. He offered as a substitute for the bill another measure specifically authorizing the President to pay $120,000,000 for Cuba and to issue bonds for the amount, and also to provide for erecting Cuba into a new State. Benjamin, of Louisiana, also spoke in favor of the measure. Stephens, of Georgia, afterwards vice-president of the Confederacy, favored expansion not only as to Cuba but to Mexico and Central America; and on July 6, 1859, Jefferson Davis, in a speech before the Mississippi Democratic convention, said that the laws against the slave trade should be repealed and Cuba should be acquired.

he said—

benefit the whole Union if the Union continued, and be a still greater advantage to the South in case of a new confederacy.

With all these efforts of a Democratic President in the White House and Democrats in Congress, the attempt failed, and the Democratic convention which met in Charleston to nominate a successor to Buchanan adopted a resolution already quoted by me in this House:

Resolved, That the Democratic party are in favor of the acquisition of the island of Cuba upon such terms as shall be honorable to ourselves and just to Spain.

That convention failed to nominate, but the two Democratic conventions held at Baltimore and Richmond, which were its successors and which made separate nominations for the Presidency, each adopted that resolution, which expressed the sentiment of the Democratic party from the time of Jefferson to the close of that campaign, which ended slavery, and therefore ended Democratic ambitions for Cuba.

DEMOCRATIC SCHEME TO ANNEX YUCATAN.

The record of the Democracy in favor of expansion to noncontiguous territory does not cease with the history of its Cuban negotiations and schemes. President Polk, when the expansion fever was at its height, in a special message to Congress April 29, 1848, called attention to the opportunities for expansion then existing in Yucatan, saying:

The white inhabitants of Yucatan have been reduced to a condition of extreme suffering by an insurrection of the Indians, and have already, through their constituted authorities, implored the aid of this Government to save them from destruction, offering, in case this should be granted, to transfer the dominion and sovereignty of the peninsula to the United States. Similar appeals for aid and protection have been made to the Spanish and English governments.

We have now authentic information that if the aid asked from the United States be not granted such aid will probably be obtained from some European power, which may hereafter assert a claim to dominion and sovereignty over Yucatan. Yucatan has never declared her independence, and we treated her as a State of the Mexican Republic. For this reason we have never officially received her commissioner, but whilst this is the case we have to a considerable extent recognized her as a neutral in our war with Mexico. While still considering Yucatan as a portion of Mexico, if we had troops to spare for this purpose, I would deem it proper, during the continuance of the war with Mexico, to occupy and hold military possession of her territory.

THE DANISH WEST INDIES WANTED.

Another attempt at the addition of noncontiguous territory was made by President Andrew Johnson after his desertion of the Republican party and during the time in which he was receiving the cordial support of the Democratic party as President. In a message to Congress, on December 3, 1867, he says:

The West India islands were settled and colonized by European states simultaneously with the settlement and colonization of the American continent. * * * Although possessing considerable commercial value, they have been held by the several European states which colonized or at some time conquered them chiefly for the purpose of military and naval strategy.

In our Revolutionary war ports and harbors of the West India islands were used by our enemies to the great injury and embarrassment of the United States. We had the same experience in our second war with Great Britain. In our recent civil war the rebels and their piratical and blockade-running allies found facilities in the same ports for the work which they too successfully accomplished in injuring and devastating the commerce which we are now engaged in rebuilding. * * * I agree with our early statesmen that the West Indies naturally gravitate to and may be expected ultimately to be absorbed by the continental states, including our own. I agree with them, also, that it is wise to leave the question of such absorption to the principles of natural political gravitation. The islands of St. Thomas and St. John, which constitute a part of the group called the Virgin Islands, seem to offer us advantages immediately desirable, while their acquisition should be secured in harmony with the principles to which I have alluded. A treaty has therefore been made with the King of Denmark for the cession of these islands, and will be submitted to the Senate for consideration.

ACQUISITION OF SAN DOMINGO SUGGESTED.

Mr. Johnson's ambition to cause the islands of the Caribbean to "gravitate to the United States" was not confined to St. Thomas and St. John, for, in a message sent to Congress on December 9, 1868, after again calling attention to his treaty with the King of Denmark for the purchase of the islands of St. Thomas and St. John on the "best terms then attainable," he calls attention to conditions in other islands in those waters, and says:

It can not be long before it will become necessary for this Government to lend some effective aid to the solution of the political and social problems which are continually kept before the world by the two republics of San Domingo, and which are now disclosing themselves more distinctly than heretofore. The subject is commended to your consideration with all the more earnestness because I am satisfied that the time has now arrived when so direct a proceeding as a proposition for annexation of the two republics of the island of San Domingo would not only receive the consent of the people interested but would also give satisfaction to all other foreign nations.

I am aware that upon the question of further extending our possessions it is apprehended by some that our political system can not successfully be applied to an area more extended than our continent, but the conviction is rapidly gaining ground in the American mind that, with increased facilities for intercommunication between all portions of the earth, the principles of free government as embraced in our Constitution, if faithfully maintained and carried out, would prove of sufficient strength and breadth to comprehend within their sphere and influence the civilized nations of the world. The attention of the Senate and Congress is again respectfully invited to the treaty for the establishment of commercial reciprocity with the Hawaiian Kingdom. * * * A reciprocity treaty, while it could not materially diminish the revenues of the United States, would be a guaranty of the good will and forbearance of all nations until the people of the islands shall, of themselves, at no distant day, voluntarily apply for admission into the Union.

DEMOCRATIC ATTEMPT TO ANNEX HAWAII.

It was not alone to Cuba, or Yucatan, or the islands of the Caribbean that the Democracy looked for expansion and extension of slave territory, but an earnest effort was made for the annexation of Hawaii. Under the administration of President Pierce, his minister to the Hawaiian Islands, Mr. Gregg, was directed to negotiate for the annexation of those islands to the United States, and in a communication to him, dated April 14, 1854, Mr. Pierce's Secretary of State, Marcy, says:

In your general instructions you were furnished with the views of this Government in regard to any change in the political affairs of the Sandwich Islands. The President was aware when these instructions were prepared that the question of transferring the sovereignty of those islands to the United States had been raised and favorably received by many official individuals residing therein. You were informed that it was not the policy of the United States to accelerate such a change; but if in the course of events it became unavoidable, this Government would much prefer to acquire the sovereignty of these islands for the United States than to see it transferred to any other power. * * *

The information contained in your last dispatch renders it probable that the ruling powers of that Government will have presented to you an offer of the sovereignty of their country to the United States. The President has deemed it proper that you should be furnished with instructions for the guidance of your conduct in such an emergency. With this dispatch you will be furnished with full power to treat with the present authorities of the Hawaiian Government for the transfer of the Sandwich Islands to the United States. * * * It is reasonable to anticipate that the present rulers and chiefs would expect that some provision would be made as compensation to them for the surrender of their political possession.

This provision could not be, as I conceive, any other than a pecuniary allowance. In this respect the United States would manifest toward them a liberal spirit. Annuities to the amount of $100,000, to be distributed in such manner as they would prefer, might be secured to them in the treaty. * * * If you should succeed in making a treaty transferring the islands to the United States, it is desirable that it should receive the ratification of the Hawaiian Government before it is sent here. * * * I have good reason to believe that some of the leading powers of Europe would be very unwilling to see the Sandwich Islands become a part of the United States. These considerations and others make it important that you should bring it to a close as expeditiously as possible.

These instructions to Minister Gregg resulted in the negotiation of a treaty of annexation. It was forwarded to the United States, and was so satisfactory to President Pierce and his Secretary of State that the latter said, in a communication to Minister Gregg:

The President desires me to assure you that he takes no exception whatever to your course in this difficult and embarrassing negotiation, but, on the contrary, it is highly approved. Your efforts have been properly directed, and your ability is appreciated and commended. It gives me pleasure to communicate the President's approbation of your conduct.

He adds, however, that the President directs him to say that certain features of the treaty are unsatisfactory, and says:

There are in his mind strong objections to the immediate incorporation of the islands in their present condition into the Union as an independent State. It was expected that the Hawaiian Government would be willing to offer the islands to the United States as a Territory and leave the question in relation to their becoming a State to the determination of this Government, unembarrassed by stipulations on that point. The interests of both parties would seem to indicate this as the wisest course. A treaty which would embarrass the United States on this question would therefore be objectionable.

Thus it appears that a Democratic President under whose Administration the acquisition of both Cuba and Hawaii was pushed with the greatest vigor, objected at the last moment to the acceptance of the Hawaiian territory coupled with any agreement which would require that it should be brought in as a State into the Union, a sentiment quite out of accord with that which we have recently heard in Congress with reference to territory of this character more recently acquired. Whether this trifling disagreement would have been overcome and the Hawaiian Islands annexed will never be known, as the sudden death of the Hawaiian King ended the negotiations before they could be completed, and Pierce's successor, Buchanan, contented himself with directing his efforts to the acquisition of Cuba, as already detailed.

We see, therefore, that the attitude of the Democratic party, from Jefferson to Buchanan, was one of constant desire for expansion, not alone in contiguous area, but in noncontiguous and island territory, especially in any spot where slavery might be extended, and thus the control of the slave power in Congress and in national affairs maintained.

As has already been stated, every foot of contiguous territory added to the original area of the United States was made by the Democratic party and without reference to the "consent of the governed," while the facts which have just been presented show with equal clearness that the objections now offered to the expansion, which has come as an incident of the war with Spain, found no place in the minds of Democrats during all the years in which they were plotting for the annexation of Cuba, Hawaii, Yucatan, Haiti and San Domingo, and the Danish West Indies.

and schemed to bring about the annexation, peaceably if convenient, by force if necessary, of islands and other noncontiguous territory, and in not one instance was it proposed that the wishes of the people affected should be tested in any manner which should determine the "consent of the governed" as a prerequisite for the step thus proposed. On the contrary, the underlying motive with at least a large share of those actively engaged in pushing forward these annexation propositions was to find additional area upon which they could extend that outrageous form of government, slavery, which they were then exercising over millions of people in the Southern States without their consent.

I desire to append to my remarks, and thus make a matter of record at this time, copies of official correspondence relating to the annexation of Hawaii, referred to in my remarks; also a map which shows the various areas annexed by Democratic Administrations, with the date of action and area of each addition.

APPENDIX.

Mr. Marcy to Mr. Gregg.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 14, 1854.

SIR: In your general instructions you were furnished with the views of this Government in regard to any change in the political affairs of the Sandwich Islands. The President was aware, when those instructions were prepared, that the question of transferring the sovereignty of those islands to the United States had been raised and favorably received by many influential individuals residing therein. It was foreseen that at some period not far distant such a change would take place, and that the Hawaiian Islands would come under the protectorate of or be transferred to some foreign power. You were informed that it was not the policy of the United States to accelerate such a change, but if in the course of events it became unavoidable this Government would much prefer to acquire the sovereignty of these islands for the United States, rather than to see it transferred to any other power. If any foreign connection is to be formed, the geographical position of these islands indicates that it should be with us. Our commerce with them far exceeds that of all other countries; our citizens are embarked in the most important business concerns of that country, and some of them hold important public positions. In view of the large American interests there established and the intimate commercial relations existing at this time it might well be regarded as the duty of this Government to prevent these islands from becoming the appendage of any other foreign power.

It appears by your dispatches lately received at this Department that the ruling authorities of the Hawaiian Government have become convinced of their inability to sustain themselves any longer as an independent State, and are prepared to throw themselves upon our protection or to seek incorporation into our political system. Fears are entertained by those who favor such a measure that if the United States should manifest a disinclination to receive the proffered sovereignty of this country the people would seek elsewhere a less desirable connection, or be given over to anarchy.

The information contained in your last dispatch, No. 10, dated the 7th of February, renders it highly probable that the ruling powers of that Government will have presented to you, as our diplomatic agent, an offer of the sovereignty of their country to the United States. The President has deemed it proper that you should be furnished with instructions for the guidance of your conduct in such an emergency. With this dispatch you will be furnished with full power to treat with the present authorities of the Hawaiian Government for the transfer of the Sandwich Islands to the United States. This can only be done by a convention or treaty, which will not be valid until it is ratified by the Senate of the United States.

No intimation has ever been given to this Government as to the terms or conditions which will be likely to be annexed to the tender of the sovereignty. It is presumed, however, that something more than a mere protectorate is contemplated. A protectorate tendered to and accepted by the United States would not change the sovereignty of the country. In that case this Government would take upon itself heavy and responsible duties, for which it could hardly expect compensating advantages.

I understand that the measure proposed by the people, and that in which the present rulers are disposed to concur, is "annexation" as distinguished from protection; and that it is their intention that these islands shall become a part of our territories and be under the control of this Government as fully as any other of its territorial possessions. In any convention you may make it is expected that the rights to be acquired by the United States should be clearly defined.

Should the sovereignty of these islands be transferred to the United States the present government would, as a matter of course, be superseded or, at least, be subjected to the Federal authority of this country.

It is reasonable to anticipate that the present rulers and chiefs would expect that some provision would be made as compensation to them for the surrender of their political position. This provision could not be, as I conceive, any other than a pecuniary allowance. In this respect the United States would manifest toward them a liberal spirit. Annuities to the amount of $100,000, to be distributed in such manner as they would prefer, might be secured to them in the treaty.

In the convention you may make you are authorized to provide in the amplest manner for the security of individual property as held at the time of the transfer of the sovereignty, but the reservation of political rights or privileges in behalf of individuals would be inconsistent with the political power which it is proposed to vest in the United States.

If you should succeed in making a treaty transferring the islands to the United States, it is advisable that it should receive the ratification of the Hawaiian Government before it is sent here for the consideration of the President and the Senate. You are directed to induce that Government to send on one or more persons at the same time the treaty is forwarded, clothed with full powers to assent to any modifications of it which may here be made. In view of the great uncertainty as to the terms by which the cession of the sovereignty of the islands may be encumbered, the carrying out of this suggestion is deemed to be of great importance.

I have good reason to believe that some of the leading powers of Europe would be very unwilling to see the Sandwich Islands become a part of the United States, and, if an opportunity occurred, would endeavor to defeat any negotiation for that purpose. This consideration and others make it important that you should bring it to a close as expeditiously as possible. The treaty should be here in time to be submitted to the Senate at its present session.

I am, etc.,

W. L. MARCY.

Mr. Gregg to Mr. Marcy.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, July 26, 1854.

SIR: The Hawaiian cabinet has determined at length that it will not do to allow much longer delay in bringing to a close arrangements for annexation. On the 17th a meeting was held, at which Prince Alexander was present, when it was agreed that the minister of foreign relations should immediately proceed, if possible, to arrange and sign a treaty to be submitted to the King for ratification. Mr. Wyllie called on me the next day, and we have since had several conferences, but without as yet arriving at any definite result. The difficulty, I apprehend, is that more will be demanded in the way of consideration, etc., than ought to be yielded. It is probable that by the next mail it will be in my power to communicate something more definite than I am now able to do. I have the assurance of Mr. Wyllie that, so far as he is concerned, there shall be no occasion to complain of further procrastination, and I can not doubt he is in earnest.

Prince Alexander is responsible for all past delay, and he will not hesitate to incur the responsibility of still more, unless his mind is brought to the conviction, which everyone else entertains, that it is impossible for him ever to wear a crown. He evidently sees that the existing Government is in danger, and wishes to be in condition to escape it when the crisis comes, but hopes strongly that it may be averted. If a treaty is once signed he will not oppose its ratification directly and openly, but strive to postpone it to the last moment compatible with safety.

I am convinced that a revolution will soon take place if a treaty of annexation is not concluded. The foreign residents—especially Americans—are becoming impatient under the present state of things and will not be disposed to endure much longer the feebleness and inefficiency of the Government. They have power enough in their hands, if they act in concert, to do anything they wish, and in a single week could subvert the throne and establish a republic upon its ruins.

* * * * * * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DAVID L. GREGG.

Mr. Gregg to Mr. Marcy.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, August 7, 1854.

SIR: I am only able to write briefly by the mail which goes this afternoon, being much debilitated by an attack of sickness from which I am just convalescent.

* * * * * * * *

The Government here rests on a volcano. Its subversion is within the power of the foreign residents, and I am prepared to witness an outbreak at any moment. The dissatisfaction with the present state of things is daily increasing, and a crisis of some sort is inevitable.

On Tuesday evening last, there was an intense alarm among the native population, on account of the supposed presence of "filibusters." The troops were called out and remained under arms all night. The apprehension seems to have been excited by the discovery of a box of pistols among some goods at the custom-house.

I have succeeded in arranging the terms of a treaty of annexation with the minister of foreign relations, which meets the approval of the Crown Prince and cabinet. But it is not yet signed, and I am unable to give you any assurance that it will be immediately completed. The pretense of delay is the supposed necessity of consulting the King, which for some time has been impossible on account of His Majesty's illness.

The great difficulty I had to encounter was the inveterate prejudice of the Hawaiian authorities against a territorial form of government, which could not be overcome. Finding it impossible to provide otherwise, I finally consented to agree to the admission of the islands as a State as soon as it could be done in conformity with the principles and requirements of the Federal Constitution, leaving the existing laws, so far as they are republican and consistent with such Constitution, in full force and effect in the meantime.

There was also much controversy as to the extent of consideration. The Government absolutely refused to listen to anything short of annuities to the extent of $300,000, and I finally yielded to the sine qua non which they presented, with the understanding that it was solely ad referendum.

I had intended to send you a copy of the treaty as agreed on, for information, but I have been altogether unequal to the task of making it in time for the present mail.

I have notified the minister of foreign relations that there must be a speedy diplomatical conclusion of our negotiations, and expressed the view that any further delay will be inconsistent with the position of the Government of the United States in the transaction. He assents to bring about the signature of the treaty.

I may therefore express the hope that a final result will soon be attained. But I fear the occurrence of a state of things which will place me in some embarrassment. There is reason to believe that upon the ratification of the treaty there will be a desire and necessity of an immediate transfer of the sovereignty of the islands to the United States in order to guard against pressing danger. If such a crisis occurs, I shall deem myself justified in accepting a provisional transfer, subject to the provision of the treaty, or such arrangements as may be finally made by the two parties. This, I have no doubt, would be decisive as to the influences hereafter to prevail in the archipelago, whatever might be the view of our Government as to the cession. A flood of emigration would pour in from California the moment our flag was raised, sufficient to put a check upon all future British and French pretensions.

Yesterday I had an audience at the palace for the officers of the St. Mary. The King was unable to be present, owing to his illness, but he was represented by the Kuhina Nui, who always stands in his place when he can not perform his functions.

The British consul-general has demanded a personal audience of the King, to communicate to him certain views of his Government, which will take place as soon as His Majesty is recovered.

I have, etc.,

DAVID L. GREGG.

Mr. Gregg to Mr. Marcy.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, September 15, 1854.

The negotiations for annexation are in the same condition as when my dispatch of the 7th instant was written. On Saturday last the cabinet had an audience with the King and laid before him a copy of the treaty in the Hawaiian language, and through Mr. Armstrong, as interpreter, explained it in all its particulars. He expressed himself as satisfied, as I am advised, but stated that he wished to consult particularly with a few of his chiefs before final action was taken. Unfortunately he has since been in such a state of infirmity as to be able to consult with no one, and it is difficult to predict when his present fit of illness will terminate. I have insisted upon the immediate signature of the treaty, and Mr. Wyllie admits that, according to diplomatic usage, there should be no further delay.

In my last dispatch I stated that I had notified him that the negotiations must be at once concluded. I have since addressed him a letter to the same effect, setting forth strongly the reasons which induced me to take this course. A copy of it is herewith inclosed for your information. Its representations I considered would have an important bearing in bringing matters to an issue, and I still think this will be the effect. I hope I did not go further than the President will be willing to approve. The peculiar circumstances which exist seemed to demand a strong expression on my part, with all the incidental references and suggestions which are employed. I acted with regard to what I supposed to be the peculiar exigencies of the times, and it has been intimated to me that my course will probably contribute to hasten matters to a conclusion.

I forward also a copy of the treaty, the terms of which were finally settled between Mr. Wyllie and myself on the 19th ultimo. I have already informed you of the utter impossibility of such provisions as I desired in the second and eighth articles. As they stand, they will be regarded as ad referendum so far as the United States are concerned. This, of course, was the only ground upon which I could place my assent to them, especially the last. From the protocols, which are not yet in condition to be copied for transmission, the true character of the negotiation and its embarrassing circumstances will more fully appear. I shall probably be able to send them by the next mail.

The provisions of the separate article were made a matter of positive demand by the Hawaiian cabinet. I refused to incorporate them into the body of the treaty, because they contemplate an object which, if effected at all, must be brought about before any final ratification can take place. The ratification of the treaty by this Government would undoubtedly quell any disturbances that might arise from American sources, but a conditional cession, as contemplated by such article, would forever practically settle all questions as to future influence and jurisdiction. The moment our flag was raised, a flood of immigration from California would pour in, sufficient, at least, to make the islands thoroughly American and to secure an equitable and fair arrangement if the terms of the present treaty are deemed unsatisfactory.

The return of Judge Lee from the island of Maui is expected in a few days. It was through his persuasions that the King made advances for annexation, and his influence with the chiefs and native population generally is greater than that of any man on the islands. I learn that he objects to the second article of the treaty on the ground that he does not think it provides explicitly enough for a State government. In this respect I have gone to the utmost limit of what, in my judgment, the Constitution allows, and if his advice leads this Government to exact impracticable conditions I shall, of course, be fully prepared to reject them.

The British consul-general has advised this Government that he will not, for the present, seek the audience which he formerly demanded, as I advised you in my last dispatch.

The effect of the publication in the New York Daily Tribune of July 20 has been unfortunate here in giving the British consul-general weapons to fight against the United States. I regret very much that any opportunity should have occurred at this junction to confirm, in the minds of the Hawaiians, the false impressions which are constantly sought to be created in regard to our purposes and policy. If the present negotiations fall through, I shall attribute it almost entirely to the effect of such publications as that of the Tribune and other papers of like character.

I have, etc.,

DAVID L. GREGG.

Treaty of annexation concluded between His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and the United States of America.

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, being convinced that plans have been, and still are, on foot hostile to his sovereignty and to the peace of his Kingdom which His Majesty is without power to resist, and against which it is his imperative duty to provide, in order to prevent the evils of anarchy and to secure the rights and prosperity of his subjects, and having in conscientious regard thereto, as well as to the general interest of his Kingdom, present and future, sought to incorporate his Kingdom into the Union of the United States as the means best calculated to attain these ends and perpetuate the blessings of freedom and equal rights to himself, his chiefs, and his people; and the Government of the United States being actuated solely by the desire to add to their security and prosperity and to meet the wishes of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and of his Government, have determined to accomplish by treaty objects so important to their mutual and permanent welfare.

For that purpose His Majesty Kamehameha III, King of the Hawaiian Islands, has granted full powers to Robert Crichton Wyllie, esq., his minister of foreign affairs, his secretary at war and of the navy, member of his privy council of state, member of the house of nobles, and chairman of the commissioners of his privy purse; and the President of the United States has invested with like powers David Lawrence Gregg, esq., commissioner of said States to the said Kingdom; and the said plenipotentiaries, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, acting in conformity with the power invested in him by the constitution of his Kingdom, and with the wishes of his chiefs and people, and of the heads of every department of his Government, cedes to the United States his Kingdom, with all its territories, to be held by them in full sovereignty, subject only to the same constitutional provisions as the other States of the American Union. This cession includes all public lots and squares, Government lands, mines and minerals, salt lakes and springs, fish ponds, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, forts, ports, and harbors, reefs, docks, and magazines, arms, armaments, and accouterments, public archives, and funds, claims, debts, taxes, and dues existing, available, and unpaid at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ARTICLE II.

The Kingdom of the Hawaiian Islands shall be incorporated into the American Union as a State, enjoying the same degree of sovereignty as other States, and admitted as such as soon as it can be done in consistency with the principles and requirements of the Federal Constitution, to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of a State as aforesaid, on a perfect equality with the other States of the Union.

ARTICLE III.

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, his chiefs and subjects of every class, shall continue in the enjoyment of all their existing personal and private rights—civil, political, and religious—to the utmost extent that is possible under the Federal Constitution, and shall possess and forever enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, on terms of perfect equality, in all respects, with other American citizens.

ARTICLE IV.

The decisions of the land commissioners, made and not appealed from at the date of the final ratification of this treaty, shall be and remain forever valid and undisturbed, and all titles to real estate, which are now or shall have then been declared valid under the laws of the Hawaiian Kingdom, shall be held to be equally valid by the United States, and measures shall be adopted by the United States for the speedy and final adjudication of all unsettled claims to land in conformity with the laws and usages under which they may have originated.

ARTICLE V.

All engagements of whatever kind affecting the rights of corporations or individuals, validly contracted and lawfully incumbent upon the King's Government or the Hawaiian nation to pay and discharge, shall be respected and fulfilled in as prompt, full, and complete a manner as they would have been respected and fulfilled had no change of sovereignty taken place.

ARTICLE VI.

The public lands hereby deeded shall be subject to the laws regulating the public lands in other parts of the United States, liable, however, to such alterations and changes as Congress may from time to time enact. The grants of land for the promotion of education heretofore made by the Government of the King of the Hawaiian Islands shall be confirmed by the United States, which, in addition thereto, shall grant and set apart for the purpose of common schools, seminaries of learning, and universities so much of the public lands and of the prodeeds thereof as may be equal proportionally to the grants for such purposes in any of the States of the Union.

ARTICLE VII.

The laws of the Hawaiian Kingdom, so far as they are compatible with Republican institutions and conformable to the Constitution of the United States, shall be and remain in full force and effect until modified, changed, or replaced by the legislative authority of the States contemplated by this treaty.

ARTICLE VIII.

In consideration of the cession made by this treaty, and in compensation to all who may suffer or incur loss consequent thereon, the United States shall pay the aggregate sum of $300,000 as annuities to the King, the Queen, the Crown Prince, those standing next in succession to the throne, the chiefs, and all other persons whom the King may wish to compensate or reward, to be apportioned as may be determined by His Majesty the King and his privy council of state, which amounts, to be apportioned as aforesaid, shall be paid ratably, without deduction or offset on any ground or in any shape whatever, to the parties severally named in such apportionment, at Honolulu, on the first day of July of each successive year so long as they may live. It is, however, expressly agreed upon that on the demise of his present Majesty the annuity of the immediate heir to the throne shall then be increased to the same amount before allowed and paid to the King himself.

As a further consideration for the cession herein made, and in order to place within reach of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands the means of education, present and future, so as to enable them the more perfectly to enjoy and discharge the rights and duties consequent upon a change from monarchical to republican institutions, the United States agree to set apart and pay over for the term of ten years the sum of $75,000 per annum, one-third of which shall be applied to constitute the principal of a fund for the benefit of a college or university, or colleges or universities, as the case may be, and the balance for the support of common schools, to be invested, secured, or applied as may be determined by the legislative authority of the Hawaiian Islands when admitted as a State into the Union as aforesaid.

ARTICLE IX.

Immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty the President of the United States shall appoint a commissioner, who shall receive in due form, in the name of the United States, the transfer of the sovereignty and territories of the Hawaiian Islands; also all public property, archives, and other things hereinbefore stipulated to be conveyed, and who shall exercise all executive authority in said islands necessary to the preservation of peace and order, and to the proper execution of the laws, until the State contemplated in this treaty can be duly organized and admitted as such State; and until the arrival of such commissioner all departments of His Majesty's Government shall continue as now constituted.

ARTICLE X.

This treaty shall be ratified by the respective contracting parties, and the ratifications exchanged at the city of Honolulu within eight months from the date hereof, or sooner if possible, but it is agreed that this period may be extended by mutual consent of the two parties.

In witness whereof we, the undersigned, plenipotentiaries of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and of the United States of America, have signed three originals of this treaty of annexation in Hawaiian and three in English, and have thereunto affixed our respective official seals.

Done at Honolulu this — day of ——, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-four.

SEPARATE AND SECRET ARTICLE.

Whereas it is desirable to guard against the exigencies declared in the preamble to the foregoing treaty, and to secure the King of the Hawaiian Islands, his chiefs, and all who reside under his jurisdiction, from the dangers therein referred to and expressed, it is hereby provided and expressly agreed that at any time before the final exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, if the same shall be duly ratified on the part of His Majesty the King and satisfactory notice thereof given to the commissioner of the United States, it shall be competent for His Majesty, by proclamation, to declare his islands annexed to the American Union, subject to the provisions of such treaty as negotiated; and the commissioner of the United States, for the time being, shall receive and accept the transfer of the jurisdiction of the said islands, in the name of the United States, and protect and defend them by the armed forces of the United States, as a part of the American Union, holding the same for and in behalf of his Government, and exercising the jurisdiction provided for in said treaty, with the understanding, however, that in case the said treaty is not finally ratified, or other arrangements made by the free consent and to the mutual satisfaction of the contracting parties, the sovereignty of the islands shall immediately revert, without prejudice, to His Majesty, or his immediate heir, in the same conditions as before the transfer thereof; and it is further understood and agreed that this article shall be as binding for all ends and purposes herein expressed as if it formed a part of the foregoing treaty.

Mr. Gregg to Mr. Marcy.

Honolulu, October 2, 1854.

SIR: In my dispatch of the 7th ultimo, I mentioned that the British consul-general had demanded an audience of the King for the purpose of communicating to him certain views of his Government. It was first appointed for the 6th ultimo, the same day as that fixed for the audience to the officers of the St. Mary, but the King being unable on account of illness to attend it was then postponed. Subsequently, however, although General Miller at first declined, an arrangement was made to receive him on the 18th, when he made an extemporaneous speech of an hour and a quarter against annexation to the United States and in dispraise of our country, her Government, and people.

The substance of his remarks has been stated to me by those who heard them. He deprecated annexation to the United States and represented it to be one of the worst evils which could befall the Hawaiian race, denouncing our institutions as corrupt in their tendency and wholly unequal to protect in security the enjoyment of life and property. As an illustration, he referred to California and described numerous disorders, which he alleged had prevailed there, in the strongest terms, predicting that the introduction of American rule in these islands would be the signal for the commencement of a similar state of things; in which the rights of the natives would be altogether lost sight of and sacrificed.

Since my dispatch of the 15th ultimo there has been no progress in regard to the treaty of annexation. The Crown Prince is absent on the island of Hawaii, but he has been sent for and his return is daily expected. This step resulted from my letter to the minister of foreign relations of the date of September 12, a copy of which I have already transmitted for your information. I inclose herewith an acknowledgment of its receipt, from which you will perceive the cause of any recent delay that has occurred.

I now feel some confidence that immediately upon the arrival of the prince, the treaty will be signed and ratified. The King is unwilling to have any action taken in his absence, but at the same time anxious to bring matters to a speedy conclusion. Liholiho has already given his formal assent to the negotiations so far, by countersigning with the ministers the protocols and also the draft of the treaty, a copy of which I have sent you. Present appearances indicate that the period of procrastination is nearly at an end, and I indulge the expectation of being able to send home a treaty of annexation in time for the commencement of the next session of Congress.

I have the, etc.,

DAVID L. GREGG.

Mr. Marcy to Mr. Gregg.

Washington, January 31, 1855.

SIR: The policy of the United States in relation to the future of the Sandwich Islands is presented in the instructions heretofore given to you. That policy is not to accelerate or urge on any important change in the government of that country, but if it has or should become so far enfeebled that it can not be continued, and the sovereignty of the islands must be transferred to another power, then a state of things will exist in which it will be proper for the United States to have a regard to the future condition of that country.

If the Hawaiian goverment and people become convinced of the necessity of such a change, it is probable that they will, if left to their free choice, look to the United States as the country to which they would wish to be united. To a proper arrangement of this kind this Government certainly has no objection.

My dispatch of the 4th of April last has reference to such a contingency which it was then supposed was about to happen. In case a transfer of the islands was proffered to the United States, you were directed to enter into negotiations as to the terms of it and conclude a treaty on that subject. The outlines of such a treaty were contained in that dispatch.

You have apprised the Department that as soon as negotiations were opened you perceived that stipulations different from those indicated in your instructions were insisted on, and you very properly notified the Hawaiian authorities that you could only entertain them as matters to be referred to your Government for its approval or rejection.

The draft of a treaty you have forwarded to the Department has been considered by the President, and he directs me to say that he can not approve of some of the articles. If ratified in its present shape at Honolulu and sent hither, he would not probably submit it to the Senate. There are in his mind strong objections to the immediate incorporation of the islands in their present condition into the Union as an independent State. It was expected that the Hawaiian Government would be willing to offer the islands to the United States as a territory, and to leave the question in relation to their becoming a State to the determination of this Government, unembarrassed by stipulations on that point. The interest of both parties would seem to indicate this as the wisest course. A treaty which would embarrass the United States in their action on this question would therefore be objectionable.

There are other objections to the draft which you have sent to the Department, though less formidable than that which the second article presents. The amount to be paid as annuities, etc., according to the draft, is much larger than contemplated.

I think it would be proper that you should inform the Hawaiian Government that the United States would not be likely to approve of a treaty differing in important particulars from the terms contained in the dispatch of the 4th of April.

This Government will receive the transfer of the sovereignty of the Sandwich Islands with all proper provisions relative to the existing rights and interests of the people thereof, such as are usual and appropriate to territorial sovereignty. It will be the object of the United States, if clothed with the sovereignty of that country, to promote its growth and prosperity. This consideration alone ought to be a sufficient assurance to the people that their rights and interests will be duly respected and cherished by this Government.

In presenting objections to the draft of the treaty which you have sent to this Department, the President desires me to assure you that he takes no exception whatever to your course in this difficult and embarrassing negotiation, but, on the contrary, it is highly approved. Your efforts have been properly directed, and your ability is appreciated and commended. It gives me pleasure to concur in and communicate the President's approbation of your conduct.

I am, etc.,

W. L. MARCY.

Honolulu, December 19, 1854.

SIR: The King of the Hawaiian Islands, Kamehameha III, died on Friday last, the 15th instant, after an illness of about two weeks. He was born on the 17th of March, 1813, being in his forty-second year. By his subjects he was universally beloved, and among them the manifestations of grief are universal and striking. With scarcely an exception the resident foreigners respected him and confided in his justice and generosity. His partiality to Americans has always been strong, and it will be universally conceded that by his decease they have lost a faithful and honorable friend.

* * * * * * *

On the same day the ascension of the Prince Royal Alexander Liholiho to the throne, under the style of Kamehameha IV, was proclaimed and received universal acquiescence. The young monarch will be 21 years of age on the 9th of February next. By the Hawaiian laws the age of majority for males is fixed at twenty, so that he becomes at once ruler de facto of the kingdom.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, December 29, 1854.

SIR: * * * From information which has recently come to my knowledge, I am inclined to entertain the opinion that the present head of the Government will be disposed to preserve, if possible, the separate independence of the Hawaiian Islands. I anticipate, therefore, a notification, as soon as affairs are somewhat settled, to the effect that the negotiations for annexation to the United States are no longer to be entertained. This is rather a matter of inference than of positive certainty, but my own mind is convinced that the anticipation I entertained will prove to be well founded.

American Policy for the Nicaragua Canal—Equal Commercial Advantages to all Nations—Military Advantages to the United States only.

HON. EDWARD T. NOONAN,
OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, May 2, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—

Mr. NOONAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Political economy is the science of the production, distribution, and consumption of wealth, and political science is a knowledge of the causes and effects of the regulation thereof by the State.

Labor-saving devices, which bring the minds of men together or which lessen the cost to producer and to consumer, are the object of the inventive genius of man.

Transportation is one of the most successful applications of labor-saving devices, and even in this age of railway building the benefits and economy of waterway transportation were never more fully appreciated.

European nations have made great strides in the construction of waterway transportation. In Germany there are 29,461 miles of railroad and 8,654 miles of canals and rivers. In England and Wales there are 14,818 miles of railroad and 3,813 miles of canals.

France, with a population of 38,000,000, and only a total area of 203,000 square miles, has 23,693 miles of railroad and 5,475 miles of canals and rivers. The relative importance of the possible development and growth in the United States can be appreciated when it is considered that the area of France is about equal to that of Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Indiana, and from the further fact that the per capita circulation of money in France is greater than that of the United States.

The United States, with its 10,000 miles of coast, its few natural harbors, its chain of Great Lakes, and its great rivers, has as yet many great public improvements to make in the way of harbor construction, canalized rivers, canals, and ship canals.

SHIP CANALS FROM GREAT LAKES.

The people of the Northwest, the upper lake region, and the Mississippi Valley, are particularly concerned in the construction of ship canals from the lakes to the Atlantic seaboard, and from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

The importance of the commerce carried on on the Great Lakes may be realized from the fact that during the year 1899 the tonnage passing through the St. Marys Falls Canal was 21,958,347 tons, and the total tonnage of the Great Lakes is estimated to have been over 50,000,000 tons.

Commenting on the increased cost in transportation of grain and other products from the lakes to the seaboard by the transshipment at Buffalo to canal boats or railroads, and the transshipment again at the seaboard of the same cargoes to ocean-going vessels, and as a discrimination in favor of these lines of transportation which operates to the disadvantage of the commerce of the Northwest, of the State of New York, and the nation, the distinguished New York engineer, Mr. E. P. North, says:

The continued maintenance of two toll gates in the United States, that the few may receive large gains from handling the minimum amount of merchandise to the loss of the many, is a commercial outrage, and we have to go back to the revenue reforms of the Rhine barons for an analogue.

Pursuant to a joint resolution of Congress passed in February, 1895, for the purpose of inquiring and reporting whether it is feasible to build a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, a commission, consisting of Lyman E. Cooley, of Illinois, James B. Angell, of Michigan, and John E. Russell, of Massachusetts, was appointed.

In 1897 the commission submitted an elaborate report to Congress, the conclusions of which are in part as follows:

First. That it is entirely feasible to construct such canals and develop such channels as will be adequate to any scale of navigation that may be desired between the several Great Lakes and the seaboard, and to conduct through same domestic and foreign commerce, and that, in our opinion, it will be wise to provide for securing a channel of navigable depth of not less than 28 feet.

Second. That, starting from the heads of Lakes Michigan and Superior, the most eligible route is through the several Great Lakes and their intermediate channels and the proposed Niagara Ship Canal (Tonawanda to Olcott) to Lake Ontario; and that the Canadian seaboard may be reached from Lake Ontario by way of the St. Lawrence River, and the American seaboard may be reached from Lake Ontario by way of the St. Lawrence River and Lake Champlain and the Hudson River, or by the Oswego-Oneida-Mohawk Valley and the Hudson River.

Seventh. That the completion of the entire system as quickly as proper projects can be matured and economically executed is fully justified.

Eighth. That the Niagara Ship Canal should be first undertaken, and incidentally the broadening and further deepening of the intermediate channels of the lakes, the same being in the logical order of development and also requiring the least time for consideration.

Pursuant to an act of Congress of June, 1896, directing the Secretary of War to make surveys and estimates of cost of construction of a ship canal by the most practicable route, wholly within the United States, from the Great Lakes to the navigable waters of the Hudson River, of sufficient capacity to transport the tonnage of the lakes to the sea, an exhaustive report was submitted to Congress in July, 1897, by Maj. Thomas W. Symons, of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, the conclusions of which are in part as follows:

A ship canal which would permit lake vessels to reach tide water and ocean vessels to reach lake ports would be valuable in reducing and regulating lake freights, transfer charges, etc., on such freight as might be tributary thereto.

To justify construction the benefits to be derived from such a canal should be clearly shown to be suitably commensurate with its cost and the cost of maintenance and necessary improvements.

The present and prospective conditions of lake and interlake channels and harbors limit the reasonable depth of a ship canal to that required for vessels of 20-foot draft.

Any ship canal built should be entirely within the territory of the United States, and should terminate at a first-class American seaport and commercial and manufacturing center, in order that Western products for domestic consumption, as well as those designed for exportation, may be transported at minimum cost, and that return freight of the greatest possible magnitude may be secured, and the canal benefit alike the people of the West and of the East.

Any ship canal built should not only subserve the interest of foreign-bound commerce, but as well the domestic commerce between the centers of population in the East and the producing regions of the West.

Domestic commerce is of more importance to consider than the commerce destined to or from foreign countries.

A ship canal by the St. Lawrence route to Montreal, or by the St. Lawrence-Champlain route to New York, does not fulfill these conditions and should not be considered by the United States.

The route considered best for a ship canal is by the Niagara River, Lake Ontario, Oswego, Oneida Lake, and the Mohawk and Hudson rivers.

For the highest economy in transportation, special types of vessels are needed for use on the ocean, on the lakes, and on the canals, and neither can replace the other in its proper waters without suffering loss of efficiency. Ocean vessels could not, as a general rule, engage in the business of passing through a ship canal and the lakes to upper lake ports, and the lake vessels are not fitted for use upon the ocean, and if they made use of a canal they would have to transfer their cargoes at the seaboard. For economical transportation through a canal from the Great Lakes to the sea special vessels, differing from and far less costly than ocean or lake vessels, are required.

Important and serviceable canals already exist between the Great Lakes and the Hudson, the Erie Canal connecting Lake Erie with the Hudson, and the Oswego-Erie Canal connecting Lake Ontario with the Hudson. By these canals low rates of freight are attained.

These canals are being improved by the State of New York to the extent that when completed the capacity of the boats navigating them will be increased about 70 per cent, the time of transit will be materially reduced, and it will be possible and practicable to move freight between Lake Erie and New York for about 60 per cent of the present cost.

Under existing conditions and methods these canals require, and will when improved require, the transference of freight from lake vessels to canal boats, and vice versa, at lower lake ports. This transference is an important and expensive item in the cost of through freight, and its avoidance or material reduction is very desirable.

The amount of tonnage which it is estimated may be possibly tributary to a ship canal is 24,000,000 annually—18,000,000 tons transported eastward and 6,000,000 tons transported westward.

The cost of a ship canal suitable for use by the largest vessels of the lakes from Lake Erie to New York, and necessary work in connection therewith, would be approximately $200,000,000, and the cost of operation and maintenance would be approximately $2,000,000 per year. The cost would depend largely upon the arrangement which could be made with New York State for the possession of its canals, feeders, reservoirs, etc., which would necessarily be absorbed in the greater canal.

This able engineer opposes the construction of a ship canal and favors the enlargement of the Erie Canal.

The Erie Canal, as it is being enlarged by the State of New York, will, if all restrictions upon its use be removed, give commercial advantages practically equal to the commercial advantages which would be given by a ship canal. * * *

The construction of a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the sea is not a project worthy of being undertaken by the General Government, as the benefits to be derived therefrom would not be properly commensurate with the cost.

The enlargement of the Erie Canal as suggested, with everything adapted to transport the tonnage of the lakes, is a project worthy of being undertaken by the General Government, as the benefits to be derived therefrom would be properly commensurate with the cost.

The same distinguished engineer, in a recent contribution on the same subject, says:

The cost of constructing a ship canal, together with the needed improvements of lake harbors and interlake channels, such as would permit the realization of the beautiful picture of large ocean ships going to Chicago, Duluth, and other upper lake ports, would be so great as to be entirely incommensurate with the good to be accomplished thereby.

And, after discussing the various routes, he says:

And this leads up to the fact that the natural outlet of the Great Lake region, the line of least resistance and the shortest and cheapest route for a ship canal to tide water, is by the St. Lawrence to the seaport of Montreal.

For New York State to build such a canal, or permit it to be built, would, in my opinion, be to commit commercial suicide.

And instead of a ship canal he recommends that the Erie Canal be enlarged to accommodate boats or barges of 1,000 to 2,000 tons capacity, at an estimated cost of $60,000,000.

It is therefore apparent that the people of the Northwest and the upper lake region can only secure a ship canal from the Lakes to the seaboard by the consent of the State of New York, whose engineers only favor the enlargement of the Erie Canal.

The legislature of New York has recently appropriated $200,000 for surveys of the Erie Canal for this purpose.

A ship or barge canal from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico is a possibility of the near future. Chicago has contributed the greater part of the cost of the construction of such a waterway by the expenditure of $33,000,000. And it remains for Congress to complete this great work by Government surveys and the speedy enactment of necessary legislation and appropriations.

By the building of great canals from the Lakes to tide water on the Atlantic and on the Gulf, and the consequent cheapness of transportation of our grain and food stuffs, our iron, cotton, coal, coke, and lumber to the seaboard on their way to foreign markets, the assembling of raw materials, the cheap transportation of the manufactured products thereof, and the application of the laws of political economy and political science, the city of Chicago will attain supremacy in the industrial world, and the Mississippi Valley will become the manufacturing center of the world.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

The first and greatest triumph of engineering skill in the construction of ship canals in modern times is the artificial waterway which connects the Mediterranean and Red Sea.

In 1869, after fifteen years of arduous exploitation on the part of Ferdinand de Lesseps, the Suez Canal became an accomplished fact. It is a canal 99 miles long with no locks, which had cost, up to the time of opening, about $20,000,000, and whose stock in the market is now worth seven times its original cost.

The English Government in 1875 purchased from the Khedive about one-half of the total issue of stock at a premium, and by her occupation of Egypt in 1882 increased her power over the canal.

The tonnage for the year 1899 through the Suez Canal was 9,893,022. Receipts for tolls, $17,510,142. The total number of vessels passing through the canal was 3,480, of which 2,207 carried the British flag and only 25 the American flag.

From 1877 to 1883 De Lesseps proposed to the English Government the canal should be neutralized. In 1888 the treaty of Constantinople was signed by Great Britain, France, and the six other great powers for the neutralization of the canal in peace and war.

Nevertheless, by the terms of the convention the neutrality of the strategic points of Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Aden, and Port Said, all of which are owned and fortified by England, was not considered, and in regard to which I will have something to say later.

WAR MEASURES.

The German Government in 1895 opened the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, connecting the North and Baltic seas, a distance of 61 miles, at a cost of $40,000,000. The canal runs through German territory, and was built as a war measure to enable the German fleet to be quickly moved from the Baltic to the North Sea. The canal is open to all nations at peace with Germany.

The great Trans-Siberian railroad is approaching completion. Russia will soon have in operation 4,300 miles of railroad, extending from St. Petersburg across Russia and Siberia through Manchuria, China, and a combined railroad and waterway in the direction of Irkutsk and Vladivostok. This great work will cost $500,000,000, of which $295,000,000 has already been expended. The net annual receipts are less than 1 per cent on the investment. Nevertheless, the present military necessities and the future commercial advantages more than commensurate the Russian Government for its expenditure.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

For centuries the commercial world has appreciated the benefits which would accrue from the construction of a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Since the memorable trip by the U. S. battle ship Oregon of 12,000 miles around the Horn, this country has more fully appreciated the military necessity of such a waterway.

The Isthmus has been honeycombed with surveys which have resulted in three most practicable routes: The Darien, the Panama, and the Nicaragua. Of these, American capitalists and American engineers have concluded that the Nicaragua route is the best.

This bill provides for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, 190 miles long, of which 70 miles is through Lake Nicaragua, at a cost of $140,000,000, to be owned and fortified by the United States.

The construction of a canal across the Isthmus during the last half century has been a constant subject of diplomatic correspondence and many treaty stipulations.

The most important treaties regarding same are what are known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into April 19, 1850, for the immediate construction by English capital of the canal, and is in part as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any state or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any state or government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ARTICLE II.

Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ARTICLE III.

In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used or to be used for that object, shall be protected from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into February 5, 1900, and, in the language of the President's message, "is to facilitate the construction of the canal and remove any objections which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty," and is in part as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention this day signed by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1900.

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America,

And Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., Her Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States:

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE II.

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer Convention, adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople, October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

* * * * * * *

7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

CONTENTIONS.

In opposing the passage of the bill, the distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee [Mr. BURTON] contends that—

The American policy, without dissent, for the first eighty-five years has been in favor of a neutral canal; that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made in pursuance of such policy, and is a subsisting treaty, and that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is a triumph of diplomacy.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] says:

That he objects to the passage of the bill by the House, because it utterly and defiantly violates a treaty which is in full force and which is vital and binding upon the conscience of every American.

The able chairman of the Appropriation Committee [Mr. CANNON] objects to the passage of the bill, because—

The commission now investigating is not prepared to say whether any canal should be constructed, or which is the best location on the Nicaragua route.

Mr. James Bassett Moore, formerly Assistant Secretary of State, and counsel for the Peace Commission at Paris, recently contributed to the literature upon this subject, in which he concludes:

First. That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been repeatedly and distinctly referred to and acted upon by the United States as a subsisting engagement, and has never, in fact, been declared to be at an end.

Second. That if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were abrogated the situation would not be radically altered, since the neutralization of the canal is guaranteed by various other treaties.

Third. That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, while adhering to the policy of neutralization, permits the United States to construct, own, and manage the canal, does away with all stipulations for joint intervention, and concedes to the United States the liberty to afford protection against lawlessness and disorder.

Another distinguished gentleman, Mr. James Gustavus Whitely, vice-president of the International Diplomatic Congress, has contended that—

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty has long been a menace to the peaceful relations of England and America on account of the divergent views entertained in the United States as to its validity and utility.

From time to time parties have risen which desired to secure exclusive control of the canal, and which, therefore, convinced themselves that the treaty was no longer binding. There has always been a danger that these views would induce some misguided Administration to disregard at a critical juncture the obligations and agreement and bring on a dispute—perhaps a conflict—with England. With admirable foresight, Mr. Hay has taken up the question at a convenient season and in a friendly manner. A dangerous source of dispute is settled, for the meaning of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is made premise by a new agreement.

The legitimate ambitions of the United States are gratified by receiving the right to build and own the canal.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares that it shall be open to the ships of all nations in time of war as well as in time of peace, and that the powers shall be invited to guarantee the neutrality of the route; that the details are practically the same regulations as those adopted for the Suez Canal.

It is an error to suppose that the neutralization of the canal is contrary to the Monroe doctrine. That doctrine was designed to prevent a combination of European powers from intervening in the internal affairs of the American nation. An agreement among European and American States to neutralize a portion of the Isthmus is an engagement not to meddle with that portion of America. Hence it is a contract to observe the Monroe doctrine so far as that part of the Isthmus is concerned.

I contend that the American policy for the last generation has been opposed to a neutral canal; that while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty may be a subsisting treaty, its provisions relating to the canal are not binding upon the American conscience; that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in violation of the Monroe doctrine, and is anything but a triumph of American diplomacy.

The passage of this bill by the House of Representatives is an expression of the policy of the American people in regard to the control of the Nicaragua Canal. It is notice to the executive department of the Government, and to the treaty-making power, that if there be existing treaties which are in danger of being violated, the occasion is ripe for our diplomatic representatives to subserve the will of the American people.

CONSTRUCTION OF CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

It is true that divergent views have been entertained in the United States regarding the validity of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Refreshing utterances have been made by American statesmen from time to time regarding this treaty.

President Hayes, in his message to Congress in 1880, said:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to the surrender of this control to any European power or to any combination of European powers.

* * * * * * *

If existing treaties between the United States and other nations, or if the rights of sovereignty or property of other nations stand in the way of this policy—a contingency which is not apprehended—suitable steps should be taken by just and liberal negotiations to promote and establish the American policy on this subject consistently with the rights of the nations to be affected by it.

In a letter to Mr. Lowell, our minister at London, James G. Blaine, while Secretary of State, wrote June 24, 1881:

Nor in time of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway, under the exclusive control of an American corporation.

* * * * * * * *

It is as regards the political control of such a canal, as distinguished from its merely administrative or commercial regulation, that the President feels called upon to speak with directness and with emphasis. During any war to which the United States of America or the United States of Colombia might be a party, the passage of armed vessels of a hostile nation through the Canal of Panama would be no more admissible than would the passage of the armed forces of a hostile nation over the railway lines joining the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the United States or of Colombia. And the United States of America will insist upon her right to take all needful precautions against the possibility of the Isthmus transit being in any event used offensively against her interests upon the land or upon the sea.

In another letter, dated November 19, 1881, Mr. Blaine wrote to Mr. Lowell, referring to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and used the following vigorous language:

This convention was made more than thirty years ago, under exceptional and extraordinary conditions which have long since ceased to exist—conditions which at best were temporary in their nature, and which can never be reproduced.

* * * * * * *

The presumptive intention of the treaty (Clayton-Bulwer) was to place the two powers on a plane of perfect equality with respect to the canal, but in practice, as I have indicated, this would prove utterly delusive, and would instead surrender it, if not in form, yet in effect, to the control of Great Britain.

* * * * * * *

For self-protection to her own interests, therefore, the United States in the first instance asserts her right to control the Isthmus transit; and, secondly, she offers by such control that absolute neutralization of the canal as respects European powers which can in no other way be certainly attained and lastingly assured.

* * * * * * *

The following is a summary of the changes necessary to meet the views of this Government:

First. Every part of the treaty which forbids the United States fortifying the canal and holding the political control of it in conjunction with the country in which it is located to be canceled.

Secretary Frelinghuysen, in 1882, in a letter to the United States minister at London regarding this treaty, said:

Under the treaty of 1850, while it is binding, the United States have not the right to exercise dominion over or to colonize one foot of territory in Central America. Great Britain is under the same rigid restrictions. And if Great Britain has violated and continues to violate that provision, the treaty is, of course, voidable at the pleasure of the United States.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded to secure a thing which did not exist and which now never can exist.

The President does not feel himself warranted in making any engagement or any admission respecting the extinct provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

To the suggestion made by Lord Granville that the United States should take the initiative in an invitation to other powers to participate in an agreement based upon the convention of 1850, the President is constrained to say that the United States can not take part in extending such an invitation, and to state with entire frankness that the United States would look with disfavor upon an attempt at a concert of political action by other powers in that direction.

A TRIUMPH OF DIPLOMACY?

The distinguished chairman of the River and Harbor Committee declares that the "Hay-Pauncefote treaty is a triumph of diplomacy." I think the great majority of the American people regard it as a triumph of English diplomacy.

The first line of Article I says:

It is agreed that the canal shall be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

The Government of England agrees that we may construct it at our public or private expense and give her an equal share of its military and commercial advantages. And this is "a triumph of diplomacy" on the part of our distinguished Secretary of State, our former ambassador to the Court of St. James. If this be a "triumph of diplomacy," alas for the efforts of Jefferson, Monroe, Adams, Jackson, Seward, and Blaine.

It can hardly be considered a triumph of diplomacy for the distinguished Secretary of State to recognize and revive, at this most inauspicious time, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was officially declared by some of his predecessors to be "voidable" and "violated" by the English Government as to its provisions regarding the colonization and exercise of dominion over territory in Central America, and as "extinct," "delusive" and "to be canceled," and "contrary to the Monroe doctrine" in its provisions relating to the Nicaragua Canal.

If the ulterior motive of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty be to prevent the construction of the canal, or as a dilatory measure, it certainly is a triumph of diplomacy for the opponents to the passage of a bill at this time by Congress for its construction.

MONROE DOCTRINE.

I contend that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in violation of the Monroe doctrine. Professor Vattel long ago, in his able work on the Law of Nations, gave expression to the fundamental idea that—

The end or object of civil society is to procure for the citizens whatever they stand in need of for the necessities, the convenience, the accommodation of life, and in general whatever constitutes happiness with the peaceful possession of property, a method of obtaining justice with security, and, finally, a mutual defense against all external violence.

* * * * * * *

Since, then, a nation is obliged to preserve itself, it has a right to everything necessary for its preservation.

* * * * * * *

A nation ought carefully to avoid, as much as possible, whatever might cause its destruction. * * *

A nation has a right to everything that can help to ward off imminent danger and to keep at a distance whatever is capable of causing its ruin, and that from the very same reasons to establish its right to the things necessary to its preservation.

It ought to avoid what may hinder its perfection or retard its progress.

And the doctrine enunciated by President Monroe to the effect that the United States considered the extension of the European system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety, has become firmly established as part of the American policy. And in the light of recent events, its maintenance is absolutely necessary for the welfare of this country.

Secretary of State Frelinghuysen said, in his letter to our minister at London, in 1882:

The President, therefore, considers it unnecessary and unwise, through an invitation to the nations of the earth, to guarantee the neutrality of the transit of the Isthmus, or to give their navies a pretext for assembling in waters contiguous to our shores, and to possibly involve this Republic in conflicts from which its natural position entitles it to be relieved.

* * * * * * *

That the formation of a protectorate by European nations over the Isthmus transit would be in conflict with a doctrine which has for many years been asserted by the United States. * * *

It is not necessary now to define that doctrine, but its history clearly shows that it at least opposes any intervention by European nations in the political affairs of American republics. * * *

The doctrine formulated by Monroe and expounded by Adams has since remained a cardinal principle of our continental policy.

To assert that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is a contract to observe the Monroe doctrine as far as that part of the Isthmus is concerned is a fallacy. By its ratification this Government would surrender to all nations part of the territory of the Isthmus and afford greater accessibility to our coasts, which in time of war would be a greater potential danger to this country than would be the acquisition or colonization of territory by any European nation in Central America, Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, or the Danish Islands, for instance.

NEUTRALITY OF SUEZ CANAL.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that in order to preserve the general principles of neutrality of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it adopts as a basis the rules substantially embodied in the treaty of Constantinople for free navigation of the Suez Canal. That the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations.

Mr. Blaine, when Secretary of State, in his letter of November 19, 1881, relating to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, says, regarding the control of the Suez Canal by England:

And as England insists by the might of her power that her enemies in war shall strike her Indian possessions only by doubling the Cape of Good Hope, so the Government of the United States will equally insist that the interior, more speedy, and safer route of the canal shall be reserved for ourselves, while our enemies, if we shall ever be so unfortunate as to have any, shall be remanded to the voyage around Cape Horn.

Lord Granville, the British prime minister, in reply to this point, says:

Her Majesty's Government can not admit that the analogy which it is sought to draw from the conduct of Great Britain in regard to the Suez Canal is correct or justified by the facts. They have made no attempt to fortify the Island of Cyprus, or to establish it as an armed position on an important scale, though they have an undoubted right to do so. The fortress at Gibraltar, the island of Malta, and the military establishment of Aden came into the possession of England at a date long anterior to the time when the Mediterranean and the Red Sea could be regarded as a military route to India.

And his lordship further facetiously observes:

Nor has any serious addition been made to the strength of these positions since the opening of the canal beyond what has been a natural consequence of the improvements in military science.

While the treaty of Constantinople guaranteed the neutrality of the Suez Canal, it does not guarantee the neutrality of the English forts of Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Aden, and Port Said to any enemy of England. The neutrality of the Suez Canal to any power at war with England is a delusion and a snare.

CONCLUSION.

Twenty years ago arguments were made by American statesmen that during the thirty years that had elapsed the change in circumstances surrounding the subject-matter of the canal justified the cancellation and abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Since that time events have transpired which more than fortify the arguments then made.

As to the perpetuity of the obligation of a treaty where the subject-matter is a question of expediency and may be rendered inapplicable to the new conditions of things, I desire to quote from that distinguished English authority on international law, Sir Robert Phillemore (volume 3, page 800), who in 1885 said:

It appears to the writer of these pages that the doctrine intended to be conveyed in the English note was "that the doctrine is that there is a distinction between the parts of a treaty which recognize a principle and object of permanent policy and the parts relating to objects of passing and temporary expediency."

Most international compacts, especially treaties of peace, are of a mixed character, and contain articles of both kinds, which renders it frequently difficult to distinguish between those stipulations which are perpetual in their nature and such as are extinguished by war between the contracting parties, or by such changes of circumstances as affect the being of either party, and thus render the compact inapplicable to the new condition of things.

I repeat the utterance of President Harrison in his message to Congress December 9, 1891:

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], in his argument upon this subject before the Senate at the last session, did not overestimate the importance of this work, when he stated that "the canal is the most important subject now connected with the commercial growth and progress of the United States."

And I declare that, next to the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, the most important work for the industrial development of the United States is the construction of great inland canals from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard and to the Gulf of Mexico.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while the importance of the Nicaragua Canal to the commerce of the world and to the United States is obvious, its construction as a military necessity is paramount, and our arguments for the American policy against neutrality in times of war are wholly based upon the considerations of military necessity and self-preservation.

Whenever and by whomsoever a canal may be built connecting the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, the American policy is to grant equal commercial privileges of that canal to all nations, and by the application of the Monroe doctrine it will retain the military advantages of that canal to the United States only. And in stating this proposition, I believe, Mr. Chairman, I represent nine-tenths of my constituency.

HON. HENRY F. NAPHEN,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, May 31, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. NAPHEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: How to deal with trusts is one of the most important problems which absorbs the public thought to-day. It is not temporary; it will remain until properly solved. I admit that paternal theory of government is very objectionable, yet I believe that the National Government, which protects us from foes from without, should have authority to guard us against foes from within—combinations which restrain trade, create monopolies, and increase or decrease the price of commodities at their will. They are commercial cancers on the body politic, and if not removed will endanger our safety.

In 1865 Abraham Lincoln wrote:

I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war, corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign upon the prejudices of the people until all the wealth is aggregated into a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of the country than ever before, even in the midst of war.

Prophetic words—the crisis to which he referred is upon us. We require legislation to protect us from the power of corporations and trusts. I am therefore emphatically in favor of a constitutional amendment giving to Congress authority to deal with this danger. I object, however, to the amendment in its present form.

Section 1 reads as follows:

All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

By the language of this section I am justified in assuming that the majority of the Judiciary Committee maintain that the Constitution does not extend to Porto Rico or the Philippines of its own force and vigor, and that Congress can extend it or withhold it as in its judgment seems best.

The United States includes all places over which our jurisdiction extends. Our jurisdiction extends over new possessions, and its peoples owe us their allegiance. Those islands are as much a part of our great Republic as Alaska or Oklahoma, and the Constitution is as much there as it is in any of our domestic Territories. The Constitution is the source of all power given to Congress to legislate. This power is not absolute. The Constitution is the measure and test of this power. Whatever powers are not expressed or implied from the grants in the Constitution are reserved, and Congress can not act outside or beyond those powers. To assert otherwise is to say that it is greater than its creator—the Constitution. If the Constitution does not extend to our new possessions of its own force and vigor, and it requires Congressional action to send it there—and we have not exported it there yet—by what process will the proposed amendment to the Constitution reach there in advance of the instrument itself?

If we admit that in any emergency an amendment to the Constitution can by an act of Congress apply to those islands and the rest of the instrument be withheld, we concede that any section or clause of this instrument can be detached by Congress, and that Congress can extend it to one portion of our land to-day and take it away from another part to-morrow, for the power to repeal is incident to the power to enact; and the people would be at the mercy of the arbitrary power of Congress to establish royalty or other unrepublican institutions or form of government as it saw fit, and this government would no longer be of the people, by the people, and for the people. The Constitution must not become the shuttlecock for Congress, to be sported back and forth, here and there, as its fancy may dictate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Section 2 of the proposed amendment reads as follows:

Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise. The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

By this section Congress will be the sole depositary of the power on this subject. Where power is given to Congress over a certain subject-matter to regulate, power over such subject-matter is taken from the States and can not be reserved to them by general terms, as in this section. There can not be concurrent jurisdiction in the State and Federal courts or legislatures where the legislative or judicial power to define and regulate is placed in Congress. We should reserve to the States respectively the power which they possess at the present time over this question, when a trust or a combination exists or operates exclusively within the confines of a single State.

The proposed amendment will take all powers from the States and nullify the existing State statutes. I admit that laws have been passed by many of the States to prohibit those unlawful combinations, and that they have increased and grown strong. So they have likewise regardless of the law enacted by Congress. It is rather the lack of the enforcement of the law, than the lack of the law that is the cause of their growth.

In no State are there stronger laws against combinations than in Massachusetts. The main purpose sought by the laws of Massachusetts is to protect the consuming public from overcharge, and at the same time protect the investor in shares of corporations organized in that State. There is no power, however, to protect the public from investments in shares of overcapitalized and fraudulent corporations organized in other States.

If it were possible for all States to adopt laws similar to those in Massachusetts, or if Federal laws on the subject could be adopted, the result would be a desirable one. It is needless to say that the proposed amendment will nullify the existing statutes on this subject of Massachusetts. This amendment may also interfere with the police power, under which States in legislating exercise governmental functions of the highest order, and of a class with which the courts should not interfere, as there is a difficulty to determine sometimes how far certain legislation can be upheld under the police power.

Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case said:

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnished the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, or more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

Section 2 is further objectionable by the fact that the word "combinations" might be construed to refer to labor organizations, and might therefore prohibit such combinations to protect their rights. It should be amended to apply to combinations in restraint of trade and be distinctly stated not to apply to labor organizations, which are necessary for the protection of the workmen of this country, as many of the trusts have greater control to-day over labor than in the past, and have it within their power to coerce the workmen to become more submissive. It therefore becomes necessary for the laboring man to organize for self-protection, and such organizations should not come within the prohibition of this amendment.

The attitude of the Republican party on this trust question is much like the citizen who was in favor of the prohibitory law but against its enforcement. The Republican party professes to be against trusts. Though laws have been upon our statute books against combinations they have not been enforced when the representatives of this party had the power. This Constitutional amendmend coming now on the eve of the adjournment of Congress, is convincing proof to any observer, that it is offered for campaign purposes, and not in good faith.

The Republican party has been in power four years, yet no attempt had been made to legislate against trusts or combinations until after a resolution to amend the Constitution to enlarge the power of Congress on this subject was offered at the beginning of the present session by a Democrat. Even in the last Republican national convention no reference was made to trusts, though the Democratic party in one of the planks of its last national platform declared that—

The formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government over these arteries of commerce.

Away down deep in the souls of the advocates of this amendment they do not want it to become a law. Though professing to offer it for the welfare of the people, it is offered for the welfare of their party, and they are attempting to mislead the people as to the real cause of the trusts and the remedy to reach them. They know full well that without reserving to the States the power they now possess this amendment will never be adopted. It is simply a sop thrown out to the public which they will not accept.

The people do not want politics; they will not be deceived—they want justice and fair dealing. They want a party to be honest in its declarations. If not, the people will sooner or later discover this and inflict a punishment. Nevertheless, if this be the only legislation that through the generosity of the Republican party we can obtain, with all its faults I shall be constrained to vote for it, as I am against trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, first, last, and always, and any legislation having that end in view I cheerfully welcome. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there will be no necessity for a constitutional amendment if we reduce the high tariff. Trusts are the direct result of this high-tariff policy. It is their incubator, and while it exists they will continue to multiply and grow strong.

By excluding foreign productions or enhancing their price to such an extent that they could not be sold here, except at greatly more than their actual value—that is, the cost of their production plus a reasonable profit—an opportunity was afforded to the American manufacturer to increase or decrease the price of his product without adding to the cost of production. The result of this was that a large amount of capital was immediately invested in the protected industries. Manufacturing industries were multiplied, and this increase, coupled with the invention of machinery and processes, so stimulated production that it outran the demand for the product.

That was the condition which confronted the country when the trust movement began. The unit of production had exceeded the unit of consumption. This meant that when sufficient goods had been made to meet the demand, production must be suspended for a greater or less length of time, according to the facility and rapidity of the manufacturer of the particular article. This condition led to the formation of trusts. Those carrying on a certain industry combined, not to find a wider market for their products, not for the public good, but to increase prices by curtailing production.

A, B, and C, for instance, engaged in a certain manufacture, came together and agreed to run their plants a certain portion of the time, or they shut down the factory of C and turned the workmen into the street, and increased the price of the article without increasing the wages of the workmen. This they could do when they were the principal producers of the article in question. The hardship fell first upon the employees who were employed only a part of the time, or who lost their employment altogether, and next upon the general public, who were obliged to pay the increased price. The result is that the prices of everything we buy to-day are not regulated "honestly by fair and open competition in the public market," but arbitrarily and dishonestly by "combinations."

The people pay extravagantly for every article used which is controlled by such combinations. They charge the maximum price for everything purchased, and if they have an excess of product they send it abroad, selling it in competition with the foreign products, which they say would ruin them if admitted to this country, at prices less than the people pay here. American products of innumerable kinds can be purchased cheaper in European countries, for less than we are compelled to pay for them in America. Steamers plying between New York and Boston and Philadelphia and European ports buy their supplies—mostly American—on the other side of the Atlantic, because they are cheaper there than they are here.

If foreign products were admitted to this country with only a reasonable rate of duty, and the American producer placed his price at an exorbitant figure, the people could buy the foreign article and the home producer would be compelled to lower his price, and we would have the same advantage which the foreign consumers of American products now get at the expense of the people here. In other words, the doctrine of the trust manipulators is, "keep out the competition of foreign producers; restrict our production to what the people must have, and make them pay the uttermost dollar we can squeeze out of them."

Though the price of every article which is absolutely necessary to the existence of the American workman has increased, his earnings have not increased in proportion. His vote, however, can secure for him a cheaper market, if he but exercise his rights.

Another serious objection to trusts is the opportunity it affords for overcapitalization; that is, A, B, and C, which are each worth $50,000, can form a stock company and put the capital at $300,000.

This overcapitalization is a great stimulus to speculation and gambling in trust stocks. The president of a corporation can realize more in a month in "bulling" and "bearing" the stocks of his corporation than the corporation can legitimately make in a year. The business of the trust, whether the manufacture of sugar, tobacco, or copper, is sacrificed to the dealing in its securities. These are elevated or depressed in value, by artificial means, without reference to the actual business conditions or profits of the mine, factory, or refinery. The necessity of declaring a dividend to maintain the market price of the stock may necessitate a reduction of expenses, which almost invariably means a reduction in the wages of the workmen, and hence come strikes, violence, bloodshed, the interposition of troops, distress to employees, general demoralization, and loss to both employers and employees.

These trusts are dangerous to the public in other ways. They control vast sums of money. The aggregate capital of all trusts in this country to-day is not much below $5,000,000,000, which is equal to one-fifth of the assessed valuation of all taxable property of the United States at the time of the last census. In 1898 alone there were 98 new trusts organized, with a capital amounting to nearly $2,000,000,000.

They have influenced legislatures, packed juries, defied the law, and done more to lower the standard of political honesty and morality than all the other agencies combined. They support lobbies. There is no more dangerous tendency in the United States than the increasing use of money in procuring legislation. The logical outcome of this tendency will be that we shall have a government of money and not of men.

Pretty much everything that is consumed is now controlled by the trusts, and the cost has been increased by restriction of production or the necessity of paying dividends on watered stock. And this increase extends to every article that is used into which enters any product controlled by a trust. It touches us indirectly in innumerable ways. By indirectly I mean without perhaps bringing the fact to the attention of the people directly.

The iron and steel trust enhances the price of steel rails, for instance. You may think that this does not affect the public, as they are not dealing in steel rails, but the increased cost to the railroads directly affects the people in the matter of fares. Every increase in running expenses deprives a railroad of so much money, which otherwise would be expended in greater facilities, better accommodations, and lower rates. It affects the cost of stoves, and tools, and the thousand and one things into the manufacture of which iron enters. It increases the cost of machinery, and therefore the cost of everything the machinery produces.

The price of your coal is arbitrarily fixed by half a dozen men in New York. The output might be kept even and the price would be constantly reduced, but with an excess of supply the production is restricted and the price advanced.

Copper, tin, iron, steel, tobacco, sugar, salt, beef, leather, rubber, biscuits, and a hundred other articles are controlled by those gigantic monopolies, the stockholders of which grow rich at the public's expense.

The people are aware of the colossal fortunes which the Standard Oil Company has produced for its managers. The Rockefeller millions came from every man using a kerosene lamp. If these men had been contented with moderate incomes the oil would have cost less than one half of what is paid for it. But by bribery of legislatures, by collusion with railroad corporations, this company has built up the most stupendous monopoly that has ever existed. It has defied judicial control and wields a deadly war against any competitor.

The same thing is true, or will be true to a greater or less extent according to the opportunity offered, of all other trusts. They will grow in power and wealth, and unless they are checked they will become the real masters of the people. They control the legislation of the country and govern it as a matter of fact; and we have substantially come to a time when the people are almost helpless, and will soon be entirely helpless, unless they rouse themselves and put an effective stop to the present tendency.

This has been the result of Republican legislation. Now that the people have become disturbed and alarmed at the increase in number and power of these combinations, the Republican party is seeking by legislation to evade its responsibility in the matter, and to proclaim its purpose to repudiate its own offspring.

The attitude of the Republican party toward these organizations is well illustrated by Dogberry's instructions to the watch in Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing."

DOGBERRY. This is your charge: You shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man stand in the Prince's name.

WATCHMAN. How if he will not stand?

DOGBERRY. Why, then, take no note of him, but let him go; and presently call the rest of the watch together and thank God that you are rid of the knave.

The Republican party now bids the trusts to stand, but later will take no note of them and let them go.

We can control the industry of one country, if we are protected from competition from other countries; but we can not control a given industry all over the world. We might as well undertake to fix the output and price of any world-wide commodity for all countries and peoples.

The different conditions, advantages, necessities, intelligence, wants, industries, productive power, and climate prevent that uniformity and agreement which would be required to make industrial control of any product practically effective.

If our people are prevented by artificial contrivances from buying to advantage in this country, give them the privilege of the world's markets. Wherever you find a trust controlling a product, and arbitrarily enhancing its cost to the people, make that product free. In a world-wide competition the prices of the trust products would fall to their normal position, there would be no profits for inflated and watered capital, and the inducement of extravagant gains which led to the formation of these organizations being removed, they will close their books and go out of existence. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Rebellion Claim of the State of Nevada.

If there are any claims that are just and proper, which the United States ought to pay, this is one of them. It is as sacred an obligation, in my judgment, as the national bonds.—Senator Teller.

There is no sort of question as to its justice. It is just as much due as your board bill, which you have to pay every month.—Senator Hawley.

I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senate is committed to these State claims by vote, by sentiment, and it is only a question of time when they will pass.—Senator Hale in 1891.

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. STEWART,

OF NEVADA.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Wednesday, June 6, 1900.

The Senate having under consideration the rejection by the House of the following amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11212) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes:

"To pay the State of Nevada the sum of $462,441.97 for moneys advanced in aid of the suppression of the rebellion in the civil war, as found and reported to Congress on January 22, 1900, by the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899"—

Mr. STEWART said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I regret very much that the House did not agree to this amendment. It will be a sorry disappointment to Nevada. I am compelled to take the liberty to make a short statement with regard to it, although the hour is late. The erroneous impressions which surround the claim must be now dispelled. There is no other claim of any State bearing the slightest analogy to it, except the claims of California and Oregon. There is no danger of its being made a precedent, for every other State has been paid in full for like aid in suppressing the rebellion. The contention that other States have claims of a similar nature is false. The claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada are precisely of the same character as the claims of the other States which have been paid. These claims are for arming, equipping, and paying soldiers in aid of the suppression of the rebellion. Although bounties were paid to soldiers by California, Oregon, and Nevada and by individuals with great liberality, no claim has been presented for any such bounties. The claim they present is for supplying, equipping, and paying soldiers.

A peculiar condition arose on the Pacific coast which did not exist elsewhere. The United States for more than eleven years preceding the outbreak of the rebellion paid the army operating on the Pacific fully twice as much as was paid to the soldiers in the Atlantic States, for the reason that the expense of living on the Pacific coast was more than double the expense of living in the Atlantic States.

The following acts of Congress show the legislative policy of the Government:

On the 17th of June, 1850, an act was passed, the third section of which reads as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever enlistments are made at, or in the vicinity of, the said military posts, and remote and distant stations, a bounty equal in amount to the cost of transporting and subsisting a soldier from the principal recruiting depot in the harbor of New York to the place of such enlistment be, and the same is hereby, allowed to each recruit so enlisted, to be paid in unequal installments at the end of each year's service, so that the several amounts shall annually increase and the largest be paid at the expiration of each enlistment. (U. S. Stat., volume 9, page 439.)

On the 28d of September, 1850, the following provision was inserted in the Army appropriation bill:

For extra pay to the commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States, serving in Oregon or California, $325,854, on the following basis, to wit: That there shall be allowed to each commissioned officer as aforesaid, whilst serving as aforesaid, a per diem, in addition to their regular pay and allowances, of $2 each; and to each enlisted man as aforesaid, whilst serving as aforesaid, a per diem, in addition to their present pay and allowances, equal to the pay proper of each as established by existing laws, said extra pay of the enlisted men to be retained until honorably discharged. This additional pay to continue until the 1st of March, 1852, or until otherwise provided. (U. S. Stat., volume 9, page 504.)

Under these acts it was the established policy of the Government to make extra allowance to the officers and men amounting to fully double the amount paid in the Atlantic States. By some strange freak of fortune, probably accidental, a provision crept into the act of August 3, 1861, reorganizing the Army, which changed the whole policy of the Government with regard to officers and soldiers serving on the Pacific coast. The ninth section of that act reads as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the three months' extra pay allowed by the twenty-ninth section of the act of the 5th of July, 1838, for reenlistments under certain conditions, the bounty granted by the third section of the act of the 17th of June, 1850, for enlistments at remote and distant stations and the premium now paid for bringing accepted recruits to the rendezvous, be, and they are hereby, abolished. (12 Stats., 288.)

This legislation repealed all laws allowing extra pay on the Pacific and placed the Government in an unfortunate position. As the civil war progressed, the forces of the Confederate States invaded New Mexico and Arizona, and through their agency the Indians were inspired to cut off overland mail communication. In the meantime greenbacks had fallen from 40 to 50 per cent on the dollar. A soldier on the Pacific coast receiving his pay in greenbacks was compelled to convert it into coin, which reduced the amount to less than $8 per month. Plenty of men were ready to enlist in the cause of their country, but they could not with $8 a month supply themselves with those necessaries which a soldier serving in that country must have, and of course nothing was left for their families.

The States of California and Oregon, and the Territory of Nevada were not behind any other section of the country in paying bounties to soldiers and in contributing to the sanitary fund. The Territory of Nevada contributed to that fund more in proportion to population than any State in the Union. None of the Pacific States have ever dreamed of demanding a dollar to be refunded from the General Government for bounties paid or for any other patriotic contributions. Still it is contended that if California, Oregon, and Nevada are paid for the advances which they made to put soldiers in the field, the other States must be paid for donations and bounties. This is the only argument adduced against the claim, and it is contended in another place that if California, Oregon, and Nevada are paid, as the other States have been paid, for the money advanced to equip soldiers and put them in the field, the other States which have already received their money for their legitimate advances will come forward and demand to have refunded all the money they have paid for bounties and donations. Such contention is without merit and extremely unjust to the Pacific States.

Before Congress repealed the double pay and allowance which had been the established policy on the Pacific coast an act was passed on July 27, 1861, for the reimbursement of every State which had advanced and should advance money to equip and pay soldiers. It is as follows:

An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

In 1862 Congress, by a resolution, gave this act a liberal construction. The following is the resolution:

A resolution declaratory of the intent and meaning of a certain act therein named.

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the true intent and meaning of act No. 18, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," approved July 27, 1861:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said act shall be construed to apply to expenses incurred as well after as before the date of the approval thereof.

Approved, March 8, 1862. (12 Stat. L., page 615.)

The United States Supreme Court in the New York cases (160 U. S., 598) held that the act of July 27, 1861, and the resolution of Congress of March 8, 1862, created on the part of the United States an obligation to indemnify the States for any costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred for the purposes expressed in the act of 1861, the title of which shows that its object was "to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States."

And again, on March 19, 1862, Congress adopted the following resolution:

A resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to accept moneys appropriated by any State for the payment of its volunteers, and to apply the same as directed by such State.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any State during the present rebellion shall make any appropriation to pay the volunteers of that State, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept the same, and cause it to be applied by the Paymaster-General to the payments designated by the legislative act making the appropriation, in the same manner as if appropriated by act of Congress; and also to make any regulations that may be necessary for the disbursement and proper application of such funds to the specific purpose for which they may be appropriated by the several States.

When the war was over all the States, except California, Oregon, and Nevada, which contributed to put soldiers in the field and pay them, were reimbursed for their expenditures. The sum of $44,725,072.38 was distributed among the States as follows:

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, March 15, 1892.

When California, Oregon, and Nevada presented their claims for precisely the same kind of disbursements, a technical objection was made thereto in the Treasury Department. It was argued that inasmuch as the Government paid the officers and soldiers serving on the Pacific coast the same amount in greenbacks which it paid the soldiers of the Eastern States, the Pacific States had no claim for money advanced by them. This argument wholly ignores the fact that the cost of living on the Pacific coast at that time was at least three times as much as the cost of living in the Eastern States, and that the Government had recognized that fact and had, at all times previous to August 3, 1861, paid double compensation to officers and soldiers serving on the Pacific coast. Unfortunately the repeal of this extra allowance for the army of the Pacific occurred at a time when the difference in the cost of living and of supplies between the Atlantic and the Pacific was greater than ever before. Freights across the Isthmus and around the Horn were more than doubled by reason of the war, and mail communication was hazardous and uncertain.

An emergency finally arose in the early part of 1863 which made the raising of troops in California, Oregon, and particularly in the Territory of Nevada indispensable. Overland mail communication was cut off from the East by Indians cooperating with the Confederate forces, and the privateers of the Confederacy endangered mail communication by water. The Government pay of $13 a month in greenbacks, amounting to about $8 in gold, was wholly inadequate. More money had to be furnished to put troops in the field. The commanding officers on the Pacific coast, under instructions from Washington, made requisition upon California, Oregon, and the Territory of Nevada for more troops. The legislatures of those States and of the Territory of Nevada responded liberally and advanced enough money to make the pay of the soldiers very nearly equivalent to the amount which the Government had been in the habit of paying in those regions. Nobody had the slightest doubt that these advances would be reimbursed under the act of July 27, 1861, above quoted, which has served so good a purpose to the other States in securing for them over $44,000,000.

On the 27th day of June, 1882, another act was passed to secure payment for the Indian wars of Texas and other States arising subsequent to the rebellion. California, Oregon, and Nevada were included in that act under the supposition that it would secure the payment of the war claims of those States. The first section of that act reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, with the aid and assistance of the Secretary of War, to cause to be examined and investigated all the claims of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, against the United States of America for moneys alleged to have been expended and for indebtedness alleged to have been assumed by said States and Territories in organizing, arming, equipping, supplying, clothing, subsisting, transporting, and paying the volunteer and military forces of said States and Territories called into active service by the proper authorities thereof between the 15th day of April, in the year 1861, and the date of this act, to repel invasions and Indian hostilities in said States and Territories and upon their borders, including all proper expenses necessarily incurred by said States and Territories on account of said forces having been so called into active service as aforesaid, and also all proper claims paid or assumed by said States and Territories for horses and equipments actually lost by said forces while in the line of duty in active service (excepting and excluding therefrom any claim said State of Oregon may have for money expended and indebtedness assumed or incurred in suppressing Modoc Indian hostilities during the Modoc Indian war and in defending that State from invasion by said Indians during the years 1872 and 1873, which were submitted to and passed upon, by either approval or rejection, by Insp. Gen. James A. Hardie, United States Army). Said accounts for and on behalf of said State of Texas shall be confined to claims arising since the 20th day of October, 1865, and shall include the necessary expenses of defense against Mexican raids or invasions, as well as those for defense against Indian hostilities, and for and on behalf of said Territories of Idaho and Washington for said claims arising in the years 1877 and 1878. (22 Stats., 111.)

After the passage of this act the Secretary of War represented that he could not perform the labor required under the act without assistance, and a board of war claims examiners was provided by Congress under the following act:

An act for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail three Army officers to assist him in examining and reporting upon the claims of the States and Territories named in the act of June 27, 1882, chapter 241 of the laws of the Forty-seventh Congress, and such officers, before entering upon said duties, shall take and subscribe an oath that they will carefully examine said claims, and that they will, to the best of their ability, make a just and impartial statement thereof, as required by said act.

Approved August 4, 1886. (24 Stat. L., 217.)

Secretary Lincoln considering these acts together, namely, the acts of 1861, under which the other States were paid, and the act of 1882, came to the conclusion that the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada could be paid under them without further legislation. But his successor, Secretary Endicott, raised all sorts of technical objections and nothing was done. Whereupon the Senate adopted a resolution requiring the board of war claims examiners to investigate and report upon the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada. The board did its duty faithfully and examined with great care and particularity these claims and all the circumstances connected with them. Every item was scrutinized.

Elaborate reports were made to Congress, consisting of three large volumes of about 750 pages each. (See Sentae Executive Documents 10, 11, and 17, Fifty-first Congress, first session.)

These reports were referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee reported a bill for the payment of the claims, and an amendment for that purpose was put on the general deficiency bill of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress.

The Pacific Coast States, however, were unfortunate in the House. They had no representation on the Committee on Appropriations. Mr. Sayers, of Texas, was a member of that committee and was fortunate enough to secure for Texas $1,175,793.87 for Indian wars which arose subsequent to the rebellion.

The history of these claims in the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

Fiftieth Congress, first session. Senate bill 2918. Reported from Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. STEWART. Senate Report 1286.

Senate bill 3420. Introduced by Mr. STEWART. Reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. STEWART. Senate Report 3014. Passed the Senate.

Senate bill 3489. Favorably reported from the House Committee on War Claims by Mr. STONE. House Report 3306.

House bill 7450. Introduced by Mr. CLUNIE. Favorably reported by Mr. STONE, from Committee on War Claims. House Report 2553. Passed the Senate in general deficiency bill March 3, 1891.

Fifty-second Congress. Senate bill 52. Introduced by Mr. STEWART. Favorably reported by Mr. DAVIS, from Committee on Military Affairs. Senate Report 158.

Fifty-fourth Congress. Senate bill 51, by Mr. STEWART, and Senate bill 53, by Mr. Mitchell. Senate bill 1650. Introduced by Mr. White. Favorably reported by Mr. STEWART from Committee on Claims. Senate Report 145.

House bill 31, by Mr. Johnson, of California.

House bill 1243. Introduced by Mr. Maguire. Favorably reported by Mr. OTJEN from the Committee on War Claims. House Report 1648.

House bill 8733, reported by Mr. Hermann as a substitute.

Fifty-fifth Congress. Senate bill 441. Introduced by Mr. STEWART. S. 1141, by Mr. MCBRIDE. Claim was favorably reported by Mr. STEWART from the Committee on Claims, as amendment to S. 3545 (the "omnibus bill"). Senate Report 544, part 2. Passed the Senate in "omnibus bill."

H. R. 396, by Mr. Maguire, of California.

Fifty-sixth Congress. Amendment by Mr. STEWART to House bill 11537. Favorably reported from the Committee on Claims by Mr. STEWART, Senate Report 1351, and passed the Senate May 31, 1900.

All these reports were unanimous, and it never occurred to the committees of the House or the Senate, where these cases were frequently argued, that there was any want of equity in the claims of these States.

The difficulty of passing these claims and other acknowledged meritorious claims on appropriation bills led to a movement to consolidate them in an "omnibus bill." For that purpose the following section was incorporated in the general deficiency appropriation bill of July 19, 1897:

To enable the Committee on Claims of the Senate to fully examine into all the evidence in all cases of just claims that are now before them, or that have been favorably reported and not finally disposed of, with the view of reporting the same to the Senate at the beginning of the next session of Congress, $1,000, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, and said sum, or any part thereof, in the discretion of the chairman, may be paid as additional compensation to the clerk and assistant clerk of said committee. (30 Stats., 138.)

In the following session an "omnibus bill," providing for the payment of Southern claims, French spoliation claims, etc., was enacted into law. As the bill passed the Senate it contained the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada without opposition. But the fate of the measure was very different in the House. An objection came in that body from a most unexpected source. Although I am not at liberty to discuss the conduct of members in the other House, still I may allude to matters which have gone into history. The opposition of Mr. LOUD of California defeated the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada on the "omnibus bill." When that bill was before the House Mr. LOUD said:

Now, I want to say one word about the claims of the State of California. When this bill went into conference, I took occasion to repeat on this floor what had been repeated for many years and what I, without investigation, had accepted as a fact. You remember I held this claim up some time before permitting it to go into conference. My own State had in that bill claims amounting to nearly $4,000,000. It is a great temptation to the average member of Congress, Mr. Speaker, to see a claim of his own State or his own community amounting to $4,000,000 included in a bill. There was an agreement, as I stated at that time, that those claims never should be passed upon favorably by the conferees. I made at that time the charge that there was a compact. Believing then that those claims were just, I took occasion to say that every State in the Union had been paid for similar claims, and I immediately proceeded to investigate the record in this case, covering hundreds and hundreds of pages, musty now, to fortify myself to support these claims upon the floor of the House.

The further I went into the investigation of these claims the more I was convinced, step by step, that they never had even equity before Congress. It may require some courage to say this with regard to the claims of a man's own State, but the claims of the State of California, the State of Oregon, and the State of Nevada, standing upon exactly the same plane, are simply claims for bounty; and there has not been a single State in the Union so far that has been reimbursed for the extra pay or bounty given to troops.—Congressional Record, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, volume 33, part 3, page 2658.

This speech, of course, was fatal to the claims of the Pacific States. They were beaten in the House. The bill went into conference. The conferees on the part of the House could not agree to the payment of these claims, but suggested that the claim of Nevada, which was a Territory at the time the advances were made, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for another investigation, and accordingly the following provision was incorporated in the "omnibus bill" and became a law:

That the claim of the State of Nevada for moneys advanced in aid of the suppression of the rebellion in the civil war be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and report to Congress at the next session the amount furnished by said State of Nevada, or by the Territory of Nevada and assumed by said State, in aid of the suppression of the rebellion of the civil war, with such interest on the same as said State has actually paid, together with what amounts have been heretofore paid by the United States. (30 Stats., 1203.)

The Secretary of the Treasury performed the duty required by this statute, and on the 19th day of January, 1900, made the following report (House Document 322, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1900.

SIR: Referring to the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat., page 1203), upon the subject of the claim of the State of Nevada for moneys advanced in aid of the suppression of the rebellion in the civil war, and calling for report to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury thereon, I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of statement of the case made by the Auditor for the War Department January 18, 1900.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 18, 1900.

SIR: In reply to your communication of March 11, 1899, requesting a report under provisions of act of March 3, 1899, paragraph "State claims" (Public, 190), upon the claim of the State of Nevada for moneys advanced in aid of the suppression of the rebellion in the civil war, I have the honor to state the following:

On December 24, 1889, the Secretary of War, acting in accordance with a resolution of the Senate of February 27, 1889, transmitted a full and complete statement showing the amount expended by the State of Nevada, with such interest on the same as the State had paid between February 10, 1865, and June 30, 1889, amounting in all to the sum of $412,600.31. This report is found in Executive Document No. 10, first session Fifty-first Congress.

From a certified statement of Samuel P. Davis, State comptroller of Nevada, made on December 19, 1899, it appears that since the time covered by the report of the Secretary of War—i. e., from June 30, 1889, to December 31, 1899—the State of Nevada has paid the sum of $58,401.27 as interest upon money paid by the State in aiding in suppressing the rebellion in the civil war. Accordingly, assuming this statement to be correct, the total amount expended by the State of Nevada, or by the Territory of Nevada and assumed by said State, with such interest on the same as the said State has actually paid, amounts to $471,001.58.

Upon reports of an examination of this claim made by the State war claims examiners, the Third Auditor, and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, under act of June 27, 1882, the sum of $7,559.61 was allowed and paid to the State of Nevada on April 10, 1888. This amount, deducted from the total amount paid by the State of Nevada, leaves the sum of $462,441.97 for which the State has not been reimbursed. The following is a tabulated statement of this claim:

Amount of claim of the State of Nevada, including interest up to June 30, 1889, as shown in the report of the Secretary of War (see page 10, Senate Document No. 10, Fifty-first Congress)	$412,600.31
Amount of interest paid by Nevada from June 30, 1889, to December 31, 1899	58,401.27
Total claim	471,001.58
Amount which the State was reimbursed on April 10, 1888, under act of June 27, 1882	8,559.61
Total paid by the State for which no reimbursement has been made	462,441.97

Respectfully,

F. H. MORRIS, Auditor.

In compliance with this report the Senate inserted the following amendment in the sundry civil appropriation bill on May 31, 1900:

To pay the State of Nevada the sum of $462,441.97 for moneys advanced in aid of the suppression of the rebellion in the civil war, as found and reported to Congress on January 22, 1900, by the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided in an act of Congress approved March 3, 1899.

When this amendment was pending in the House, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, as was natural, relied on the speech of Mr. LOUD to defeat the claim. He said:

Now, one single word more, and I am done. The gentleman from Nevada said my first impression was in favor of this claim. So it was. As I understood it at first, I thought it ought to be paid. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] made a speech on this subject at the last session of Congress which I want this House to hear. It refers to just the state of mind that I was in during the various stages of investigation. First I thought the claim ought to be paid; then I knew it ought not to be paid unless we were ready to set a dangerous precedent.

Gentlemen will remember that while the State of Nevada has a claim of $400,000, the State of California has a claim of $4,000,000 of the same kind, standing on all fours, and that is agreed. Now, I ask the House to listen to what the gentleman from California said about this claim, his own State included, only March of last year; and I call for order, Mr. Speaker, while this speech is read. I think the judgment of the gentleman from California is always good; and when I find he has investigated a claim of $4,000,000 of his own State and says it ought not to be paid, his statement is doubly entitled to the attention of the House; and therefore I ask the House to give it attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Now I want to say one word about the claims of the State of California. When this bill went into conference, I took occasion to repeat on this floor what has been repeated for many years and what I, without investigation, had accepted as a fact. You remember I held this claim up some time before permitting it to go into conference. My own State had in that bill claims amounting to nearly $4,000,000. It is a great temptation to the average member of Congress, Mr. Speaker, to see a claim of his own State or his own community amounting to $4,000,000 included in a bill. There was an agreement, as I stated at that time, that those claims never should be passed upon favorably by the conferees. I made at that time the charge that there was a compact. Believing then that those claims were just, I took occasion to say that every State in the Union had been paid for similar claims, and I immediately proceeded to investigate the record in this case, covering hundreds and hudreds of pages, musty now, to fortify myself to support these claims upon the floor of the House.

"The further I went into the investigation of these claims, the more I was convinced, step by step, that they never had even equity before Congress. It may require some courage to say this with regard to the claims of a man's own State, but the claims of the State of California, the State of Oregon, and the State of Nevada, standing upon exactly the same plane, are simply claims for bounty; and there has not been a single State in the Union so far that has been reimbursed for the extra pay or bounty given to troops."

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is true, and the concluding words of the gentleman from California are true. There has never been a single State paid any one of these claims. Millions and millions of dollars were paid by the States. Are you ready to begin now to pay one State a claim of that kind?—Congressional Record, June 6, 1900.

How anyone could have asserted that the claims of the Pacific States were for bounties and their payment would be a precedent for refunding all the bounties paid by other States is incomprehensible. Certainly, anyone reading the reports of the war claims examiners and the numerous reports of the committees of both Houses of Congress would have been informed as to the nature of these claims. The following extracts from the reports of the war claims examiners show the nature of the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and the equitable grounds upon which they rest:

NEVADA.

Extra monthly pay—Liabilities assumed.

It appears from the affidavit of the State comptroller (herewith, marked Exhibit No. 2) that liabilities to the amount of $1,153.75 were assumed by the State of Nevada as successor to the Territory of Nevada on account of "costs, charges, and expenses for monthly pay to volunteers and military forces in the Territory and State of Nevada in the service of the United States," and that State warrants fully covering such liabilities were duly issued. It is also shown in the affidavit that of said warrants two for the sum of $11.33 and $8.50, respectively, have been paid, such payment reducing said liabilities to $1,133.92.

The circumstances and exigencies under which the Nevada legislature allowed this extra compensation to its citizens serving as volunteers in the United States Army are believed to have been substantially the same as those that impelled the legislatures of California and Oregon to a similar course of action for the relief of the contingent of troops raised in each of these States. Prices of commodities of every kind were extravagantly high during the war period in Nevada, which depended for the transportation of its supplies upon wagon roads across mountain ranges that were impassable for six months of every year, and at certain times, at least, during the said period the rich yields of the newly opened mines produced an extraordinary demand for labor, largely increasing wages and salaries. These high prices of commodities and services were coexistent with, though in their causes independent of, the depreciation of the Treasury notes, which did not pass current in that section of the country, though accepted through necessity by the troops serving there; and it is safe to say that in Nevada, as in California and Oregon, the soldier could buy no more with a gold dollar than could the soldier serving in the Eastern States with the greenback or paper dollar.

On the whole, therefore, we are decided in the conviction that in granting them this extra compensation the legislature was mainly instigated by a desire to do a plain act of justice to the United States volunteers raised in the State and performing an arduous frontier service, by placing them on the same footing, as regards compensation, with the great mass of the officers and soldiers of the United States Army serving east of the Rocky Mountains. It is true that the seven companies of infantry that were called for on October 19, 1864, had not been organized; and that on March 8, 1865, three days before the approval of the State law above noticed, the commanding general Department of the Pacific wrote as follows from his headquarters at San Francisco to the governor of Nevada (see page 287, Senate Executive Document No. 70, Fiftieth Congress, second session):

"What progress is making in recruiting the Nevada volunteers? I will need them for the protection of the State, and trust that you may meet with success in your efforts to raise them. I hope the legislature may assist you by some such means as have been adopted by California and Oregon."

But the fact remains that the declared purpose of the monthly allowance was to give a compensation to the Nevada volunteers (see section 1 of the act last referred to), and that when measured by the current prices of the country in which they were serving, their compensation from all sources did not exceed, if, indeed, it was equal to, the value of the money received as pay by the troops stationed elsewhere, i. e., outside of the Department of the Pacific.—Senate Executive Document No. 10, Fifty-first Congress, first session, page 7.

CALIFORNIA.

Extra pay to enlisted men.

By an act approved April 27, 1863, the legislature appropriated and set apart "as a soldiers' relief fund" the sum of $600,000, from which every enlisted soldier of the companies of California volunteers raised or thereafter to be raised for the service of the United States was to be paid, in addition to the pay and allowances granted him by the United States, a "compensation" of $5 per month from the time of his enlistment to the time of his discharge.

Drafted men, substitutes for drafted men, soldiers dishonorably discharged or discharged for disability existing at time of enlistment, were not to share in the benefits of the act, and, except in cases of married men having families dependent upon them for support, payment was not to be made until after discharge. Seven per cent interest-bearing bonds to the amount of $600,000, in sums of $500, with coupons for interest attached to each bond, were authorized to be issued on July 1, 1863. (Pages 349-351, Statement for Senate Military Committee.)

A few unimportant changes respecting the mode of payment in certain cases was made by act of March 15, 1864, and on March 31, 1866, the additional sum of $550,000 was appropriated for the payment of claims arising under its provisions, such sum to be transferred from the general fund of the State to the "Soldiers' Relief Fund."

Fearing that the total amount of $1,150,000 specifically appropriated might still prove insufficient to pay all the claims accruing under the act of April 27, 1863, above mentioned, the legislature directed, by an act which also took effect March 31, 1866 (page 604, Stats. of California, 1865-66), that the remainder of such claims should be audited and allowed out of the appropriation and fund made and created by the act granting bounties to the volunteers of California, approved April 4, 1864, and more fully referred to on page 19 of this report.

Upon the certificate of the adjutant-general of the State that the amounts were due under the provisions of the act and of the board of State examiners, warrants amounting to $1,459,270.21 were paid by the State treasurer, as shown by the receipts of the payees indorsed on said warrants.

It is worthy of note here that on July 16, 1863, the Governor of California, replying to a communication from the headquarters Department of the Pacific, dated July 5, 1863, advising him that under a resolution of Congress adopted March 9, 1863, the payments provided for by the State law of April 27, 1863, might be made through the officers of the Pay Department of the United States Army, stated that the provisions of said law were such as to preclude him from availing himself of the offer.

Some information as to the circumstances and exigencies under which this money was expended may be derived from the following extract from the annual report of the adjutant-general of the State for the year 1862, dated December 15, 1862:

"The rank and file of the California contingent is made up of material of which any State might be proud, and the sacrifices they have made should be duly appreciated and their services rewarded by the State. I do most earnestly recommend, therefore, that the precedent established by many of the Atlantic coast States of paying their troops in the service of the United States an additional amount monthly should be adopted by California, and that a bill appropriating, say, $10 per month to each enlisted man of the troops raised or to be raised in this State be passed. * * * This would be a most tangible method of recognizing the patriotic efforts of our soldiers, relieve many of their families from actual destitution and want, and hold out a fitting encouragement for honorable service." (Page 58, Statement for Senate Committee on Military Affairs.)

Your examiners are of the opinion that the favorable action which was taken on the above recommendation of the Adjutant-General can not be justly ascribed to any desire on the part of the legislature to avoid resort to a conscription, although the exclusion of drafted men from the benefits of the act indicates that they realized and deemed it proper to call attention to the possibility of a draft. Unlike the law of April 4, 1864, the benefits of which were confined to men who should enlist after the date of its passage and be credited to the quota of the State, the provisions of the act now under consideration extended alike to the volunteers who had already entered or had actually completed their enlistment contract and to those who were to enlist in the future. There is every reason for the belief that the predominating if not the only reason of the State authorities in enacting this measure was to allow their volunteers in the United States service such a stipend as would, together with the pay received by them from the General Government, amount to a fair and just compensation. In fact, as has already been stated, this was expressly declared to be the purpose of the act.

It appears that up to December 31, 1862, those of the United States troops serving in the Department of the Pacific who were paid at all—in some cases detachments had not been paid for a year or more—were generally paid in coin, but on February 9, 1863, instructions were issued from the Treasury Department to the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco that "checks of disbursing officers must be paid in United States notes." (Letter of Deputy Paymaster-General George H. Ringgold, dated February 13, 1863, to Paymaster-General; copy herewith marked Exhibit No. 10.)

Before this, greenbacks had become the current medium of exchange in all ordinary business transactions in the Eastern States, but in the Pacific Coast States and the adjoining Territories, gold continued to be the basis of circulation throughout the war.

At this time the paper currency had become greatly depreciated, and on February 28, 1863, the price of gold in Treasury notes touched 170. This action of the Government in compelling troops to accept such notes as an equivalent of gold in payment for services rendered by them in a section where coin alone was current gave rise to much dissatisfaction: for although gold could be bought in San Francisco at nearly the same price in Treasury notes as in New York, it must be remembered that the troops in the Department of the Pacific were largely stationed at remote and isolated points.

When paying in greenbacks for articles purchased by, or for services rendered to, them in these out-of-the-way places they were obliged to submit not only to the current discount in San Francisco but also to a further loss occasioned by the desire of the persons who sold the articles, or rendered the service, to protect themselves against possible further depreciation. It admits of little doubt that by reason of his inability to realize the full value of paper money, as quoted in the money centers, and of the fact that wages and the cost of living and of commodities of every kind were abnormally high (owing in great part to the development of newly-discovered mines in that region), the purchasing power of the greenback dollar in the hands of the average soldier serving in the Department of the Pacific was from the latter part of 1862 onward from 25 to 50 per cent less than that of the same dollar paid to his fellow-soldier in the East.

Representation of the great hardship the Treasury Department's instructions entailed upon the troops were promptly made. On March 10, 1863, the legislature telegraphed to Washington a resolution adopted on that date, instructing the State's delegation in Congress to impress upon the Executive "the necessity which exists of having officers and soldiers of the United States Army, officers, seamen, and marines of the United States Navy, and all citizen employees in the service of the Government of the United States serving west of the Rocky Mountains and on the Pacific coast, paid their salaries and pay in gold and silver currency of the United States, provided the same be paid in as revenue on this coast." (Page 46, Statement for Senate Committee on Military Affairs.)

And on March 16, 1863, Brig. Gen. G. Wright, the commander of the Department of the Pacific (comprising, besides California, the State of Oregon and the Territories of Nevada, Utah, and Arizona), transmitted to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army a letter of Maj. C. S. Drew, First Oregon Cavalry, commandant at Camp Baker, Oregon, containing an explicit statement of the effects of and a formal protest against paying his men in greenbacks. In his letter of transmittal (page 154, Ex. Doc. 70), General Wright remarked as follows:

"The difficulties and embarrassments enumerated in the major's communication are common to all the troops in this department, and I most respectfully ask the serious consideration of the General in Chief and the War Department to this subject. Most of the troops would prefer waiting for their pay to receiving notes worth but little more than half their face; but even at this ruinous discount officers, unless they have private means, are compelled to receive the notes. Knowing the difficulties experienced by the Government in procuring coin to pay the Army, I feel great reluctance in submitting any grievances from this remote department, but justice to the officers and soldiers demands that a fair statement should be made to the War Department."

It was under circumstances and exigencies such as these that the legislature themselves—all appeals to the General Government having proved futile—provided the necessary relief by the law of April 27, 1863. They did not even after that relax their efforts on behalf of United States troops, other than their own volunteers, serving among them, but on April 1, 1864, adopted a resolution requesting their representatives in Congress to "use their influence in procuring the passage of a law giving to the officers and soldiers of the Regular Army stationed on the Pacific coast an increase of their pay, amounting to 50 per cent on the amount now allowed by law."—Senate Executive Document No. 11, Fifty-first Congress, first session, page 23.

OREGON.

Extra monthly compensation to officers and enlisted men of volunteers.

The certificate of the State treasurer, duly authenticated by the secretary of state under the seal of the State, sets forth that the amounts severally paid out for the redemption of relief bonds, as shown by the books of the treasurer's office, as reported by the treasurer to the several legislative assemblies and as verified by the several joint committees (investigating commissions) of said assembly under the provisions of a joint resolution thereof, aggregate $90,476.33. The following books, papers, etc., are also submitted in evidence of payment:

(1) The canceled bonds.

(2) A copy of the relief bond register, the correctness of which is certified by the secretary of state and State treasurer, showing number of bond, to whom issued, date of issue, and amount of bond; also showing the date and rate of redemption. The reports of the joint committees of the legislature above mentioned, to the effect that they compared the record kept by the State treasurer with the bonds redeemed and found the amounts correct and agreeing with the amounts reported by the State treasurer to the legislative assembly, are entered in said bond register.

(3) Certificates of service given to the several Oregon volunteers upon which warrants were given entitling the holders to bonds. These certificates cover service for which the sum of $86,639.85 was due. The remainder of the certificates, the State authorities report, were not found, and are probably lost or destroyed.

(4) Copies of the muster rolls of the Oregon volunteers, certified to by the secretary of state, setting forth the entire service of each officer and enlisted man.

In all, bonds amounting to $93,637 were issued. As has been stated, but $90,476.33 is found to have been expended in the redemption of these bonds, some of which were redeemed at less than their face value. Five bonds, valued at $731, have not been redeemed.

The authority by which these bonds were issued is contained in an act of the legislature, which was approved on October 24, 1864 (copy herewith), appropriating a sum not exceeding $100,000, to constitute and be known as the "commissioned officers and soldiers' relief fund," out of which was to be paid to each commissioned officer and enlisted soldier of the companies of Oregon volunteers raised in the State for the service of the United States to aid in repelling invasion, etc., from the time of their enlistment to the time of their discharge, $5 per month in addition to the pay allowed them by the United States. Enlisted men not receiving an honorable discharge from the service, or volunteers discharged for disability existing at the time of enlistment, were not to be entitled to the benefits of the act, nor was payment under the provisions thereof to be made to an enlisted soldier until he should be honorably discharged the service; but enlisted married men having families dependent upon them were authorized to allot the whole or any portion of the monthly pay accruing to them for the support of such dependents.

A bond, bearing interest, payable semiannually, at 7 per cent per annum, redeemable July 1, 1875, with coupons for the interest attached, was to be issued by the secretary of state for such amount as the Adjutant-General should certify to be due under the provisions of the act to each man, whose receipt for the amount so paid him was to be taken by the secretary of state. Said bonds were to be paid to the recipient or order.

The circumstances and exigencies that led to the enactment of the above-cited law and to the expenditures incurred under its provisions were substantially the same as those which brought about the adoption of similar measures of relief in California and Nevada. It must have been patent to every one fully acquainted with the circumstances of the case that the volunteers that had been raised in Oregon at this time (October 24, 1864), consisting only of the seven companies of the First Oregon Cavalry and the independent detachment of four months' men, a majority of whom had then nearly completed their term, had been greatly underpaid, considering the nature of the service performed by them and the current rate of salaries and wages realized in other pursuits of life.

At the time of the enrollment and muster in of the First Oregon Cavalry, and up to the latter part of 1862, the Government paid those of its troops in the Department of the Pacific, that were paid at all, in specie; but, as often happened during the war, a number of the companies of the regiment named, occupying remote stations, remained unpaid for a long time and were finally paid in Treasury notes, some of the members having more than a year's pay due them.

During the remainder of the war the Government paid its troops in the Department of the Pacific, as elsewhere, in greenbacks. Referring to this condition of things and to the fact that coin continued to be the ordinary medium of exchange in Oregon in private business transactions, Maj. C. S. Drew, First Oregon Cavalry, in a letter to his department commander, dated March 4, 1863 (page 154, Ex. Doc. 70), called attention to the fact that at his station (Camp Baker) Treasury notes were worth "not more than 50 or 55 cents per dollar;" that each officer and soldier of his command was serving for less than half pay, and had done so, some of them, for sixteen months past; that while capital protected itself from loss and perhaps realized better profits than under the old and better system of payment in coin, "the soldier did not have that power, and if paid in notes must necessarily receipt in full for what is equivalent to him of half pay or less for the service he has rendered, and must continue to fulfill his part of the contract with the Government for the same reduced rate of pay until his period of service shall have terminated; and that "good men will not enlist for $6 or $7 a month while $13 is the regular pay, and, moreover, being realized by every soldier in every other department than the Pacific."

In forwarding this letter to the Adjutant-General United States Army, the department commander remarked that the embarrassments enumerated in the major's communication were common to all the troops in the department, and he therefore asked "the serious consideration of the General in Chief and the War Department to this subject." Some months later (August 18, 1863) General Alvord, while reporting to the department commander the location of a new military post at Fort Boise, referred to the difficulties encountered by the garrison charged with the duty of establishing it, as follows:

"Some difficulty is experienced in building the post in consequence of the low rates of legal-tender notes. In that country they bear merely nominal value. The depreciation of the Government currency not only embarrasses the Quartermaster's Department, but also tends greatly to disaffect the men. The differences between their pay and the promises held out by the richest mines, perhaps, on the coast, the proximity of which makes them all the more tempting, is so great that many desertions occur."—Ex. Doc. 70, page 188.

About the same time (September 1, 1863) the adjutant-general of the State complained of the inadequacy of the soldiers' pay, resulting from the depreciation of the paper currency with which they were paid. Referring to the fact that after the expiration of eight months from the date of the requisition of the United States military authorities for six additional companies for the First Oregon Cavalry but one had been raised, he said:

"And yet we are not prepared to say that it is for the want of patriotism on the part of the people of Oregon, but from other causes, partly from the deficiency in the pay of the volunteer in comparison with the wages given in the civil pursuits of life, as well as with the nature of the currency with which they are paid, the depreciation of which renders it hardly possible for the soldier to enlist from any other motive save pure patriotism. And I would here suggest that the attention of our legislature be called to this defect, and that additional pay, either in land, money, or something else, be allowed to those who have volunteered. Justice demands that this should be done."

In enacting the relief law of October 24, 1864, it is fair to presume that the legislature was largely influenced by the following statements and recommendations of the governor contained in his annual message dated September 15, 1864:

"The Snake and other tribes of Indians in eastern Oregon have been hostile and constantly committing depredations. The regiment has spent two summers on the plains, furnishing protection to the immigration and to the trade and travel in that region of the country. During the past summer the regiment has traveled over twelve hundred miles, and the officers and men are still out on duty. The officers and most, if not all, the men joined the regiment through patriotic motives, and, while some of the time they have been traveling over rich gold fields, where laborers' wages are from $3 to $5 per day, there have been very few desertions, and that, too, while they were being paid in depreciated currency, making their wages only about $5 per month.

A great many of these men have no pecuniary interest in keeping open the lines of travel, protecting mining districts and merchants and traders. The benefit of their service thus insures [inures] to the benefit of others, who should help these faithful soldiers in bearing these burdens. Oregon, in proportion to her population and wealth, has paid far less than other States for military purposes. California pays her volunteers $5 per month extra in coin. It would be but an act of simple justice for this State to make good to the members of this regiment their losses by depreciated currency. (Page 87, Statement for Senate Military Committee.)

It is to be noted here that while the officers and men who became the beneficiaries of this law had been paid in a depreciated currency, which in Oregon does not appear to have had more than two-thirds of the purchasing power it had in the East, the Government provided them with clothing, subsistence, shelter, and all their absolutely necessary wants. On the other hand, it is to be borne in mind that the legislature must have been aware of the fact noted, and that it granted the extra compensation from a sense of justice and without any purpose calculated to benefit the State at large, such as might be reasonably inferred from the granting of bounties to men "who should hereafter enlist." As has been already mentioned, the terms of the Oregon volunteers were drawing to a close and the benefits of the law were restricted to the volunteers "raised," and did not therefore include those "to be raised."—Senate Executive Document No. 17, Fifty-first Congress, first session, page 14.

The majority of the House of Representatives, relying upon the statement of Mr. LOUD, were evidently under the impression that these claims are for bounty and would be precedents for paying other States vast sums of money, and therefore voted against the claim. That impression may be removed by a correct understanding of the facts. If California would send a united delegation to Congress in favor of her just claims they would undoubtedly be paid, and Nevada would also receive what honestly belongs to her. Nevada is poor and needs the money. She contributed it at a time when the nation was in need of troops and when the Government could not obtain them without the assistance of the Territory of Nevada.

The claim of Nevada was so well understood in the Senate that it needed no argument to put it upon an appropriation bill. It had been considered so often and was so well understood by the able and leading men of the Senate who had participated in its discussion that as early as March 3, 1891, when an amendment for the payment of the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada was pending in the Senate, which amendment passed that body, Mr. HALE said:

I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senate is committed to those State claims by vote, by sentiment, and it is only a question of time when they will pass.

And on the 31st of May last, when the amendment for the payment of the claim of Nevada was pending in the Senate, and which was defeated in the House on the strength of the speech of Mr. LOUD, Senator HAWLEY, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, from which the Pacific States' claims had been twice favorably reported, said:

There is no sort of question as to its justice. It is just as much due as your board bill, which you have to pay every month.

On the same occasion Senator TELLER, who had reported the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada in the omnibus bill and passed them through the Senate, rose in his place and said:

If there are any claims that are just and proper which the United States ought to pay, this is one of them. It is as sacred an obligation, in my judgment, as the national bonds.

I might quote almost without end statements of leading Senators to the same effect. The reports of the committees of the House are equally strong in favor of the equity of these claims.

I do not want to be understood as claiming that the California delegation as such has been uniformly opposed to these claims. On the contrary, so far as my knowledge goes, the representatives from California in both Houses have been strongly in favor of the justice and equity of the claims of the Pacific States. Messrs. Clunie, Maguire, Caminetti, Johnson, Morrow, and McKenna and Senator White were active in their support. Senator PERKINS has been very earnest and persistent in supporting these claims ever since he has been a member of the Senate, and I believe that California will ultimately come to the rescue and aid in the passage of bills for their payment. I hope no further opposition to the payment of the just claim of Nevada will come from that source.

HON. CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, OF MAINE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. LITTLEFIELD said:

I am not certain, Mr. Speaker, but that the saying that is written in Chronicles is quite likely to prove to be true, and it is this: "And he said, go ye up and prosper, and they shall be delivered into your hand." That, I think, will turn out later to be the condition of our friends who represent the other side upon this proposition. I trust, Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this question, that I shall not find it necessary to become delirious or hysterical over the question of trusts. I have been sitting here and listening to the debate upon the other side. I have heard trusts characterized as "hydra-headed monsters," "robbers," "thieves," and the awful combinations that were grinding innocent women and children into the earth and bringing down prematurely Cimmerian darkness over the firmament. Assaults upon aggregations of capital have been inflammatory, intemperate, and unstinted.

Notwithstanding all this, I think it is proper to say at the outset that there are aggregations of capital, that there are corporations in this land which are legitimate and useful. The prevailing phase of modern business development undoubtedly involves the aggregation of extensive capital. It contemplates small profits and large volume of sales. It also requires the consolidation of separate interests, and these work out economies. It is sometimes the result of the cooperation of individuals representing the smaller units. This condition of things has advantages, and is subject to disadvantages. The advantages are that the consumer to-day, with this peculiarity of development which exists, receives and buys his goods cheaper than he ever did before. The disadvantages are that it eliminates individual competition and tends to sink individualism in the great aggregation or corporation. It is perfectly competent and proper for a legislative body to fulminate its denunciation against an evil aggregation, or against the corporation that violates the purposes of its organization, and undertakes to oppress the people.

But where there is one aggregation, where there is one corporation that is what might be called a "hydra-headed monster;" or, to use the expressive and beautiful language of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], that "has its villainous clutch on the throat of American energy," I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are hundreds, aye, I may say thousands, that are legitimate elements of enterprise, that conserve the interests of the people, that are in fact indispensable to the general welfare; and they are not to be railed at on this floor or in any campaign. Without great aggregations of capital no railroads could exist, no water power could be developed, no spindles could turn, no manufactories could turn out the multitudinous products of human ingenuity. The earth could not be compelled to surrender up its magnificent treasures for the uses of men, and it ill becomes this great body to make a general and universal assault upon capital because it is aggregated or consolidated. It is not enough to show that large dividends are paid, that the business is widely diffused, or that it is centralized and subject to the control of a president or board of directors.

It is only when it is injuriously aggregated, it is only when it is improperly aggregated—when it crushes out or seeks to crush out competition, when it is operated to restrain trade and commerce and oppresses the public—that it becomes a proper subject of legislation, a proper subject of judicial attention.

Great difficulties inhere in dealing practically and efficiently with a problem so intricate. To establish the line of demarcation between the lawful and unlawful corporation, aggregation, or syndicate may well engage the attention of the most acute mind.

That the change from syndicates to corporations, as a mode of operation for a monopoly, does not necessarily emancipate the enterprise from judicial control is quite clear if the principle announced by Mr. Justice Bailey is sound when he says:

* * * The trust, then, being repugnant to public policy and illegal, it is impossible to see why the same is not true of the corporation which succeeds to it and takes its place. The control exercised over the distillery business of the country—over production and prices—and the virtual monopoly formerly held by the trust, are in no degree changed or relaxed, but the methods and purposes of the trust are perpetuated and carried out with the same persistence and vigor as before the organization of the corporation. There is no magic in a corporate organization which can purge the trust scheme of its illegality, and it remains as essentially opposed to the principles of sound public policy as when the trust was in existence. It was illegal before and is illegal still, and for the same reasons. (Distilling, etc., Co. v. The People, 156 Ill., 491.) (1895.)

We all recognize the fact that there are in this country organizations, aggregations, corporations, trusts, that in their operation tend to stifle competition, tend to materially and improperly injure in their productive capacity our people, and interfere with the development of our resources. The Republican party suggests as an affirmative legal remedy for this condition of things, in addition to those which already exist two propositions—a constitutional amendment and an amendment to the existing law—and upon both of these propositions they are met by the Democratic party—a party, as I shall demonstrate before I finish the suggestions which I have occasion to make, uniformly and always of obstruction and never of construction.

NO UNNECESSARY DELAY IN THE LEGISLATION.

Is it suggested that these measures have been delayed until it is so late in the session that they can not receive favorable joint action on the part of both Houses, and therefore the majority are chargeable with insincerity? It should be remembered that the bill was introduced April 7 and referred to the Judiciary Committee; that various propositions as to constitutional amendments were introduced and referred prior to that time. Nor should it be forgotten, inasmuch as the minority have assumed to refer to the deliberations of the committee, that delays occurred in its deliberation at the request of the minority, and that at no time did the minority make any effort to bring about a speedier report to the House. More than this. These measures were reported to the House May 15 and 16, while the resolution fixing the day of adjournment was not introduced until May 21. Meanwhile it was impossible to arrange by agreement with the minority upon a time for their consideration. When attempt to get unanimous consent for their consideration was made by the chairman of the Judiciary, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] objected. The majority, in order to get consideration at all, were compelled to resort to a rule against the united opposition of the minority to force consideration at this time. Our Democratic friends have obstructed rather than facilitated consideration, and now complain because they were not forced to this point earlier. This is consistency. Besides, many important matters have occupied the attention of the House.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

I address myself, in the first instance, to the constitutional amendment. What are the objections of our friends on the other side to this constitutional amendment? By the way, before I reach those considerations, let me say one word in relation to my friend from Massachusetts, who, in my judgment, is unnecessarily disturbed in relation thereto. He seems to labor under the impression that this constitutional amendment has concealed within it such tremendous possibilities that it is liable to obliterate the liberties of mankind—that is, that portion of it included within the United States.

Let me suggest for his consideration that the construction of the word "combination" would be a trifle more apt and proper if he would construe it in the connection in which it is used, rather than divorce it from its connection and look to the dictionary for some other literal application and construction. Let me illustrate.

This amendment provides that Congress shall have power to dissolve "trusts, monopolies, or combinations." The gentleman from Massachusetts sees trouble in that word "combinations" for blacksmiths, carriage makers, etc. Now, let me ask him this question and let me suggest it to any other doubting friend; let me suggest it to my Democratic friends. What does the word "trust" mean in this constitutional amendment? Every man here knows what it means in its ordinary use. Has it any other meaning? Every man here knows that it has. Will the courts, however, hold under this constitutional amendment that the word "trusts," collocated as it is, is intended to apply to the relation existing between a trustee and his cestui que trust, which in legal parlance is a trust—that Congress would have power under this amendment to define or dissolve such a "trust?" That would be absurd. The court would construe that word "trust" in connection with the position which it occupies in the amendment and the purpose for which it is obviously used, and would construe the word "combinations" in exactly the same way. If Congress undertook to act capriciously in defining the court would unquestionably restrain such action.

Be not unduly disturbed; the country will still live and the liberties of the people be preserved. Have no apprehension about that. The obvious meaning of that language as used in that connection would be the rule of construction. No objection is made to this amendment by my friends on the other side on that ground. But their objections are what? And I address myself at the very outset to the objections. I may remark in passing that, in accordance with their universal history, as I will disclose before I am through, the Democracy are arrayed upon the floor of the House voting against a rule to even consider this constitutional amendment and this bill which is suggested as an amendment to the law. That is consistent with their legislative history in connection with trust legislation.

What are their objections? They are two: First, the constitutional amendment suggests indirectly that the Constitution does not control Congress in legislating outside the limits of the forty-five States, and therefore no loyal Democrat can vote for it; second, this constitutional amendment interferes with and infringes upon the sacred doctrine of States' rights. No one can blame our Democratic friends for their loyalty to and their adulation of the hoary-headed doctrine of States' rights. They were born and bred that way. Before I get through with this analysis I wish to demonstrate that the amendment which my friend suggests upon that point was wisely kept out by the rule adopted here, because otherwise, when it came to be analyzed, my friends would feel that they had allowed themselves to be "buncoed" by their own amendment.

FIRST DEMOCRATIC OBJECTION—IMPROPER INFERENCE FROM LANGUAGE USED.

The first proposition is that this constitutional amendment as it reads undertakes indirectly to construe the Constitution contrary to the views entertained by my friends and entertained by myself. I pause a moment to render my thanks to my distinguished friend from Missouri for the magnificent encomium that he pronounced upon my humble self. After hearing it I felt like saying, with the just and devout man of old, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace" [laughter], for I have great apprehension that as time goes on and unrolls its web it may be entirely possible that, while I have the greatest admiration for my distinguished friend (which I know he reciprocates), he may not be able, perhaps, to pronounce it again in so handsome and enthusiastic a manner.

His proposition is that the Constitution does extend to our new possessions, and he apprehended that I differed from the majority on that proposition. I say here and now that in that respect I adhere to my view of the Constitution. I believe it to be right; I believed it to be right when I announced it; but I do not think I am situated perhaps quite as the gentleman from Missouri and my other Democratic friends are. I apprehend that there is a possibility that I may be mistaken! It is entirely possible that the Supreme Court when they come to pass upon this great question may determine it otherwise than I think it should be determined.

I suggest that our friends on the other side are laboring under a temporary attack of intellectual biliousness on this subject—I will tell you why as I go along. If my view of the Constitution should prove to be correct, there was no occasion for inserting the language objected to in the amendment; but there are men, able men, good men, who take a contrary view, and if their view is correct, this ought to be inserted in the constitutional amendment.

The proposed amendment reads:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation.

Let me submit some suggestions for the consideration of my distinguished friend in analyzing the particular language of the amendment.

It is suggested that the fact that "all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States" is specifically mentioned gives rise to the sole and necessary inference that otherwise such territory would not be included in its operation, and that therefore we have territory which we could control without constitutional limitations. If the fact of being specifically mentioned necessarily raises this inference, then if other localities are also specified, the same inference, for the same reason, ought to arise in connection with them.

The "several States" are specified. It is quite clear that the Constitution now applies to the "several States," and therefore no legitimate inference arises from their mention that the amendment without this language would not apply to the States. Strictly speaking, it may be that their mention was unnecessary; but inasmuch as the effect of this amendment is to deprive the States of a portion of their power, by some it might be thought necessary to specifically refer to them in order to eliminate the possibility of any question as to the scope of the amendment. That the States are referred to demonstrates that the inference that the Constitution would not operate upon a locality unless specified is not the only one to be drawn from the fact of specification. I doubt very much if it was necessary to mention any place or places over which this amendment was to operate. If the language, however, does not add to, it certainly does not take from or narrow the scope of the amendment. If it does no good it can do no harm. It is idle to assert that language that some may think it necessary to use, in order to make this amendment universal in its operation, can have any legitimate interpretative force in determining the proper construction to be placed upon the language used in framing the Constitution and the original amendments.

When the great question as to how far Congress is controlled by constitutional limitations in dealing with our newly acquired possessions is determined, it will be determined upon the Constitution as it was written then, not as we may undertake to write an amendment now. It is what the fathers actually meant and said, not what their children's children declare that they meant and said, either directly or indirectly, that will determine the construction to be placed upon the Constitution.

If my view of the Constitution is correct, the use of this language may be unnecessary. If, upon the other hand, I am wrong, it might be essential. We must concede the possibility of a construction not in harmony with our views. While this great question of constitutional construction is in doubt ordinary prudence and the exercise of legislative common sense justifies and requires the use of such language in framing an amendment, which is designed to become a part of our fundamental law, as will cover all possible contingencies, and eliminate every element of doubt as to the universality of its operation. No man surrenders his opinion, much less stultifies his judgment, when he exercises such laudable and necessary precaution. This bugbear is not substantial enough to justify my friends who agree with me in my construction of the Constitution in voting against this constitutional amendment.

But I want to call attention for a moment to the precision and ability of my friends on the other side of the House in their use of language when they undertake to construct legislation. And this bears upon my suggestion that they are suffering from the difficulty that I mentioned a few moments ago. In section 9 of the amendments which they propose, in lieu of section 9 of the bill reported from the committee which they are complimentary enough to call the "Littlefield bill," the minority of this committee, seven great lawyers of this House, the leading lawyers upon the Democratic side, with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] upon it, undertake to provide for the care and control of a monopoly in the various jurisdictions. I read the whole amendment:

SEC. 9. That every corporation, association, joint stock company, or partnership formed or made, or managing or carrying on its business, in whole or in part, for the purpose of controlling or monopolizing, or in such manner as to control or monopolize, or tend to control or monopolize, the manufacture, production, or sale of any article of commerce or merchandise, intended for interstate commerce or commerce with foreign countries, or for the purpose of controlling or increasing or decreasing the cost or price of the same to the purchaser, user, or consumer thereof, for the purpose of preventing, or in such manner as to prevent, competition, or of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, or sale thereof, is, for the purposes of this act, hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly; and all such corporations, associations, joint stock companies, and partnerships, and their officers, agents, managers, and attorneys are hereby forbidden and prohibited from shipping or putting in transit any such article of commerce or merchandise to any State, Territory, foreign country OR PLACE, outside the State, Territory, OR PLACE in which it was manufactured or produced, and from selling or offering to sell any such article or merchandise to be so shipped or put into any such transit, unless for the private or personal use of the consignee; and for any violation of this provision shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and by imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

All such corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships as above declared illegal shall be, and hereby are, forbidden and prohibited the use of the United States mail in aid or furtherance of any such business or purposes, and all laws now in force for the prevention of the fraudulent use of the mails, so far as the same may be applicable, shall apply in the execution of such prohibition.

Any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership may be proceeded against at the suit of any person or persons, or corporation, or association, or by and in behalf of the United States, and perpetually enjoined and restrained from doing or carrying on any interstate or foreign commerce whatever, either with the States or the Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country; and no article of commerce produced, or manufactured, or owned and dealt in by any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership so organized, formed, managed, or carrying on business, shall be transported or carried without the State or Territory in which produced or manufactured, or in which same may be, or without the District of Columbia if produced, manufactured, or found therein, by any individual, corporation, or common carrier, in any manner whatever. All such articles of commerce, shipped in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by any person duly authorized by law to make such seizure, and when so seized shall be condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

Bear in mind that according to the theory of my friends upon the other side there are only three political jurisdictions, a State, a Territory, and foreign countries. When upon their theory you have said "State," when upon their construction you have said "Territory," that takes in organized and unorganized territory, Porto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago; and when you have said "foreign country," you then include everything in the line of political jurisdictions. That is, you would ordinarily think you did. Now, my friends, when they try to write an amendment, do not think that they do, and I want to show this House, inasmuch as they are so hypercritical and so hypersensitive as to the first section of this amendment, how they undertake to provide for a territory that they could not very well describe. Here is the way they do it. They prohibit "shipping or putting in transit any such article of commerce or merchandise to any State, Territory, foreign country"—

And having stated that, then what do they say? They have found that peculiar and nondescript thing, some geographical area on the face of the earth that our Democratic friends can not describe as a State, as a Territory, or as a foreign country, and how do they describe it? They say,

State, Territory, foreign country, "or place."

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

There is somewhere on the surface of the earth a political subdivision that is a "place." [Laughter.] They do not know where it is; they do not know how to describe it. It is not under any jurisdiction that they can define, but it is a "place," and they do not want any trust-made goods transported into a "place." And there is another provision in this bill in which they say it shall not be transported from a "place" to a "place," from the unknown to the unknown. And this peculiar and indefinite unknown and indescribable locality, it is to be noticed, is supposed to be "outside" of a State or Territory. And yet my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] stands up here, for about an hour and a quarter, and undertakes to convince himself and his loyal Democratic friends that we did not use exactly the kind of language that we ought to use when we drew this constitutional amendment.

Well, we did not say "place." I want to tell you that. We knew better than to do that. There is a sample copy of Democratic constructive legislation. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And every Democrat, if he has the courage, will have the chance a little later to vote or try to vote into the statute a declaration that there is somewhere in some locality a geographical area that can only be described as a "place." [Laughter on the Republican side.] This is straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel of unusual size.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will you permit the suggestion that as to the bill opportunity has been given under the rule to amend?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. And if there is one "place" too many we can get rid of it. But I should like to ask the gentleman what is meant by this language in section 1——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of the bill?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of the constitutional amendment? What is meant by this:

All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Does the gentleman hold that the States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia are not under the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the United States, or does he hold that this is a repetition? If you want to be so very precise——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; be entirely precise. Carve it out cameo-like.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Might it not be well to omit the words "and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States?"

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You want to know what the gentleman says about that. "The gentleman" has already stated his views upon it, but he will briefly restate them again. In the first place, I think that language would cover "place." And if there is anything anywhere that is only a "place," and the United States has any jurisdiction over it, you undertake by your amendment to assume to cover that. I say that I do not think it necessary to use the language, in my view of the Constitution. I repeat it again for the gentleman, but I do not undertake to stand here, and it ill becomes any man, Republican or Democrat, to stand here in view of the fact that in the history of the construction of the Constitution from the days of John Marshall down to Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, who now presides over the greatest court in the civilized world, many of the decisions of the Supreme Court upon constitutional questions have been rendered by a divided court, and many of them by a majority of one—I say it ill becomes any man, Republican or Democrat, to undertake to assert his individual opinion and say that it is not possible for the contrary to be held in the light of that history. So that it is legitimate and proper, as a matter of precaution, to insert this language.

Mr. TERRY rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman from Arkansas want to ask a question?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, if the gentleman consents.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. I am a good deal as he was with the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]; I like to see his smiling face.

Mr. TERRY. I would ask the gentleman, under his construction of the law and the Constitution and all those other things, whether the District of Columbia is a part of the United States?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In my opinion it is. I have just answered that same question, but I will answer it again. I wish to be accommodating. I think that territory is a part of the United States, and so I think is the Philippine Archipelago. I can reiterate these answers all day.

Mr. TERRY. Why, then, did you use the words "District of Columbia" after you had said "the United States?"

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. For the same reason I have already given you in relation to the Philippine Archipelago. Let me ask you, what did you mean by "place" when you put that in your amendment? By the way, what is a "place," anyhow? Tell us what it is.

Mr. TERRY. The place outside of which the article was manufactured; that is all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Haven't you already described that?

Mr. TERRY. It will not take a very great stretch of the intellect, if you take it in its proper connection, to see that it is a proper thing to say.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I read it in its connection, and I will pull it out of its connection. I will read it in and I will read it out, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. TERRY. It means the place outside of which the article was manufactured.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Outside of a State, outside of a Territory, outside of a foreign country, from place to place. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, I have a good many things to say——

Mr. TERRY. I will not take much of your time. Instead of using the words "District of Columbia" there, you might have simply said "place outside of which it is manufactured." The District of Columbia is neither a "State," nor a "Territory," nor a "foreign country."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, if we had been using language in that indeterminate, inconclusive, and, shall I say, unintelligent, way, it would have been just as well to have said "place;" but I do not like that kind of expression, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. NOONAN. Just a word.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do not bother me just now. I have many suggestions that I wish to make, and they will interest you a great deal more than those that I have made. You need not worry about that. When I get pretty well along——

Mr. NOONAN. I simply want to ask if the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution is Democratic construction or Republican construction?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not either construction, I will tell you that. Let me answer your question. Some law professors have used the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, adopted in 1868, for the purpose of undertaking to demonstrate what the fathers meant in 1787. They may succeed in imposing that upon people who are credulous and uninformed, but they can not impose it upon any intelligent man. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. NOONAN. But the word "place" is used there, and the expression "any place subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a proper use of language there. They have not said "territory" and all that.

Mr. FLEMING. The same use as we use.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very good. I am glad the gentleman has discovered the thirteenth amendment. "Place," as there used, it is claimed, relates to territory that otherwise would not be reached by the Constitution. If it is admitted that the minority used the word in that sense in their amendment their last state is worse than their first. Has the gentleman spoken to the gentleman from Arkansas? Has he told him that the committee in their report use the word "place" proposed as an amendment to the amendment as it is used in the thirteenth amendment?

Mr. NOONAN. Not at all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is "another place." [Laughter.] I hope if the brethren find anything that is entertaining to them at any time they will be kind enough to suggest it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That leads me to suggest a question. I understand the gentleman from Maine to say that the office of this section—that is, the first section—is mere transportation of these articles, provided his view of the Constitution is incorrect, and to be held that the old Constitution does not go out anywhere——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg your pardon.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I understood the gentleman to say that the office of this first section was to afford transportation facilities to this sixteenth article, provided that it be held that the Constitution of its own vigor does not go to the outlying possessions.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What you heard the gentleman from Maine say, if you listened, was that the office of this language was to provide against any possible contingency of an adverse constitutional construction.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman one or two questions, if not really one. The first question is why, if that construction be put upon the Constitution, it is necessary to have this provision in the Constitution? If that construction be put upon the Constitution, if Congress is all-powerful and everything, why is it necessary to take care of the protection of this sixteenth amendment against adverse construction, and why limit it; why may it not take care of the entire Constitution? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will tell you. I was expecting just such a conundrum.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not expect you to answer it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman knows that there are people who, upon their theory of the Constitution, claim that some of its provisions may apply now to all territory, and some may not. The gentleman very well knows that no man can, with positiveness, state what that construction in the end will be, and the gentleman very well knows that his last suggestion has been covered entirely by the answers that I have already made. It can not take care of the entire Constitution, as it does not purport to. I say it ill becomes the Democrats of this House to state that as one of the reasons why they do not vote for this constitutional amendment. Something has been said about a great deal of hypocrisy in connection with these measures. I will not get down to that subject. I am not going to take time to bandy words about hypocrisy in the matter, although there has been some provocation given, and the facts will justify the statement. I shall not say that there has been hypocrisy on the part of the Democracy, but I say here and now that I will demonstrate it in connection with trust legislation before I am through.

That is all that I care to say about that branch of the objection.

SECOND DEMOCRATIC OBJECTION—INFRINGES STATES' RIGHTS.

The other branch is this: The gentleman from Missouri says and the gentleman from Arkansas says they ought to have the privilege of amending this constitutional amendment, so that it would be concurrent. I ask the attention of the House to an analysis of that beautiful proposition. Its feasibility is argued by the gentleman from Arkansas, and he illustrates it by the fact that the United States Government now punishes for counterfeiting and the State governments also punish for counterfeiting. The power that exists to-day over this subject between Congress and the several States is divided. Between them they possess it all. Congress exercises its powers solely by virtue of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

When persons, corporations, trusts, or syndicates avail themselves of the facilities of interstate commerce, then they subject themselves to Congressional control. When any article becomes an item of interstate commerce, then the national power operates upon it. Until then Congress has no control, and its control ceases when the article ceases to be an item of interstate commerce. Upon the other hand, the State has the sole control until the line of interstate commerce is reached, when its power ceases. The State has no power to obstruct, interfere with, or control interstate commerce. The line which divides interstate and local commerce is the line of division between the two jurisdictions.

It is simply a legal impossibility to increase the power of Congress upon any practicable plan without decreasing the powers of the State, and this amendment does undertake to and will, if adopted, decrease to the extent of its terms the powers of the States; and hence the objection by men who believe in State rights, and hence the suggestion by my friends on the other side that concurrent power is what they want. They have stood here complaining and finding fault for not having been allowed to offer an amendment for consideration. Why? Because they have not been allowed to modify the amendment—this amendment to the Constitution—by introducing this provision providing for concurrent power.

You may look over the report of the minority, and you will not find any suggestion of any such amendment in terms. You will not find any suggestion offered to the Judiciary Committee, where they had the privilege of discussing it and whose deliberations they participated in and have commented upon in the course of this debate. Concurrent legislative power in this particular is simply a legal absurdity. That means equal power, power in the same degree, to the same extent. What would it mean when applied to these different things we are undertaking to remedy? It means the State could exercise the power, and the United States could exercise the same power to the same extent and to the same degree. Both have equal power. Now, if they happened to be inconsistent, one was in conflict with the other, which under that proposition would prevail?

If New Jersey saw fit to declare that a certain corporation was legitimate, innocuous, and wise, and the United States Government should undertake to say that they would dissolve that corporation, which one of these concurrent and equal powers would prevail? Neither; and you would have paralysis of legislative action. That is the Democratic theory of amending the Constitution; putting in a power that could not be effectively exercised by either, unless it was exercised on exactly parallel lines. If conditions that now prevail continue to prevail, and there is no reason to expect otherwise, there would be inconsistent legislation throughout the length and breadth of the land, and you would have a worse condition than exists to-day. And now they rail because they haven't been allowed to vote for that proposition. These are the only objections that our Democratic friends have to the constitutional amendment.

BRYAN'S PLAN.

I want to call your attention now to a suggestion made by a gentleman for whom I suppose my Democratic friends have the greatest respect. I refer to our distinguished fellow-citizen who, during the last four years, has apparently been standing upon a mental eminence looking out over the country and crying out: Oh, America, America, how often would I have gathered thee "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, and ye would not!" And she will not. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have great admiration for Mr. Bryan. He is an orator of great ability and a distinguished public character; a man upright in his private character. I have no doubt upon his lines he may be sincere, but I can not say that I think my friend Bryan is really a great lawyer. I am going to read what he suggested as a remedy for the great trust problem. This is from a speech he delivered in Chicago:

One method has occurred to me, and to me it seems a complete method. It may not commend itself to you. If you have something better, I shall accept it in the place of this which I am about to suggest. But the method that occurs to me is this: That Congress should pass a law providing that no corporation organized in any State should do business outside of the State in which it is organized until it receives from some power created by Congress a license authorizing it to do business outside of its own State. Now, if the corporation must come to this body created by Congress to secure permission to do business outside of the State, then the license can be granted upon conditions which will, in the first place, prevent the watering of stock; in the second place, prevent monopoly in any branch of business, and, third, provide for publicity as to all of the transactions and business of the corporation.

Now, the joke about that is that it does not relate to interstate commerce at all; it simply suggests, upon Mr. Bryan's comprehension of the legal proposition, that Congress can control a local corporation in a State by reason of the mere fact that it happened to be organized in another State. Every lawyer knows that the Congress of the United States has no more control over such a corporation, under such circumstances, than it has over the precession of the equinoxes. There happened to be a man in the audience who knew that, and this followed:

"A VOICE"—

I suppose it was the "voice of one crying in the wilderness." [Laughter.]

"A VOICE. Colonel"—

That brought him up. Perhaps I should state here, in order that the facts may be fresh in our minds, that the "Colonel" had recently returned from the ensanguined camping ground of the serried ranks of the armies of the United States, where he had courageously braved the dangers inherent in unripe fruit, impure water, and unsanitary conditions [laughter on the Republican side], and he was still "Colonel."

A VOICE. Colonel, would such a law be constitutional?

Mr. BRYAN. I was coming to that. I am glad you mentioned it. What I mean to say is that Congress ought to pass such a law. If it is unconstitutional, and so declared by the Supreme Court, I am in favor of an amendment to the Constitution that will give to Congress—

I want to commend this to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who is ready to adopt a constitutional amendment provided he can have it in the homeopathic form. He does not want it in the allopathic, to apply to every trust, but he wants it in the homeopathic, to apply to only those engaged in interstate commerce. What is there about trusts that will drift around in States and not engage in interstate commerce, that they should be protected by the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas? I submit this to the consideration of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Bryan says:

I am in favor of an amendment to the Constitution that will give to Congress the power to destroy every trust in the country.

This amendment will do it. Under the Constitution as it is Congress can not do it. Now, our Democratic friends have this proposition: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve." At 5 o'clock you will have an opportunity to register your votes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] contends that this is not Mr. Bryan's amendment. Bryan has never suggested any form of amendment. It is Mr. Bryan's amendment because he wants one that will go to the root of the matter and tear out every trust, and this amendment will accomplish that purpose by conferring the power upon Congress. Choose you whom ye will serve—Col. Bryan, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], or the gentleman who heads the minority on the Judiciary Committee—when you come to vote upon this constitutional amendment. These quotations from the opinion of the court in the Knight case will illustrate the futility of the suggestion of Mr. Bryan:

It can not be denied that the power of a State to protect the lives, health, and property of its citizens, and to preserve good order and public morals, "the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion," is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

* * * * * * *

That which belongs to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States, but that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State.

* * * * * * *

It was in the light of well-settled principles that the act of July 2, 1890, was framed. Congress did not attempt thereby to assert the power to deal with monopoly directly as such; or to limit and restrict the rights of corporations created by the States or citizens of the States in the acquisition, control, or disposition of property. (United States vs. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S., 16.)

Instead of hiring a hall, my friend Colonel Bryan ought to hire a lawyer, and then he might come somewhere near making a valuable suggestion. [Laughter.]

BILL AMENDING SHERMAN ANTI-TRUST ACT.

Inasmuch as the minority have in caucus expressed an intention of supporting the committee bill, it is not necessary to now refer to its provision except to say that in the opinion of the committee it goes to the verge of Constitutional power.

I come now to the minority report on the bill. I can not spend much time upon it. I am going to pick out a few sample bricks to illustrate the capacity manifested by my distinguished friends on the other side whenever they undertake to make a law.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF LACK OF CAPACITY OF DEMOCRACY TO CONSTRUCT LEGISLATION.

Their proposed section 11, reads:

SEC. 11. That every contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, tending to create a monopoly in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in any article of commerce or merchandise, entering into trade or commerce among the States or with foreign countries, or designed to create impediments to, or resulting in restrictions to such trade or commerce or aids to commerce, or to limit or control the manufacture or production of such articles or merchandise, for the purpose of increasing or decreasing, or operating in such manner, or with such result, as to increase or decrease the price of such article or merchandise to the user or consumer, for the purpose of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in such articles or merchandise, or to give power to charge unreasonable prices for merchandise or articles produced or manufactured to be bought, sold, exchanged, dealt in, or transported in such trade or commerce, or for the purpose of imposing, or in such manner as to impose, unjust or onerous restrictions upon, or impediments to, the lawful business of any person, company, or corporation engaged in the production or manufacture of such merchandise or articles, is hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly within the meaning of this act, and every person who shall make, or enter into, or engage in, any such contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, or shall be a promoter thereof or officer or agent therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars and not exceeding five thousand dollars and by imprisonment not less than six months and not exceeding one year.

It will be seen that it attempts to control the "manufacture, production, and sale" of articles that enter "into trade or commerce" without reference to the fact as to whether it actually becomes a part of interstate commerce or whether the acts prohibited interfere in any way with interstate commerce, and in this respect it is clearly unconstitutional.

It is difficult to specify an article that does not sooner or later enter into interstate commerce, and it is only when it does so enter that it can be controlled. This section attempts to control it before that time.

Their section 13 reads:

SEC. 13. That wherever any State or Territory shall, in any law against trusts, combines, combinations, or monopolies, provide that no foreign corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership, or stockholder member, or officer belonging to or interested in any such trust, combine, monopoly, or combination of any kind, shall be permitted to carry on or do any business, or have any office or place of business, in such State, or shall make provision to regulate or suppress the business of any such corporation, association, or partnership, or prohibit the sale or offering for sale in such State of any article or merchandise produced by it, every such corporation, association, or partnership carrying on, or attempting to carry on, or do any business or have any office or place of business therein, and all its articles or merchandise carried thereto, shall be subject to the operation and effect of such law, to the same extent and in the same manner as though it had been incorporated, organized, or formed in such State and such articles or merchandise had been made and not brought therein; and no such law shall be regarded as 'in any way trenching upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States or with foreign nations: Provided, however, That such articles or merchandise may be shipped and transported into any such State or Territory for the personal and private use of the consignee.

This is an attempt to suspend the operation of the interstate-commerce power, or to waive it, under the principle of the Wilson bill, relative to the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor, so as to allow a State to legislate at will, even if the legislation interferes with interstate commerce. One of the interesting things which they propose to authorize a State to do is to provide that no "stockholder" of a foreign corporation interested in a trust "shall be permitted to carry on or do any business, or have any office or place of business in such State." Under this, an owner of a single share of stock in such a foreign corporation could not do any business of any kind in such State, and as he could not have any office or place of business, an owner of a single share could not practice any profession which required the use of an office. This is certainly drastic enough.

The American Sugar Refining Company, for instance, has 11,000 stockholders, and it is probable that a very large proportion of them reside in States other than that in which the company was organized. Say 6,000, for the purposes of illustration, are or would be engaged in business. Then, under this bill, there would be 6,000 people whom it would be possible to wholly deprive of the power or right to do business of any kind merely because they held the stock as investment. They should include bondholders. It may be that a more preposterous proposition has been presented before; if so, I have never heard of it.

Their proposed section 14 provides:

SEC. 14. That every corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership in the United States, or any Territory thereof, or in the District of Columbia, whether organized or formed under and pursuant to the laws of the United States or of a State or of a Territory, owning or controlling any plant or business, or a majority of the stock in any plant or business, similar to its own, in any other State, Territory, or place outside of the one in which it was first chartered, organized, or formed, shall, before being permitted to ship, consign, take, carry, or transport, or sell or deliver for shipment to any State or Territory, or into or from the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise of its own production or manufacture, or receive consignments or shipments of articles of commerce or merchandise, manufactured or produced in any other State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, file in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, association, or partnership, together with a duly verified statement showing the article or articles or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it or intended to be manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it, a copy of its by-laws, rules, and regulations; the names and places of residence of its officers and stockholders; the amount of its capital stock and the amount thereof actually issued; the amount thereof actually paid in in cash; the nature and value of the property owned by it, and also a full statement of all its debts and liabilities; the number of its employees and wages paid; the dividends paid, if any; the amount of its surplus, if any; the character of additions and improvements made each year and the cost thereof, and a statement of its operating and other expenses, together with a balance sheet showing its profits and losses; and shall annually thereafter file in said office a report verified by a majority of the directors of a corporation, or by a majority of the members of an association, joint stock company, or partnership, showing the same facts as then existing, and shall, before shipping, or offering or attempting to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way for transit, to any other State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it, plainly and conspicuously stamp thereon, when susceptible of being so stamped, and also on the outside of packages, boxes, or tanks containing the same, the name of the article or merchandise, and the name of the corporation, association, joint stock company, or partnership manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the same, and the place from and to which it is to be shipped or transported.

Every such corporation, association, or partnership as referred to in this section, and every officer, agent, or attorney thereof, that shall ship, or offer or attempt to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way of transit, to any other State or Territory, or to the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or merchandise dealt in, manufactured, or produced by it, or shall violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment of not less than six months and not more than one year.

Here we have the word "place" again.

The fact which determines what corporations, firms, etc., are subject to the provisions of this section is simply whether it owns or controls any plant or business or a majority of the stock in any plant or business similar to its own in any "other State, Territory, or place outside of the one in which it was first chartered, organized, or formed," etc.

Observe that they do not provide that the corporations or institutions in regard to which they legislate shall be engaged in interstate commerce or shall be engaged in crushing out competition or that they shall be monopolies. They do not undertake in this section to deal with this juggernaut, this "hydra-headed monster." They submit this bald, naked proposition. A firm organized and doing business, for instance, in the city of Washington can not have a place of business of similar character in Baltimore unless it first files a long rigmarole of details specified in regard to publicity.

Next, what? That it shall before shipping or attempting to ship any of its goods brand them with the name of the article, the name of the firm selling same, and the place to which it is to be shipped.

Next, what? Having provided that a firm which has a place of business in two States, though not in any way connected with a trust—there is no suggestion of a trust made in this section—after having complied with these provisions with reference to publicity and the requirement that they shall brand their goods before undertaking to ship them, they go further, and say that they shall not be shipped at all. That is the proposition; that is the proposed Democratic legislation. Here is the language:

Every such corporation, association, or partnership as referred to in this section, and every officer, agent, or attorney thereof, that shall ship, or offer

or attempt to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way of transit, to any other State or Territory, or to the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or merchandise dealt in, manufactured, or produced by it, or shall violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars and not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment of not less than six months and not more than one year.

A couple of barbers, composing a firm having a shop in Washington and another in Baltimore and selling ordinary articles of toilet use, or cigars, which are often sold in such places, would, under this proposed legislation, be required to file this list giving publicity to all their affairs; if they undertake to ship a razor or a cake of soap from Washington to Baltimore they must brand it, and after having branded it, they can not take it from one city to the other, even though one of them carries it in his pocket, and thus "puts it in the way of transit" without being subject to a fine of $500 and imprisonment for six months.

It may be that the crushing out of the "hydra-headed monster" involves necessarily a monumental absurdity of this character, but I respectfully request to be allowed to dissent.

That is the practical operation of this legislation proposed by my friends of the Democracy. I understand our Democratic friends are to be invited to vote for this amendment. It is very fortunate for us that they thus illustrate before the country their capacity to construct legislation—that they have had the high privilege of putting into their report some things that they would like to offer as amendments to this bill.

PROPOSITION TO SUSPEND TARIFF ON TRUST-MADE ARTICLES.

I now come to the favorite panacea of our friends, the Democracy, for this gigantic disease, the trust. Section 12 provides:

That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the price of any commodity or article of merchandise has been enhanced in consequence of any monopoly as defined in this act, he shall issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on like articles of merchandise or commodities brought from foreign countries. Such suspensions shall continue as long as such enhancement in price of such commodity or article of merchandise exists, and until revoked by the proclamation of the President.

My first objection—it may be a Democratic objection—is this: There never was attempted to be written into the statute books of any State or of the United States a provision so violently imperial and czar-like as this proposition. It gives to the President of the United States the power to enforce upon an organization which is assumed to be criminal, for the express purpose of punishment, and that punishment is expected to be business ruin, the penalty of the law without even giving the offending party the right to be heard. The President brings the charge; he tries the cause; he renders judgment, and he executes the sentence. If that is not Cæsarism, if that is not imperialism, if that is not centralization run mad, I ask you to distinguish it. Search the records of this country or any other and see if you can find anything that will equal it. No court within the borders of Christendom ought to countenance for one moment a statute which, under any circumstances, so flagrantly violates the fundamental law as to authorize any man to pass upon the guilt or innocence of any other man or set of men without allowing them an opportunity to be heard. It is only in the infernal regions that they determine a cause without hearing. Yet that is the proposition of our friends on the other side.

This arbitrary power is in no sense parallel with the power vested in the President under a reciprocal clause in a treaty, where he only has to perform an act dependent upon the existence of a fact over which he has no control, as its existence is determined by the action of an independent power. Under this section he has the power to determine ex parte whether a crime had been committed, and then proceed to punish on the Democratic theory by ruining the criminal. As the tariff must be suspended upon all such articles, innocent parties who were dependent upon the tariff for success would have to meet the fate of the guilty. Again, it is only to be suspended when the "price is enhanced," but the great weapon of the trust is to crush competition by lowering prices, and while this interesting process was going on under this section they would have the benefit of the tariff, as it can only be suspended while the "price is enhanced." I deny wholly the efficacy of this legal nostrum.

SUGAR AND OIL CONTRASTED.

Let me call attention to two of the great trusts that are supposed to exist within the borders of the United States—the sugar trust and the Standard Oil trust. In order to be able to understand which of these great aggregations of capital bears most oppressively upon the general public, upon the ordinary citizen, upon the laboring man, I have made a calculation to ascertain how much the average American citizen in the course of a year pays per capita for oil, for sugar, and for wheat. I took the aggregate amount of consumption or sale of oil at the wholesale price; I took the aggregate amount of consumption of sugar, with the wholesale price; I took the same facts in relation to wheat. I found that according to this computation the seventy-six millions of people in the United States paid per capita for oil during a single year 36 cents; that they paid per capita for sugar $2.99, and for wheat $4.74.

The inference from this is that if these trusts are equally oppressive, then when the Standard Oil Company oppresses the public once the sugar trust oppresses it eight times. Its clutch is eight times as villainous upon "the throat of American energy."

HAVEMEYER ON TRUSTS.

Now, I want to call your attention to the author of the sugar trust, an eminent Democrat, Mr. Havemeyer, who, in his testimony before the Industrial Commission, states this proposition:

The mother of all trusts is the customs tariff bill.

And then he has the monumental assurance in that same statement to say that the tariff upon sugar should be doubled.

In order that this illustration may be intelligently apprehended, and the real animus of an ideal trust disclosed, I will allow Mr. Havemeyer to speak for himself.

Senator MALLORY. Now, I also understand you to imply at least that it is the policy of the American Sugar Refining Company to crush out all competition, if possible.

Mr. HAVEMEYER. But that is not so; there is no such testimony. I understand it has been put in that form by one of the gentlemen here, but it is not the fact. What I said was that it was the policy of the American Company to maintain and protect its trade, and if it resulted in crushing a competitor it is no concern of the American Company; if he gets in the press that is his affair, not ours.

Senator MALLORY. And if anyone interferes with the business, profits, or competition of the American Sugar Refining Company it is its policy to prevent it if possible?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. By lowering the profits to defy it.

Senator MALLORY. And if it results in crushing him out——

Mr. HAVEMEYER (interrupting). That is his affair.

Senator MALLORY. Not the affair of the American Sugar Refining Company?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. No.

Senator MALLORY. Now, suppose in the natural course of events the American Sugar Refining Company should suppress—we will not use the word crush out—all opposition, all opposition. I understand from your theory—business principles—that you would then seek to get out of the public and consumer the largest amount of profit consistent with your idea of business principles?

Mr. HAVEMEYER. Precisely.

I make no attack upon this particular trust. "Thine own mouth condemneth thee and not I, yea, thine own lips testify against thee."

This is a favorite proposition of our friends upon the other side, that the mother of trusts is the tariff. Well, I submit, with great confidence, that if the trust is the creature, the tariff is the creator; if the trust is the effect and the tariff the cause, wherever you have the effect you would expect to find the cause—wherever you have the creature you would expect to find the creator.

How will that logic apply to existing facts? The Standard Oil Company—and the Democracy know all about the Standard Oil Company, as I shall show you a little later—existed in 1888. The Standard Oil Company never had the protection of a cent upon petroleum or oil. The sugar trust, to be sure, had protection, to which I shall call your attention in a few moments. But go into England, free-trade England, and the trusts and aggregations of capital in England exceed the aggregations of capital and the formation of trusts in the United States under the protective tariff. It is literally covered with them. They create no surprise.

To illustrate this I read a clipping from the Washington Times, an able Democratic paper:

GREAT BRITAIN'S TRUSTS—LITTLE ATTENTION PAID TO THEM BY ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS—THE FORMATION OF A GIGANTIC COMBINE NOT TREATED AS A MATTER OF GREAT IMPORTANCE IN THE DAILY JOURNAL—ILLUSTRATIONS AS TO STYLE IN WHICH THE NEWS IS CHRONICLED.

Consul Halstead writes the State Department, from Birmingham, March 1, 1900, in regard to the apathy with which the people of Great Britain regard the formation of trusts:

"The news editor of the London Mail (circulation, 1,200,000) gives only some thirty-two lines to an item of the kind, and the editor in chief is not disturbed to the extent of a single editorial paragraph. Except an approving paragraph or two in the financial columns when the flotation is advertised, one can look in vain in other papers for either news or editorial notice referring to English trusts." Mr. Halstead continues:

"I have a clipping from the February 1 issue of the London Daily Mail. It is an announcement of a proposed formation of a worsted spinners' trust. This trust is to have a capital of $37,597,000, and 106 firms are concerned; yet the news editor of the Mail judges this item to be worth only a two-line head, twenty-eight lines of small type, set solid. The item is as follows:

"'A meeting of spinners engaged in the worsted trade was held yesterday in Bradford to consider the question of forming a combination of firms in that branch of business. One hundred and six firms were represented.

"'Mr. Scott Ling, of Manchester, who presided, explained that it was proposed to buy out firms on the basis of allowing nothing for good will of concerns which show only 5 per cent profit. All profit beyond 5 per cent would be multiplied seven and one-half times, and that amount allowed for good will. On such a basis he calculated they could show 7½ to 8 per cent for ordinary shareholders.

"'Opinion is divided as to the possibility of a successful combination. Some put the probable total capital at £18,000,000.'

"I take from the same issue of the Daily Mail the following extract in regard to the amalgamation as a 'trust' of two great South African steamship companies:

"'Details are now fully arranged of the recently announced amalgamation of the two well-known Cape mail companies.

"'The object of the amalgamation is to provide for the more efficient working of the South African trade and for the carrying out of the joint mail contract which the companies have made with the Cape government for ten years from October next.

There they exist on every hand. But where is the creator of trusts in England? Have we creatures without creators? Can it be possible that they are like Topsy, they simply grow, or are they like the original protoplasm in the theory of evolution, they come and nobody knows how they come? I take the report drawn by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], in his magnificent English, and I find that he states that the tariff is the mother of trusts. This is his language:

Consider for a moment how the tariff operates to make and perpetuate the shameful monopoly known as the paper trust.

I went on and read his report to see how it operated. Did he tell how? Did he tell why? No. Did he show how it was brought about? No; and no other man who has made that assertion has ever told. They simply assert that the tariff is the mother of trusts. That is equal to the argument, "That it is so if it ain't so, if I say it's so." It reminds me of the lawyer in the West who was arguing a case before a justice on the frontier, and was pictured by Bill Nye as standing up before the justice, with his clenched fist uplifted in the air, his mouth wide open, saying: "When I holler, it's law." [Laughter.] So it is with my friends upon this proposition, when they say it is so, it is so; but the man does not live who has yet given a reason why it is so.

WILSON-GORMAN TARIFF.

Assuming for the moment that it is so. The Democratic proposition to-day, when they are out of power, when they have no power to enact legislation or to control the trusts, is to do what? To suspend the tariff on trust-made articles. Now let me call your attention to a little recent history. In 1894 we had what was known as the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill, well described as a measure of perfidy and dishonor, so disreputable that Cleveland would not even sign it. What did the Wilson-Gorman tariff do? I have the figures here, given me by an expert. Upon raw sugar it imposed a tariff of 40 per cent ad valorem. These figures are made upon actual importations, actual results, in 1895, nothing theoretical. Upon refined sugar the tariff was 44.42 per cent, or a preferential in favor of the sugar trust of 4.42, or 10 per cent in favor of the sugar trust. And I may say here in order to make this schedule a little more authentic, that it is well understood that the original schedule in this Wilson bill was in the handwriting of Hon. John G. Carlisle, then Democratic Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] says that a "simple little bill would accomplish this reform." He makes that statement in his report. The gentleman from Missouri was a member of the Fifty-second Congress, he was a member of the Fifty-third Congress, he was a member of Congress when the Wilson bill was passed. I ask the gentleman from Missouri, I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], where they were when this tariff was being framed with a preferential duty in favor of the sugar trust, framed to perpetuate rather than destroy a trust that is eight times as oppressive upon the laboring men throughout the United States as the Standard Oil Company? Where was the gentleman from Missouri with his "simple little bill?" [Applause on the Republican side.]

Where were they? There was a tariff bill that instead of destroying the sugar trust encouraged it. And where was William J. Bryan—Colonel Bryan the Great? He was a member of the Ways and Means Committee that reported the Wilson bill that had a preferential tariff perpetuating the sugar trust under these circumstances. Now our Democratic friends say, "Oh, let us suspend the tariff on trusts." But where was William J. Bryan with his "simple little bill" in 1894? Let William J. Bryan take that and explain it in some of these speeches that he is about to make throughout the country. Let him answer that when he discusses the question of trusts. William J. Bryan introduced in the Fifty-second Congress a bill, H. R. 8977, and another bill, H. R. 9004, providing for placing trust-made articles upon the free list. It was the session when the Wilson bill was passed.

What did William Jennings Bryan do with those bills? He had them very promptly referred to the Ways and Means Committee, of which he was a member, and of which our Democratic friends had the control. Where are those bills? They never were resurrected until I dug them up two or three days ago, encumbered by the dust by which they were intended to be smothered when they were referred to this Democratic committee. [Applause on the Republican side.] But now they stand here and say that a "simple little bill" would do this whole business. Where was your "simple little bill" then? It will not do to say that you did not have this trust in mind, because in 1888, as I shall show you in a few moments, the Democracy spent a good deal of time investigating the sugar trust, and the tail end of this Wilson bill had a provision in relation to trusts. So the Democracy was thinking about it; but the more they thought about it the more they thought they would not bother the sugar trust, Mr. Havemeyer being the head of it. I do not suppose he contributes anything to the campaign fund of the Democracy. It would be very unkind to suggest that. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

They made provision in that Wilson bill for what? Against combinations that interfered with foreign commerce, but did not make any against combinations that interfered with local production or manufacture, while one is precisely as injurious as the other (sections 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, and 77).

DINGLEY BILL.

Let me compare this Wilson bill, which our friends did not make in accordance with their pretended theories, with the Dingley bill, drawn by the distinguished gentleman whose place I am undertaking to fill upon the floor of the House. A similar comparison for 1898 shows that in the Dingley bill the tariff upon raw sugar was 84.62, and upon refined sugar it is only 77.74 per cent, a difference against the trusts of 6.88, figured upon an actual importation, taking sugar of 96 polariscope test, the largest amount imported being of that saccharine strength.

Here is the Dingley bill, framed with a duty which in practice operates against this trust. Here is the Wilson bill framed with a preferential duty in favor of the trust. Because the tariff on raw sugar is the tariff that injures the trust and the preferential tariff upon refined sugar is the tariff that benefits the trusts. The trust buys the raw and manufactures and sells the refined. Let me go a little further on this proposition and call your attention to the fact that in the thirty-six months when the Wilson bill was in operation, with this preferential tariff sustaining and encouraging the sugar trust, the total receipts from revenue were only about $87,000,000. During the last three or four months prior to the going into effect of the Dingley bill large increases in importations were made in order to avoid the effect of the Dingley tariff, more than nine hundred millions of pounds, so that upon the first of July, 1897, when the Dingley bill became a law there was a surplus of sugar in this country by reason of the extra tariff imposed by the Dingley bill, with its preferential against the interests of the trusts, of about 800,000,000 pounds. What under those circumstances was the effect of these two measures upon the prosperity and welfare of the country in which we live?

The Democratic tariff for revenue is supposed to exceed the protective tariff in its revenue-producing power.

The Dingley bill produced in thirty-four months about $145,000,000 of revenue; or about $2,000,000 a month by the Wilson bill as compared with more than $4,000,000 a month by the Dingley bill, against the interests of the trusts. (Loud applause on the Republican side.)

BRYAN SHOWS TARIFF IS NOT THE CAUSE OF TRUSTS.

Now, I want to quote to my friends what Colonel Bryan the Great, said upon this proposition that our Democratic friends say that they believe in. Here it is:

Now, some one has suggested that to put everything on the free list that trusts make would destroy trusts. I do not agree with this statement, as it is made so broadly. I believe that the high tariff has been the means of extortion and that it has aided trusts to collect more than they otherwise could collect. But I do not believe you can destroy all trusts by putting all trust-made articles on the free list. Why? Because—

And he gives a reason, which is something that no Democrat has ever yet done, who says that the tariff is the "mother of the trusts." He gives the reason why it is not.

Because if an article can be produced in this country as cheaply as it can be produced abroad the trust could exist without the aid of any tariff, although it could not extort so much as it could with the tariff. While some relief may come from modifications of the tariff, we can not destroy monopoly until we lay the ax at the root of the tree and make monopoly impossible by law.

Now, in view of his last suggestion, when we have the adoption of a constitutional amendment pending here, the question is whether our friends will follow the lead of the Colonel or will they follow the suggestion of my friend from Missouri, who says that it has been so long since the Constitution has been amended that it can not be amended, or my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who objects to the amendment because it would take away all the powers of the State, or my friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who says the Constitution can not be amended except by bayonet and saber stroke, and shot and shell, and the spilling of blood. I had hoped it was not as bad as that. We have not reached the period of blood, except the blood that my friends on the other side are sweating in connection with the vote that they expect to have to cast here in a few minutes. [Loud laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

DEMOCRATIC INCAPACITY TO DEAL WITH TRUSTS DEMONSTRATED.

I want to call the attention of the House now for a few moments to the record of our friends upon the other side upon this question. There is not a syllable of legislation except that provision upon the tail of the Wilson bill that has not been put upon the statute books by the constructive action of the Republican party. But our Democratic friends here stand and say that they are to be relied upon by the American people as a party to construct legislation that will control this evil. That statement, in the light of their record, is simply grotesque. In 1888

the Democracy had charge of Congress. They introduced a resolution on January 25 authorizing the Committee on Manufactures to investigate and report recommendations in relation to trusts. That committee went on investigating from January 25, 1888, up to July 22, 1888, and then they made a partial report, which read, in part, as follows:

Your committee further report that the names of various combinations and trusts have been from time to time furnished to your committee; that the number of such combinations is very large; and that your committee, in calling witnesses and taking testimony, proceeded upon the following plan of investigation, i. e., to inquire— * * *

Your committee has particularly directed its inquiry into the methods of and the extent of the business done or controlled by the sugar trust and the Standard Oil trust, and respectfully submit herewith the testimony taken before it in relation to these two trusts.

Clifton R. Breckinridge, William L. Wilson, and William D. Bynum were members of this committee.

This committee proceeded to investigate after July 22, 1888, and while it was investigating a modest, mild, unassuming, but able and courageous gentleman from the State of Ohio came out here and procured a copy of the agreement under which the Standard Oil Company was doing business. While the Democrats continued to investigate, this unobtrusive gentleman, a lawyer of great ability, incorruptible and fearless, went to his home in Ohio and proceeded to litigate. Mark you, the Democracy investigated, and the attorney-general of the State of Ohio—for this man was the attorney-general—litigated. I wish to show the distinction between this attorney-general, the Hon. D. K. Watson, and Attorney-General Monnett, over whom my friend from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] seems to be so hysterical and in such great trouble. Mr. D. K. Watson produced results, which Mr. Monnett never yet has. In the suit which he brought this judgment was rendered:

"Judgment ousting the defendant from the right to make agreements set forth in the petition and of the power to perform the same." The case is State ex rel. D. K. Watson vs. Standard Oil Company (49 Ohio State, 189).

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] thinks Attorney-General Monnett was not appreciated, as he was not elected governor; as if a man must necessarily have a reward for simply doing his duty. Perhaps results may have had something to do with it. Mr. Watson was elected to Congress from the district now represented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ], which had a normal Democratic majority of 2,500, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] only defeated him in 1896 by 49 votes. This tends to show that the people of Ohio know whom to honor.

But the Democrats continued investigating. Perhaps I should call your attention right here to the fact that while the committee was investigating, two national conventions were held, one Democratic and the other Republican. The Democratic convention introduced into its platform this plank:

Judged by Democratic principles, the interests of the people are betrayed when, by unnecessary taxation, trusts and combinations are permitted to exist, which, while unduly enriching the few that combine, rob the body of our citizens by depriving them of the benefits of natural competition.

Not a word as to the remedy; not a promise that they would correct it; not a hint that they would correct it. It was a generality that did not even glitter. Let me read the plank in the platform adopted by the Republican convention in 1888 while our friends the Democracy were investigating here in the city of Washington.

We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital, organized in trusts or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens; and we recommend to Congress and the State legislatures, in their respective jurisdictions, such legislation as will prevent the execution of all schemes to oppress the people by undue charges on their supplies, or by unjust rates for the transportation of their products to market. We approve the legislation by Congress to prevent alike unjust burdens and unfair discriminations between the States.

The man that drew that resolution was a lawyer. He was a member of the House of Representatives, and he well knew that the jurisdiction of Congress was confined to the enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution known as the interstate-commerce clause, and that other legislation as to trusts would have to be enacted by the States. That resolution therefore recommended Congress to act, and it also recommended the various States to act.

I said he was a lawyer. He was a Republican, a statesman and a patriot, and was then a member of the House of Representatives. He came from the State of Ohio, and his name was William McKinley, jr. [Applause on the Republican side.] He was chairman of that Committee on Resolutions.

STATE LEGISLATION SINCE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM IN 1888.

I want to stop right here to call your attention to the fact that thirty-one States and Territories have since that resolution enacted anti-trust legislation. These are the States and the Territory:

1. Alabama, approved February 18, 1897. Applies simply to insurance companies.
2. Arkansas, approved March 16, 1897. Quite general in its extent and application.
3. California, approved February 27, 1893. Relates to live stock only.
4. Delaware, passed February 15, 1891. Relates exclusively to insurance companies.
5. Florida, approved June 11, 1897. Applies to beef cattle and meats solely.
6. Georgia, approved December 23, 1896. Quite general in its application.
7. Illinois, approved June 10, 1897. Quite general in application.
8. Indiana, approved March 5, 1897. Quite general.
9. Iowa, approved May 6, 1890. Quite general.
10. Kansas, approved March 8, 1897. Very broad and sweeping.
11. Kentucky, approved May 20, 1890. Quite general in application.
12. Louisiana, in effect July 7, 1892. Quite broad and general.
13. Maine, approved March 7, 1889. Quite broad and general.
14. Michigan, in effect July 1, 1889. Broad and general.
15. Minnesota, approved April 20, 1891. Quite general.
16. Mississippi, approved March 11, 1896. Quite broad. First in effect in 1892.
17. Missouri, approved April 2, 1891. Since amended and broadened. Quite general and efficient.
18. Montana, enacted in 1895. Quite general.
19. Nebraska, enacted April 8, 1897, but there was an act in 1895. Quite broad and general.
20. New Mexico, approved February 4, 1891. Quite general.
21. New York, in effect May 7, 1897. Quite broad and general.
22. North Carolina, ratified March 11, 1889. Quite general.
23. North Dakota, approved March 9, 1897. Quite general.
24. Oklahoma, in effect December 25, 1890. Quite general.
25. South Carolina, approved February 25, 1897. Quite general.
26. South Dakota, approved March 1, 1897. Quite general.
27. Tennessee, approved April 6, 1889. Quite broad and general.
28. Texas, approved March 30, 1889. Broad and general.
29. Utah, approved March 9, 1896. Quite broad and general.
30. Washington, in constitution and law approved March 21, 1895.
31. Wisconsin, approved April 27, 1897. Broad and general.

With the exception of three, which had some legislation indirectly applying to the subject, no such legislation existed in any of them before that time. I do not go so far as to claim that this plank in our platform compelled the adoption by the legislatures of this anti-trust legislation, but I do say that the Democracy of 1888 did not have the courage to even suggest a remedy or give any advice, but simply set up a wail in their platform about the evils without even intimating how they could be controlled, and that the suggestion of the Republican platform was followed.

Let me go back to this committee that was charged with the duty of investigating these trusts. It investigated the Standard Oil trust, the sugar trust, the cotton-bag trust, and the whisky trust. Nine hundred and fifty-one pages of testimony in connection with the Standard Oil trust were taken up to the fall of 1888. The last meeting of this committee was September 1, 1888. They made their report to Congress on the 2d day of March, 1889. From September 1, 1888, nothing, so far as the record of the committee shows, was done. So far as the record shows, our Democratic friends were thinking what they would do. Thus was the "native hue of resolution sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." Mark you, here were our Democratic friends, who stand here today and grow red in the face and froth at the mouth with vehement denunciation of the trusts; here they were up against four trusts, which they were investigating—four deadly octopuses, which had their "villainous clutch upon the throat of American energy," and let us see what our Democratic friends did when they were up against the real thing. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Perhaps I should say first that they introduced a resolution in the House October 20, 1888, authorizing the continued employment of a clerk after they had ceased to hold any meetings, after they had ceased to do any business; I suppose for the purpose of helping them think on this most important question. [Laughter.] He does not appear to have served any other useful purpose except to punctually draw his $6 per day.

He was paid from September 1, 1888, up to March 2, 1889. I am afraid that it will appear that our friends hardly knew then what to even think they thought. They had the octopus in his lair. Four of them at the conclusion of this period of travail with this tremendous burden, while they were overshadowed with this cimmerian darkness, in the presence of the "hydra-headed monsters" "grinding into the earth unfortunate women and children," these "robbers" and "thieves," four of them right there, with their "villainous clutch on the throat of American energy"—they should have known that all that would be necessary to do was to have "a simple little bill." [Laughter.]

Let us see what the Democratic party did when it had the responsibility of initiating and constructing legislation. I read from the report of this committee. They say:

The committee respectfully submit herewith the testimony taken before them in relation to the whisky trust and the combination affecting the article of cotton bagging.

Then they go on to say that they—respectfully report that the number of combinations and trusts formed and forming in this country is, as your committee has ascertained, very large—

They had found that out in July, 1888; so they corroborate their previous finding. They are still "very large." They continue:

and affect a large portion of the important manufacturing and industrial interests of the country.

"They do not report any list of these combinations, for the reason that new ones are constantly forming."

That is to say, the trusts were forming so fast that the committee could not count those that had already been formed! [Laughter.] It reminds one of the story of the farmer who sent out his hired man to count a new litter of pigs; and the hired man returned, saying that he had counted all except the little speckled pig, who ran around so that he could not count him! [Laughter.] So our Democratic friends found these trusts growing so fast that they could not count them. It was an awful and terrible condition of things that confronted them. They found, too, that—

Old ones are constantly extending their relations, so as to cover new branches of business and invade new territories.

Now they come to the essential point:

Your committee further report that, owing to present differences of opinion between the members of the committee——

Mr. SHATTUC. I rise to a point of order. There is so much noise in the Hall that we can not hear the gentleman occupying the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MORRIS). The House will come to order. The Chair is constrained to state that in consequence of the want of order on the floor he himself can not hear the remarks of the gentleman addressing the Chair.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not suppose my friends over there like to hear what I am saying. I hate awfully to state it; it is no doubt a little chilly—as chilly as some things which my Democratic friends in the ice trust have been learning! [Laughter.]

TAMMANY AND ICE TRUST.

I refer for a moment in passing to this ice trust about which the gentleman from New York is so much disturbed and which last evening came so near giving rise to a violent collision on this floor between a distinguished Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, so that it seemed at one time that somebody might be obliged to interfere in order to prevent, for the sake of the traditions of this House, a scene of violence.

This ice trust, as I understand it, let me say, went to the State of Maine—I merely suggest this as a political proposition—for the purpose of procuring a charter for a corporation with a capital of $60,000,000. The State of Maine had a Republican legislature, with a Republican judiciary committee, and upon that committee was my friend Joseph H. Manley, a member from the State of Maine of the national Republican committee. Now, what did that Republican legislature do upon the question of organizing and assisting the trust? The Republican legislature promptly "turned down" the ice trust, which then went to New Jersey and obtained its charter, and afterwards, I suppose, took under its protecting folds the mayor of New York and other distinguished sachems of Tammany Hall. So that "the Tiger" may be said, during this warm weather, to be carefully preserved upon ice. [Laughter.] And paradoxical as it may appear, the nearer he gets to the ice the hotter he grows, if our Vice-Presidential friend is a fair sample.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will, after I get through with this point. I want to show what our Democratic friends do when they are right up against the real thing.

Your committee further report that owing to present differences of opinion between the members of the committee they limit this report—

Now, remember what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] says, and what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING] says, and what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] says, and what the other gentlemen who constitute the minority of the Judiciary Committee say. In 1900 "a simple little bill" would do. That is what they say now at the beginning of a campaign after Colonel Bryan has said that the issues of this campaign are to be imperialism, trusts, and finances. In 1889 this committee had had under investigation four trusts for more than a year, and what conclusion did they reach? Here is their language:

They limit this report to submitting to the careful consideration of subsequent Congresses the facts shown by the testimony taken before the committee.

Was not that courageous? The mountain travailed and did not bring forth even a mouse. When our Democratic friends have no power and know it, when they can not enact a statute and know it, they become simply frantic in their determination to do something. Incidentally they stand up here filling the air with charges of deceit, and fraud, and insincerity. Under these circumstances you can not stop them from accomplishing something, or hold them down, even though you should hitch on a span of horses, a yoke of oxen, an automobile, and a steam engine. They simply will do something. But run them up against something, stand them up in front of a trust, or four of them, and what happens to them then? They stand still and turn pale. They shiver and they tremble, and the hair upon their flesh stands up. Their courage oozes from the ends of their nerveless, paralyzed fingers, their feet are shod with lead, and they cravenly turn the question over to "subsequent Congresses." It is significant that they then knew that the next Congress was Republican and could be relied upon for courage and intelligence enough to do something.

There is only one conclusion about this condition in which we find our distinguished friends. When they had this question before them, and had been thinking of it—William L. Wilson, William D. Bynum, Clifton R. Breckenridge, Bacon of New York—when they had been considering it for six months and one day, either they did not have the intelligence or they did not have the courage to attack the "hydra-headed monster." [Applause.] Now I will listen to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING].

Mr. FLEMING. The gentleman from Maine has been giving us a very interesting recital——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope so.

Mr. FLEMING. Of the action of the Republican party in its attempt to destroy trusts. He referred, I believe, to some platform declarations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Put your question quickly, for I know what it is.

Mr. FLEMING. Now, will the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman from Maine let you know why they did not put it in their platform of 1896?

Mr. FLEMING. That is exactly what I want to know.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; I will tell you why.

Mr. FLEMING. Was it to meet campaign emergencies?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Sit down, do not make a speech, and I will tell you why.

Mr. FLEMING. I have asked you. Now, I would like to know.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The promises of the Republican party never outlaw, and it is unnecessary for the Republican party to repeat its promises. [Applause on the Republican side.] The promises of the Democratic party are never performed. They are like the promissory note of an insolvent debtor, every time it is renewed the poorer and meaner it grows. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That is the reason.

Mr. FLEMING rose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, do not interrupt me. I have no time. I want to call your attention to another thing for a minute. They did put in "a simple little bill." I will call your attention to your platform in a minute. The only "simple little bill" that the Democracy put in in connection with their investigation of the sugar trust in 1888 was a "simple little bill" for $11,968, for the expenses of this committee, for accomplishing nothing and then being obliged to stand up before the country and admit their incompetency to deal with the question. I recollect nothing in history that is equal to the carnage, destruction, and havoc that was visited upon the "hydra-headed monsters" by this assault of the Democracy in 1888, unless it may be paralleled by Cervantes' immortal hero Don Quixote, when, commending his soul to his lady Dulcinea, imploring her to succor him in his hour of peril, covered with his buckler, with his lance in rest, astride of his Rosinante, with Sancho Panza tagging along behind, he made that sanguinary charge upon the windmills upon the plain of Monteil. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

For the satisfaction of the gentleman, I come, just for a moment, to his platform, that heterogeneous, conglomerate aggregation of pessimism, communism, anarchism, nihilism, socialism, hoboism, Coxeyism, 16-to-oneism, middle-of-the-roadism, anything-to-beat-Grantism, raise-the-devil-generallyism that they adopted in Chicago in 1896. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But you had a plank in your platform at that time, a diluted copy of your plank in 1892, in which the Democracy, that did not have the courage and the ability to attack the trusts in 1889, demanded some changes in the interstate-commerce law. The Democracy did not, however, make any attempt to amend that law, and, as usual, their promise went unperformed. I will give in this connection the platforms since 1888:

We recognize in the trusts and combinations which are designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint product of capital and labor a natural consequence of the prohibitive taxes which prevent the free competition which is the life of honest trade; but we believe their worst evils can be abated by law; and we demand the rigid enforcement of the laws made to prevent and control them, together with such further legislation in restraint of their abuses as experience may show to be necessary.

[Republican platform, June 7, 1892.]

We reaffirm our opposition, declared in the Republican platform of 1888, to all combinations of capital, organized in trusts or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens. We heartily indorse the action taken upon this subject and ask for such further legislation as may be required to remedy any defects in existing laws and to render their enforcement more complete and effective.

[Democratic platform, 1896.]

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

The last Republican utterance upon the question is the recommendation of William McKinley, in his message to this Congress, in which, among other things, he says:

It is universally conceded that combinations which engross or control the market of any particular kind of merchandise or commodity necessary to the general community, by suppressing natural and ordinary competition, whereby prices are unduly enhanced to the general consumer, are obnoxious not only to the common law but also to the public welfare. There must be a remedy for the evils involved in such organizations. If the present law can be extended more certainly to control or check these monopolies or trusts, it should be done without delay. Whatever power the Congress possesses over this most important subject should be promptly ascertained and asserted.

The people having weighed our friends upon the other side, found them wanting. When they made this report, turning this question over that they could not handle, a Republican Congress had already been elected.

SHERMAN ANTI-TRUST LAW.

When that Republican Congress met the first bill introduced in the Senate was introduced by that "noblest Roman of them all," John Sherman, of Ohio. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman Act. It was opposed by Senator George and Senator VEST, who fell upon it with great force and violence, because it was "unconstitutional."

After the due course of procedure it was finally reported to the House. After it was reported to the House, in the course of its consideration the Democracy, not daring to vote directly against it, undertook on the 20th day of June, 1890, to side track it in the interest of a silver bill, on the 16-to-1 proposition, that they did not dare to stand up in this House and register a vote upon. The vote upon that proposition was what? The leading Democrats voted to side track the Sherman anti-trust law, which was then under the charge of William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, a member of Congress upon this floor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The following leading Democrats voted to side track that bill: BANKHEAD, Blount, Boatner, Bland, Bynum, Crisp, Dockery, Enloe, Holman, Kilgour, LANHAM. The gentleman from Texas then voted in favor of side tracking the anti-trust law. Now he is very anxious to enact one. RICHARDSON, now the leader of the other side, voted to side track the anti-trust law, but now he is very anxious to put in "a little bill." Sayers, Springer, Turner of Georgia. ELLIOTT, now a member of the Judiciary Committee, then voted to side track the anti-trust law, but now is very anxious to enact one.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can not. I have only seven minutes, and there is considerable more of this history. McMillin, JAMES R. WILLIAMS of Illinois, McRAE, Mills, the author of the Mills bill, voted to side track the anti-trust bill. By the way, I should say here, perhaps, regarding the Mills bill that it gave a preferential tariff of 26 per cent in favor of the sugar trust, when it was reported and passed the House. That is the Democratic record upon this legislation.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW RESULT OF REPUBLICAN LEGISLATION.

Just a word in relation to the interstate-commerce law.

The interstate-commerce law, enacted in 1887, was introduced by whom? By Senator CULLOM of Illinois. From what committee? A Republican committee in the Senate. The amendment in 1891 was introduced by whom? CULLOM of Illinois. From what committee? A Republican committee in the Senate. The next amendment was introduced by whom? CULLOM of Illinois. From what committee? A Republican committee in the Senate.

There is the interstate-commerce law, there is the anti-trust law, both the result of Republican legislation, against the active, determined opposition of our friends upon the other side. There is the record of the Republican party, there is the record of the Democratic party. There is the record of Mr. Bryan, there is the record of William McKinley. Now let me read you just what some of our insinuating friends upon the other side said when the anti-trust law was being considered. I want to show you what assistance the Republican majority had in 1890 when they were passing this Sherman anti-trust law. Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, said this:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not oppose this bill, although even so great a lawyer as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] is not able to tell us what it means. I do not believe that anybody can tell us what it means. This is merely experimental legislation. It is a blind legislation to answer a popular demand that something shall be done about trusts.

It is proper to state right here that Mr. Culberson, a great man, noble Democrat, and patriot as he was, stood up as a member of the Judiciary Committee, representing a Democratic constituency, steadfastly in favor of the bill, and he was the only Democrat of any prominence who did stand by this anti-trust legislation.

Mr. GAINES. Every Democratic vote in this House was cast in favor of the anti-trust law.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, yes, when you could not do anything else, when it came to a direct vote on the proposition, but before that many of you voted to side track it. When it came to the vote squarely on the proposition you did not dare vote against it; but when an attempt was made to side track it every leading Democrat in the House, except Mr. Culberson, voted to side track it. Yet our friends stand up here and talk about deceit and fraud and insincerity and hypocrisy. "Physician, heal thyself." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Here is what Mr. Enloe said:

I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kerr] if he believes that when this bill is passed into a law it will be worth even the blank paper it is written on?

William L. Wilson, the leader of your House, sneered at it by declaring that it was absolutely worthless, and unworthy to be passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Was not he right?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, he was not right; and I am going to give you the record to show you. I call attention in detail to only two cases under this law.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS UNDER SHERMAN ACT.

By the way, I will stop right here, if I have the time, and I would like to ask any man who signed that minority report whether he knows of any criminal conviction obtained under the Sherman anti-trust law in case of laboring men on a strike for higher wages? And if he does, give me the name of the case.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Debs was imprisoned that way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was not a criminal conviction, and the gentleman certainly knows it.

Mr. FLEMING. He went to jail.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is that all the answer the gentleman can give me?

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Debs was sent to jail is what I say.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is not the point at all. I make this assertion——

Mr. FLEMING. That is the only man that went to jail under a trust.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I make this assertion: There never yet has been within the limits of the United States a single criminal conviction of a man connected with a labor trouble under this act; and the gentleman from Georgia, if he does not know that, simply discloses his ignorance when he stands here——

Mr. FLEMING. The gentleman does not stand here and deny that Debs was put in jail.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is simply trifling. A man that makes that kind of a statement simply discloses his own ignorance of legal language. The Democratic minority of this committee know no such cases. I asked the ranking Democratic member of the committee more than three days ago to give me the name of a case, and he did not do it, and he can not do it. This Debs case is not a case in point. That was a violation of an order of the equity court. The imprisonment was not for crime, but for contempt. You are juggling with words when you undertake to use it. They close the report of the committee with a false statement for the purpose of undertaking to make the laboring men of this country believe that this law has been enforced against them and not against other people. That is absolutely without foundation. It is a baseless effort to inflame labor against capital. [Applause.]

Upon the other hand, it is a fact that vigorous, though unsuccessful, efforts have been made to prosecute criminally combinations of capital under the Sherman Act, as the cases which I now give show:

United States vs. Greenhut, May, 1892; whisky trust; indictment quashed.

United States vs. Nelson, October 10, 1892; lumber dealers; demurrer to indictment sustained.

United States vs. Patterson, February 28, 1893; cash-register case; demurrer sustained as to certain points and overruled as to others.

United States vs. Certain Coal Dealers in Ohio; Chesapeake and Ohio Fuel Company; still pending upon demurrer to indictment.

Moore vs. United States, February 14, 1898; coal dealers at Salt Lake City; tried and convicted; judgment reversed on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction.

TRANS-MISSOURI AND JOINT TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION CASES.

The two cases to which I have referred are the Trans-Missouri case and the Joint Traffic Association case. The Trans-Missouri case involved a combination of 18 railroads, covering a territory from the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande on the south to the Missouri River line on the east, to the British possessions on the north, and to the Pacific Ocean on the west. That was declared an illegal combination by the Supreme Court of the United States on the application of the Department of Justice. The Joint Traffic Association included 31 railroads, nearly all the railroads in operation between Chicago and the Atlantic coast, representing an aggregate capital of $2,377,369,466, and they had the power, if that combination had been sustained, to impose such tariff as they saw fit upon all the products of the great West, to the extent, if need be, of depriving the producer of any return; but that was declared illegal and void. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Such is the record of the Republican party in regard to legislation, and such is the record of the Republican party in enforcing its legislation. Such is the pitiable record of the Democratic party. Such, my friends, is the record of William J. Bryan in connection with anti-trust legislation, and such is the record of William McKinley, soon to be again the candidate of the Republican party, upon this great question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are ready to go to the people in November and to submit to their candid common sense and good sound judgment whether the Democratic party, that has admitted itself incompetent to deal with this question, and does not move except backward, shall be trusted; whether they will rely for action upon the party that obstructs, or the party that constructs—the Republican party. If the people of this country shall register their verdict in accordance with the proposition that "you can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time, but that you can not fool all the people all of the time," then their verdict will demonstrate that the sun which rises upon the day that sees William McKinley renominated as the candidate of the Republican party will prove to be the sun of Austerlitz illumining the banners of the Republican party with the splendors of its approaching victory. [Loud and long-continued cheering and applause on the Republican side.]

Porto Rico.

OF

HON. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, April 11, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes," and the Senate amendments thereto—

Mr. SWANSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I will not discuss this evening whether we should have free trade or impose a tariff between Porto Rico and this country. I have previously discussed that fully. It is evident that the Republican party is determined to ignore the "plain duty" pointed out by the President; it is evident that it is determined to ignore the "highest justice and fair dealing" pointed out by Secretary Root; it is evidently determined to ignore the "imperative necessity" pointed out by the commander in chief, General Davis; it is evident it is going to ignore the entire independent press of this country; it is evident that it is going to ignore the ablest portion of the Republican press of this country and many of its most trusted leaders, and sustain the imposition of a tariff duty between this country and Porto Rico.

But, Mr. Speaker, upon that issue we are willing to be judged by the country. Our position is that when a people annex themselves to the United States or when we annex them there is an equality of burdens and an equality of benefits. We take it that the Constitution and the flag go hand in hand. But in the short time given to me I want to discuss the second step of this imperial policy that has been added to the bill in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment to call attention to a recognition in the bill of the Constitution—that it does exist in Porto Rico? In line 6, page 12, it is provided that the officials in Porto Rico shall swear allegiance to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is this imperial policy disclosed in this bill? What is the second step as promulgated by the Senate? In the first place, it incorporates Porto Rico, not as a nation, not as a people, but as a corporation, like any other corporation, with the privilege to sue and be sued. It deprives them of all citizenship of any nation on the face of the earth. In other words, in this bill the people of Porto Rico are incorporated like a railroad, or like any other vast corporation. What are the means provided to govern this corporation created by Congress? The bill appoints eleven directors who have absolute control and absolute power over everything in Porto Rico. Six of them need not be residents of Porto Rico. Five of them must be residents.

Now, then, these 6, who are not compelled to be residents of Porto Rico, have absolute power and control in that island. How? It provides that they shall elect 35 members of the subordinate or coordinate branch of the legislature. But this bill provides that this executive council, composed of 11 members, shall fix the qualifications, shall fix the method of registration, shall fix the time and place and notice, so that these 11 men have the absolute power and control of electing the 35 members who are to be the coordinate branch of the legislature in Porto Rico.

Now, it goes further. It says that the method of fixing the qualifications of voters, the registration of voters, the time, place, and method of holding the elections, shall be as provided by that executive council until it is repealed. Now, the only way that you can repeal the law under the bill fixing this is by a majority of the executive council and a majority of the 35 members. This the executive council will never do. Thus this executive council is given power to perpetuate itself. Thus the power to elect and control the 35 coordinate members of the legislature, really belongs to the 6 nonresident members of the executive council appointed by the President under this bill.

I guarantee that there is no nation on the face of the earth that is so permanently enslaved and left under such restricted and iniquitous control. What power is given this directory, as you may call it, of this corporation? All franchises, all privileges allowed to railroads, street cars, and everything, is given to the absolute control and disposition of this executive council, only requiring the approval of the governor. You Republicans passed a bill through the House for a government for Hawaii, and it is now in the Senate, with a provision that the President must approve the bestowal of all franchises.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The approval of Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Of Congress. Why give these six members of the executive council the right to barter away for generations the franchises and privileges of property and the rights of 1,000,000 people whom we took and annexed to ourselves as a voluntary act on our part without their request or desire. I prophesy, if this bill is passed, when it becomes a law, and this carpetbag government has full sway in Porto Rico, you will have created a system of government, a system of control, a system of power, dependent upon people appointed from here, and having no connection with the interests of Porto Rico, and I believe you will inaugurate a carnival of corruption, a carnival of scandal and of disgrace that will bring shame on everyone who votes for this iniquitous and damnable bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] has well said, there is not a man on this floor who is so derelict in humanity that would accept any such government for himself or for his people. And yet we are asked to force upon Porto Rico a system or form of government that a man on this floor would scorn to accept for his own constituency and his own people. Now, gentlemen, there is in the American heart a sense of justice, a sense of right, a sense of what is proper and what is honest and fair dealing. To make rulers just, honest, and responsible for the interests confided to them, we in this country have put the responsibility between the rulers and the ruled; we make the rulers in this country responsible to their constituents, and yet you propose in this bill, as a part of your imperial policy, a system which makes the ruling power, the real rulers of Porto Rico, responsible not to the Porto Ricans, but to the President here alone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that same policy will be pursued in every possession to be annexed to the United States. It carries out the Republican ideas upon the Constitution; their position is that the inhabitants of Oklahoma, of Arizona, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, the inhabitants of Porto Rico are simply the creatures of Congressional despotism; that we can give or deny them the right of trial by jury, the right of habeas corpus; that if they receive these blessings they come not as inherent rights, but as a gift from Congress. Carrying out this idea of Congressional despotism you incorporate them into this bill. They simply have a charter, like a railroad, which can be repealed at any time Congress sees fit to repeal it. They are not citizens of the United States, but a simple incorporated body of people, a gift from Congress, with the right to sue and be sued.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make this note: it is the first time in the history of the American people that a despotic power has been claimed anywhere; it is foreign to the American interests, it is foreign to the genius of the American people. We have not given despotic power to the Federal Government; we have not given it to the State government, because each shares it with the other. We have not given it to the legislature, judiciary, or executive; each share power with the other; but now it is claimed for the first that despotic power over territory is reposed in Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

American Commerce with Gold-Standard Countries, and the Volume of Our Currency.

OF

HON. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 5, 1900.

The House having under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11583) making appropriations for the Military Academy—

Mr. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I greatly appreciate the privilege accorded me by the Committee on Military Affairs in yielding time during the debate which has been so animated and interesting. I desire, however, to digress briefly from the subject under discussion for the purpose of meeting statements frequently made upon the other side of the Chamber regarding the gold production of the world and the criticism often carelessly repeated that to depend upon gold as the standard of value is to depend upon a diminishing product which will grow greater with the years and furnish a constantly diminishing basis of value.

I have, through the kindness of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, been enabled to place upon the record the relative gold production in the world during the last fifty years as compared with the three hundred and fifty years preceding, making a most interesting and instructive history of gold production.

I have also deemed it especially desirable to produce the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, showing the commerce of the United States with the gold and silver standard countries of the world, all of which will be especially instructive and interesting as matter of historical and accurate commercial data. The showing thus made clearly demonstrates the wisdom of the course of the present Administration, which has enacted the gold standard into law, and thus placed our country upon an equal commercial basis with the leading nations of the world. The total commerce of the gold-standard countries of the world amounts to $18,295,410,000, while that of the silver-standard countries of the world amounts to but $1,029,302,000, or but a trifle over 3 per cent. The commerce of the United States with the gold-standard countries of the world amounted in 1899 to $1,909,339,000, while with the silver-standard countries our commerce the same year amounted to but $124,136,000, or about 6 per cent of our commerce.

The total exports of the United States in 1899 to the gold-standard countries of the world aggregated $1,197,067,000, while we sold to the silver-standard countries of the world $60,658,000 worth of products, or a trifle over 4 per cent. How idle and foolhardy it would be for us to come to the commercial basis of silver-standard countries in the face of this showing. Indeed, the height of political wisdom has been shown in keeping our finances upon such a firm and well-recognized basis that we can do business with the world in a standard recognized and known wherever the highest civilization and the greatest industrial progress has been made.

During the last Presidential campaign the Democratic party, under the leadership of Mr. Bryan, argued to the American people that if the Republican party was successful and enacted the gold standard into law, the circulating money of our country would be lessened and the value of money thereby enhanced. I find, upon inquiry at the Bureau of Statistics, information upon which the following statement can be accurately based, and I insert it for the purpose of illustrating the recklessness of our political opponents fighting under the silver standard borne by Bryan and Sewell, and ask whether their predictions have in the slightest degree been realized. It is a pleasure to assert without fear of contradiction that the present Administration of President McKinley has witnessed not only an increase in the circulating money of more than 33 per cent since the beginning of the fiscal year 1897, while the increase in the circulation of gold certificates alone is 61 per cent greater than at the time President McKinley was inaugurated.

I invite a most careful perusal of this statement:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., May 21, 1900.

Hon. WM. ALDEN SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your request for specific information regarding the relative production of gold in the last 50 years as compared with the preceding 350 years, also the commerce of the gold and silver standard countries of the world, respectively, and the share of the commerce of the United States with the gold and silver standard countries, respectively, I have the honor to state as follows:

The world's gold production, as based upon available data, may be conveniently divided into three distinct periods: First, from 1492 down to 1848, the date of the discovery of gold in California; second, from 1848 to 1873; third, from 1873 to date. The gold production of the three periods, adopting the statements of Soetbeer for the earlier period and the statements of the Mint Bureau for those covering later years, is as follows:

Period.	Production.
1492 to 1847	$3,146,094,000
1848 to 1873	3,003,739,000
1874 to 1899	3,673,484,000

It will be observed from the above statement that more than twice as much gold has been produced in the world in the last fifty years as in the three hundred and fifty years prior to that time.

Regarding the commerce of the gold and silver standard countries respectively, and that of the United States with them, I hand you herewith a table giving the details with reference to each group—gold and silver standard countries separately.

The total commerce of the gold-standard countries named is $18,295,410,000; that of the silver-standard countries, $1,029,302,000; per cent of silver-standard countries, 3.33. The commerce of the United States with the gold-standard countries in 1899 was $1,909,339,000, and with the silver-standard countries, $124,136,000; per cent with silver-standard countries, 6.15. Of our total exports in 1899, the amount to the gold-standard countries named was $1,197 067,000; to the silver-standard countries, $60,658,000; per cent to silver-standard countries, 4.82.

These figures, which are in each case for the latest available year, include 97 per cent of the total commerce of the world.

Very respectfully,

O. P. AUSTIN,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House longer, but with the permission of the House will print a table which I hold in my hand in connection with this letter, and with the statement which I have made.

Gold-standard countries.

Countries.	Population.	Total commerce.a	Commerce with United States.a
			Total.	Imports from United States.

O. P. AUSTIN,
Chief of Bureau of Statistics, U. S. Treasury Department.

Every year's developments seem to justify the assertion that this is a "billion-dollar country." The year 1899 brought our foreign commerce for the first time past the $2,000,000,000 line, and the month of February, 1900, shows our money in circulation for the first time as more than $2,000,000,000. Thus by a curious coincidence the announcement of two billions of foreign commerce and two billions of money in circulation are made within a single month, the totals indicating that the $2,000,000,000 line had been crossed in our commerce for 1899 having been only completed by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics on January 14, while the Treasury Bureau of Loans and Currency on February 1 announced that the total money in circulation had also crossed the $2,000,000,000 line, while gold and gold certificates alone had crossed the $800,000,000 line. The total foreign commerce for the year 1899 was $2,074,345,242, while the total money in circulation on February 1 was $2,003,149,355. The use of ten figures with which to show the business conditions of the country is indeed becoming surprisingly frequent. The tables of the December Summary of Commerce and Finance show, for instance, the total resources of national banks at $4,475,343,924; the latest report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows the deposits in savings banks to be $2,230,366,954; the total resources of all banks in the United States are given by the same report as $5,196,177,381, and the latest number of the Summary of Commerce and Finance shows the December clearing-house returns of all cities outside of New York at $3,012,896,144, and those of the city of New York at $5,348,285,867.

The announcement that the money in circulation in the United States has for the first time crossed the $2,000,000,000 line also calls attention to the fact that the amount of money for each individual is greater to-day than ever before. The Treasury Bureau of Loans and Currency publishes each month a statement of the amount of money in circulation, and by combining with this the actuary's estimate of population, presents a monthly statement of the amount of money in circulation per capita. This statement puts the population on February 1, 1900, at 77,116,000, the money in circulation at $2,003,149,355, and the circulation per capita at $25.98. This gives a larger per capita than in any earlier month in the history of the country. On February 1, 1899, it was $25.42; on February 1, 1898, $23.42; on February 1, 1897, $23.05, and on February 1, 1896, $22.47.

No period in our financial history has shown a more rapid growth in the amount of money in circulation than that covered by the past three or four years. The total in circulation to-day is 33 per cent greater than at the beginning of the fiscal year 1897, and the gold and gold certificates in circulation are 61 per cent greater than at that time, the actual increase in money in circulation during that period being $493,424,155, and of gold and gold certificates $305,886,000, practically two-thirds of the increase, therefore, having been in gold.

The following table shows the amount of gold and total money in circulation at the beginning of each quarter of the fiscal year from July 1, 1896, to date:

Army Appropriation Bill.

HON. E. R. RIDGELY, OF KANSAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 5, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8582) making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—

Mr. RIDGELY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This bill appropriates $114,220,095.55 for one year's support of the Army. I have not intended to speak at this time, but as the time allotted to our side is limited, and I am informed that others are to be recognized later in the debate, I shall have to speak now if at all. As we are legislating on military affairs I will first notice one item of importance omitted from the bill and then pass to the general problem of a large standing army, its purposes and burdens. The omission I refer to is needed legislation providing for the one and two months' extra time allowed the soldiers of the Spanish war at the time of their discharge.

It seems the War Department is withholding this pay in a great many cases, claiming that more authority is needed; hence I believe we should hasten new legislation by putting it into this bill as an amendment. These soldiers ought not to be kept waiting. I have ever claimed that the private soldiers are not paid as well nor treated as liberally by the Government as they should be. We make too much discrimination between the private and the officer.

DOUBLE THE PRIVATE'S PAY AND IMPROVE HIS PENSION.

Whatever else we may do, I would change the law to provide, at least, double present pay for the private, even if to do so it should become necessary to reduce the pay of officers. Another change I would make would be to simplify and improve the benefits of our pension system by providing, instead of the present complex, difficult, and unequal pension scale, I would have the law provide a compact between the Government and each individual soldier which should be a guaranty on the part of the Government to every soldier and his dependents against want.

The Government should say to the soldier, in consideration of your taking upon yourself the extra hazards of war in behalf of your country, your country will guaranty that you and your dependents shall be protected against poverty and want so long as you live.

The soldier who returns to civil life and who is fortunate enough to gather ample means to enable him and his dependents to live in comfort has no need of a pension; but there are thousands of our soldiers and their families suffering in abject poverty, and equally as many more who are unable to procure common comforts. It is a shame and a disgrace to our Government to permit these conditions so long as there is abundant wealth which should be taxed, and might be if we would but put human life first above hoarded wealth.

REDUCE INSTEAD OF INCREASE THE ARMY.

Mr. Chairman, the balance of my time shall be devoted to my protest against the rapid growth of our Army.

Within the last three years we have increased the burden of our Army more than fourfold. The close of the Spanish war brought no reduction of this burden, but to the contrary we at once increased our standing Army almost threefold and authorized a Volunteer Army of 35,000. For several months we have been repeatedly assured that our unholy war against the Filipinos is over, yet we hear no suggestion of a reduction of the Army. To the contrary we know that in both ends of this Capitol legislation is well under way to increase the Army and make the increase permanent. When in connection with this we take into consideration the rapid growth of our Navy we are forced to admit that if the present tendency to militarism shall continue, the dead weight of a nonproductive but ever-consuming military burden is to be perpetual, and it has already grown until the taxpayer to-day has to pay at least $5 in addition to every dollar he paid at the beginning of the present Administration, and this terribly increased burden will rapidly increase instead of diminish.

Unless we shall change present policies, both domestic and foreign—for we are not only threatened with foreign wars by reason of our greedy conquest of the Filipinos, but we are permitting England to use us as an ally, if not an open partner, in forcing her greedy commercialism into China and all the Orient—this will certainly lead to foreign wars while the Republican press of our country is kept busy deluding our people into the belief that they are to reap great benefits by making conquest of Asia even to the extent of forcing this policy by the sword.

REVERSED BANKRUPTING AND IMMORAL POLICY.

Mr. Chairman, this sudden reversal of our former national policy, from that of peace and nonintervention in the affairs of the Eastern Hemisphere, to a policy of conquest, is, in my judgment, not only an absolute violation of our national ethics but it is downright immoral, and will prove to be disastrous in its financial result, costing us the lives of hundreds of thousands more of our best young men and hundreds of millions more money than will ever return to us.

LET US LOOK INTO THIS ORIENTAL COUNTRY AND ITS CONDITIONS AS A BUSINESS PROPOSITION—UNDER THE COMPETITIVE WAGE SYSTEM IT MEANS RUIN TO US.

If we break down the wall of exclusion—forcing our industries and commerce upon the hordes of sleeping Asiatics—what may we reasonably expect will be the effect upon ourselves in all of that country, where the population is almost ten times as thick per acre as our own? The condition of the great hosts there is that of impoverished existence, the people inured to privations that would be death to us; and yet so skillful are these serfs in their imitative and mechanical art that years ago we found ourselves compelled to deny them access to our machinery as competitors against our own laborers.

But now our great capitalists propose to take our machinery direct to these Malays, Chinese, and oriental competitors in order that they, the capitalists, may get the benefits of hundreds of millions of laborers at from 10 to 20 cents per day. Our laborers and our merchants, dependent upon them, may well ask what is to be done with the manufactured goods which are to be produced by this cheap labor and our improved machinery. These goods cannot be sold to the people who create them, as their purchasing power will be limited to a few pennies per day, leaving the great bulk of their productions to be thrown upon our own and the world's market, in which we are seeking to find purchasers for our own productions. We may well ask what will be the effect of such crushing competition upon our home industries and laborers. There can be but one answer and one result, and that will be a disastrous reduction of wages in this country and the shutting down of most of our industries.

TO GRATIFY GREED OF CAPITAL THE MOTIVE.

Mr. Chairman, as proof that our present military and commercial conquest of the Orient is dictated by our capitalistic exploiters, I will have the Clerk read an editorial which has just appeared in the Washington Post, one of the strongest Republican papers in the nation, standing as the spokesman and defender of President McKinley's Administration.

The Clerk read as follows:

LET US BE HONEST!

Why can not we be honest in our utterances touching the territories we have recently acquired? Really, it would save time and trouble, to say nothing of life and treasure, to come out frankly with the announcement that we have annexed these possessions in cold blood, and that we intend to utilize them to our profit and advantage. All this talk about benevolent assimilation; all this hypocritical pretense of anxiety for the moral, social, and intellectual exaltation of the natives; all this transparent parade of responsibility and deep-seated purpose; all this deceives nobody, avails nothing, helps us not an inch in the direction of profit, dignity, and honor. We all know, down in our hearts, that these islands, group, etc., are important to us only in the ratio of their practical possibilities. We value them by the standard of their commercial usefulness, and by no other. All this gabble about civilizing and uplifting the benighted barbarians of Cuba and Luzon is mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Foolishly or wisely, we want these newly acquired territories, not for any missionary or altruistic purposes, but for the trade, the commerce, the power, and the money there are in them. Why beat about the bush, and promise and protest all sorts of things? Why not be honest? It will pay.

As a matter of fact, we are not concerned in the ethical or religious uplifting of the Filipinos. After all, the difference between a breech clout and a starched shirt front is a mere matter of climate and personal opinion. Dishonesty, untruth, crime, and general wickedness are here in our midst—present with us as part of our daily life and growing with our growth. We need not go to the West Indies or the Philippines in search of material for moral rescue. Our own slums abound with opportunities for missionary zeal. Why not tell the truth and say—what is the fact—that we want Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Luzon—together with any other islands in either ocean that may hereafter commend themselves to our appetite, because we believe they will add to our national strength, and because we hope they will some day become purchasers at our bargain counters? We might as well throw off the pious mask and indulge ourselves in a little honest candor. It will cost us nothing, and it may profit much. At any rate, we shall have the comfort and satisfaction of being honest with ourselves and the privilege of looking into the mirror without blushing.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, this editorial has the merit of frankly stating to the world what is apparent to every observer, and especially to those in this city who are permitted to witness the gradual unfolding of this new departure in our national policy.

THE ROBBERS WANT A LARGE ARMY.

We can now understand this constant pressure for an ever increasing army. The great financiers who are directing this policy and using the great power of Government to advance their greedy schemes are wise enough to know that it will not only be necessary to keep up a large army to force and protect their monopoly of the lands and natural resources of the Orient and their use of the serf labor there, but they know full well what all of this means in its effects upon our great army of wage-workers.

TROUBLE FOR HOME LABORERS.

The suffering in store for our people if these schemes go on will be excruciating, as they are forced to meet this oriental competition and its inevitable reduction of wages in this country. Strikes, lockouts, and shutdowns will follow in rapid succession, with all their attending strife. As a warning proof that the great captains of industry are preparing for this day of trouble, I cite the fact that in all of our large cities, and especially where large armies of labor are employed, we know our city governments, in compliance with the demands of capital, have already erected frowning fortifications called armories, with their portholes and gatling guns covering every street.

WHY THESE ENGINES OF DEATH IN OUR CITIES?

We may well ask ourselves, Who is to occupy these fortifications and at whom are these guns to be aimed? The answer is clear. Our standing Army must be enlarged to occupy these fortifications. Our laborers in the streets of the cities they have built are the contemplated victims.

MILITARY DESPOTISM OUR RUIN.

Mr. Chairman, I am not alone in these warnings against this new policy of imperialism by which our Government is to enter upon a system of armed colonial expansion, subjugation, and government by force, with its necessary and ever-growing burdens of militarism. If we are to go out making conquests by force, the same power by which we go will return to curse and crush us at home. Despotism will stalk the land; the ballot, as the people's instrument for determining and directing public affairs, will be overthrown; the Republic will die while lingering in name only.

HOPE OF ESCAPE.

There yet remains the hope that our people will arouse themselves to patriotic action, forget minor party differences, and rescue the Republic from this impending and certain destruction. In support of this hope I will close by quoting the remarks of Justice David J. Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, in his recent address at Buffalo. These remarks are especially significant to me, coming as they do from an eminent jurist of my own State, a life-long Republican, appointed to the Supreme Bench by President Harrison.

BREWER ON IMPERIALISM—PREDICTS THE NATION IS SOWING THE SEEDS FOR HARVEST OF TROUBLE.

Justice David J. Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, recently delivered an address on "Imperialism" before the Liberal Club, of Buffalo. Coming from such an authority, his views on this important topic are well worth attention. Justice Brewer said in part:

"It is said that the Anglo-Saxon race has manifested a capacity to govern well; that we are of that race, and that, therefore, we could well govern the Philippine Islands as colonies. I do not question the capacity of the race well and wisely to govern others. I object to the Philippine policy because it antagonizes the principles upon which this Government was founded, which have controlled its life up to the present time, and the perfection of which has been the hope and aspiration of every true American.

"Very few nations, very few individuals, live up to their high ideals, but surely the Declaration of Independence has been the ideal of our life, and we have striven to make it more and more real. Now, government by force is the very antipodes of this, and to introduce government by force over any portion of the nation is to start the second quarter of the second century of our life upon principles which are the exact opposite of those upon which we have hitherto lived. It is one thing to fail of reaching your ideal; it is an entirely different thing to deliberately turn your back upon it.

"The test of government is not in the outward mechanical display of order, but in the capacity to develop the best men, and we have lived in the faith that government by the consent of the governed develops the best men. We have not let the wise rule the ignorant, the learned the unlearned, the rich the poor, but we have appealed always to 'the plain people' as the ones on whose judgment to rely and upon whose shoulders should rest the burden of government.

"Ideas are, after all, the eternal force. Human life and destiny are controlled by them. They may seem to-day of little significance, but around them gather material interests, and to-morrow their power is disclosed.

"Government by consent and government by force, no matter how well the government may be administered, are two essentially antagonistic principles. Doubtless no immediate conflict will follow. We may see a large measure of prosperity, but are we not sowing the seeds which in the days to come will grow up into a harvest of trouble for our children and our children's children?

"A necessity of colonial possessions is an increase in our Regular Army, and the first increased proposed is from 30,000 to 100,000 men. It is a strange commentary that at the close of the nineteenth century the head of the most arbitrary government in the civilized world—the Czar of the Russias—is inviting the nations of the world to a decrease in their arms, while this, the freest land, is proposing an increase in its. Yet such seems to be the imperative need, if we enter upon the system of colonial expansion.

"Now, the great economic problem in this country is not how can a few men make more money and pile up larger fortunes, but how can the great body of the people make a fair and comfortable living? The right to work is again and again insisted upon as more important than the right to vote, and the cry of the right to work is supplemented by the cry that the State furnish work to all who can not obtain it elsewhere.

"Are we likely to aid in solving this problem by bringing into our national life 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 of unskilled Malay laborers? We have shut the doors against the Chinese. Are they any worse than the Malay? Shall we introduce in this nation more cheap labor? I do not wonder at the action of the Federation of Labor in protesting against a new competition of cheap labor as well as an increase of the Army, with its consequent increase of burden and taxation on the employed laborer.

"But there is money in it. And after all this is really the most potent factor in the proposed reaching out after the islands of the Orient. The wealth of Ormus and of Ind is to-day, as in the days of Milton, the expectation and the dream of many. Possession of the Orient, with its accumulated wealth of centuries, dazzles the imagination and confuses the judgment. The haze of mystery hangs over that vast domain. Wealth untold is believed to be there, ready to be appropriated by any dominant power. All the nations and tribes come within Lord Salisbury's definition of dying nations, and must soon be divided between and appropriated by the living and growing nations. China is held out as a dying nation, filled with inexhaustible wealth, and why should not we share in its appropriation? What a picture this is! The eagle of liberty standing like a buzzard to grow fat over an expected corpse.

"'Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.'

"The Cæsars saw the spears of their victorious legions flash in the sunlight of every known land, and in their triumphant return they brought with them the accumulated wealth of all the nations they had subdued. The splendor of imperial Rome outshone the world, but the wealth thus obtained without value given undermined the empire, and the glory of Rome is simply a memory. Napoleon beheld the shining star of destiny, and then? Does human nature change through the centuries? We stand to-day facing the temptation which comes from the possibility of rapidly accumulated wealth. What right have we to anticipate that the same result will not follow if we pursue the same course of taking what we have not fully earned?

"The problem we have sought to work out in this nation is that of government of and by and for the people. A great nation upon that principle seems possible only under a federal system, a system which relegates all matter of local interest to the several States, and exercises through the national government only those powers and functions which make for the general welfare. We have wonderfully prospered in administering such system in a compact, continental territory, each part of which has been possessed and controlled by a race capable of self-government.

"This is no trifling question, and is not answered by any gush about duty and destiny. We are not the victims, but the masters of fate, and to attempt to unload upon the Almighty responsibility for that which we choose to do is not only an insult to Him, but to ordinary human intelligence.

"We are told that we have become so great and powerful that the world needs us; but what the world most needs is not the touch of our power, but the blessings of our example. It needs the bright example of a free people not disturbed by any illusions of territorial acquisition, of pecuniary gain, or military glory, but content with their possessions and striving through all the abilities, activities, and industries of their wisest and most earnest to make the life of each individual citizen happier, better, and more content.

"Two visions rise before me:

"One of a nation growing in population, riches, and strength; reaching out the strong hand to bring within its dominion weaker and distant races; holding them by force for the rapid wealth they may bring—with perhaps the occasional glory, success, and sacrifice of war; a wondrously luxurious life into which the fortunate few shall enter; an accumulation of magnificence which for a term will charm and dazzle, and then the shadow of the awful question whether human nature has changed, and the old law, that history repeats itself, has lost its force, whether the ascending splendor of imperial power is to be followed by the descending gloom of luxury, decay, and ruin.

"The other of a nation where the spirit of the Pilgrim and the Huguenot remains the living and controlling force, affirming that the Declaration of Independence, the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, and the Monroe doctrine shall never pass into innocuous desuetude, devoting its energies to the development of the inexhaustible resources of its great continental territory; solving the problem of universal personal and political liberty, of a government by the consent of the governed, where no king, no class, and no race rules, but each individual has equal voice and power in the control of all; where wealth comes only as the compensation for honest toil of hand or brain; where public service is private duty; a nation whose supreme value to the world lies not in its power, but in its unfailing loyalty to the high ideals of its youth, its forever lifting its strong hand, not to govern, but only to protect, the weak; and thus the bright shining which brightens more and more into the fadeless eternal day."

THE WAY OUT.

Mr. Chairman, I will add a suggestion as to our "plain duty." Let us at once stop this imperial policy of conquest and subjugation, reaffirm our eternal principle of government by consent, adhere to our declaration to the world when we commanded Spain to cease the persecution of her island subjects. We declared then that we did not enter the war for conquest, but to assist a struggling people to build for themselves a republic.

By this declaration we are committed as much to the people of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands as we are to the Cubans, and we have no right to assume to govern either without their voluntary consent.

We should at once reaffirm this policy to the Filipinos and assure them of our good offices to help them reestablish their government. Ask and require of them only protection of our subjects and those of other nations, retain all harbor privileges necessary for our commercial and naval fleets. To these we are justly entitled as our indemnity.

Do this, and we can bring our soldiers home—let them return to peace and industry. We can then turn our attention to the establishment of justice in our own land by providing all of our people free and voluntary access to all necessary instruments of production and distribution on such terms as will give to every producer and laborer the full values their labor creates. This will bring peace and prosperity at home and forever abolish the competitive wage system, and our people will at once have the ability to buy all that their most active industries can create, thus solving forever the question of a market; overproduction and forced idleness will disappear forever.

ABOLISH THE COMPETITIVE WAGE SYSTEM BY PUBLIC OWNERSHIP.

This will at once free our laborers from the low wages and competition of foreign lands and abolish both at home. Our producers themselves, owning all of the products of their labor, would be able to exchange property for property, giving and receiving equal value, expressed by the money in the market where the exchange takes place, whether at home or abroad; hence foreign wages or prices could in no way damage or affect our people.

MAKE OUR ENTIRE ARMY A MILITARY SCHOOL.

With this system of public ownership perfected, all these blessings are possible. We can reduce our standing Army to its old maximum of 25,000 men, make the term of service for officers and privates not to exceed five years, making the Army a military school in which to give our young men military discipline and sufficient military knowledge to fit them for an effective volunteer army in case any foreign nation should attack us. This is the only use a just government can have for an army. We must turn our attention to peace and equity if we would preserve the Republic and maintain the liberties of our people.

The Late Hon. Lorenzo Danford.

REMARKS
HON. J. H. SOUTHARD,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, January 20, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for paying tributes to the memory of Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Ohio.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

"Ordered, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. SOUTHARD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: My personal acquaintance with Mr. DANFORD began with the commencement of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Of course I had known of him before, but I can only speak of him as he impressed me. He was always what he appeared to be—honest, open, and frank on all occasions. He never desired to appear what he was not. He never hesitated to oppose what he believed to be wrong; and that which he believed to be meritorious always commanded his vigorous support. Our relations were of the pleasantest kind, and with the years that I knew him my respect for him constantly increased.

Those matters which were committed to his care as a member of Congress always received careful attention and consideration, and he was ever willing to help a friend. He was most considerate of those whose experience was less than his, and always ready to lend a helping hand to those who sought his assistance.

He served his country well, and if his constituents honored him by repeatedly sending him here to represent their interests and those of the country, he in turn honored them and the Commonwealth of which he was proud and in whose behalf he was always faithful and zealous.

I must leave to others who knew him longer and better the privilege of presenting his record as a soldier, statesman, and citizen. I knew him only as a brother member of Congress; but when he died I shared in that sorrow which came to all who had associated with him here. His memory will always be respected and honored by all his associates, especially in this House; and his Congressional district, his State, and his country must always acknowledge his faithful and valuable service.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

HON. SYDNEY E. MUDD,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, April 19, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. MUDD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the general provisions of this bill. I desire merely to make some very brief observations on that feature of it which relates to a subject-matter that I need not remind the committee I have given some special attention to and feel a particular and special interest in, and that is the portion of the bill which makes appropriations and provisions relating to the reconstruction of the Naval Academy.

After much deliberation and some degree of controversy on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs as to just what should be done for the Academy, the provisions now in the bill, I think I may say, represent an agreement, and stand to-day as the unanimous conclusion of the committee upon this branch of the naval establishment.

We have suggested for present purposes and for expenditures during the next fiscal year the sum of $877,500.

We have reported authorizations for buildings and improvements that contemplate a total and ultimate expenditure of $2,827,500, or if we include the probable approximate cost of the buildings for which we appropriate for the piling and foundations, we will have a contemplated expenditure of about $3,000,000, in round numbers.

With the exception of the provisions for the construction of sea walls and dredging, which present nothing new, and I apprehend will need no explanation, and for the erection of a temporary electric-light plant and building, to show the necessity for which, I take it, there will be no need of argument from any source, the chief and essential provisions in this bill for new works are as follows:

First. The construction of a new building for cadets' quarters, which is to be the best and the most expensive and distinctive building of the whole plan of reconstruction, at an estimated cost of $2,500,000.

Second. The renovation and reconstruction of the old colonial building, the former residence of the colonial governors of Maryland, as a residence for the superintendent of the Academy, at a cost of $25,000.

Third. To provide for the work of piling and laying the foundations for buildings adjoining the power house, which buildings, while not specifically so stated, are intended to be two in number and to consist of a building for the department of steam engineering and a building for the common purposes of a general storehouse and warehouse and workshops for the mechanics of all the trades employed at the Academy.

The buildings for which we now provide (and this may be said most particularly of the building for cadets' quarters) are those for which there is now the most exigent and pressing necessity; and the buildings we authorize to be removed are those which have been pronounced as unsafe, and condemned by experts, boards of visitors, officers of the Academy, and the Secretary of the Navy, as unsuitable, unsanitary, worthless, dangerous, and in a condition threatening to totter to the ground.

It seems to me that in view of this statement, the absolute and almost amazing truth of which has been overwhelmingly confirmed by the testimony and official reports of everybody authorized to investigate the facts, and by the testimony of the eyesight of every one who has taken occasion to look over the grounds, it will not be contended by anyone that we have acted hastily; and I believe it will just as clearly appear that we have not provided too extravagantly in the appropriations which we seek to make toward the upbuilding of this institution, whose fate is so closely interwoven with the future and the efficiency of our Navy.

We say nothing in this bill, as reported, about plans, of which there has been so much controversy in former days, but about which, I take it, Congress by its past action has already manifested its feeling of satisfaction in committing these to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, to be provided as he may best see fit, in accordance with the means placed at his disposal from time to time, and with the end in view always, as we may justly and fairly assume he has before him, of an ultimate complete, comprehensive, harmonious, and tasteful reconstruction of this institution.

It is proper to say, however, that the Secretary thus far has proceeded along the lines—and I believe we are warranted in saying it is his intention to continue to proceed along the lines—of a general plan of reconstruction and relocation, prepared in the year 1896 by what is known as the "Matthews board," at the head of which was Commodore Matthews—a board appointed by Secretary Herbert on the recommendation of the Board of Visitors to the Academy.

He has proceeded upon this plan in the construction of the buildings authorized by the last Congress, and I say that it is his intention to proceed along the lines of and in general conformation to that plan in the buildings which we are authorizing in this bill; and a more suitable plan, a more comprehensive, systematic, harmonious, and artistic plan, considered either within itself or with reference to the general configuration of the grounds and waters that approach and surround them, could not, in my judgment, be framed if we should get together all of the architects of the country and spend a generation in preparing and maturing it.

I think we can safely rest assured, Mr. Chairman, therefore, that the matter of plans will be well looked after, and that we can safely leave them where we have thus far reposed them—in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy—by analogy to just that course which is pursued in reference to buildings constructed under authority of the Treasury Department and by other Departments of the Government to which the construction of public buildings may be or may have been committed.

The only question remaining to be considered—and that is, after all, the chief question and decisive question for Congress to determine—is whether or not we are willing to make the expenditure of the money required for the construction of these buildings on the scale and style which have thus far been outlined.

The estimate of eventual expenditure for all of the buildings contemplated by the Matthews board in 1896 amounted, I believe, to about $6,000,000—somewhere between this and $7,000,000.

That estimate contemplated a construction of these buildings of brick. The Secretary of the Navy has heretofore asked, and Congress has heretofore authorized and the Department has already entered upon, the construction of the buildings thus far appropriated for of granite.

The building herein provided for, for cadets' quarters, it is contemplated to construct, and the estimates are made up to provide for its construction, of granite.

If we shall go along in future years and provide for all of the buildings outlined in the plan of the Matthews board, which Congress may or may not do, as it sees fit, and shall construct them all of granite, which Congress may or may not do, as it shall see fit, the added expenditure on account of change in material would bring up the amount to about $8,000,000; and if the enhanced price of materials which is prevailing now, over and above that which prevailed a year or two ago, at the time that these estimates were made—and which enhanced price of material we can perhaps regard as an evidence and object lesson of the general prosperity which we say, and which we hope we may say truthfully, obtains now in the country—shall continue, we should perhaps have to add to that $8,000,000 another million, making nine millions in all. Such, at least, is the estimate made by the architect, as will be found in the concluding paragraph on page 67 of the published and bound volume of hearings had before the committee, which I have before me now.

But we have made a reduction of $1,000,000 from the face of this estimate, or a little more than that, in the building for cadets' quarters, for which we are now providing, that board having estimated, and the Secretary having estimated and asked for an authorization of $3,536,000, while we have limited the amount that can be expended for this building to $2,500,000; so that, according to this basis of calculation, on the assumption that we shall provide for the construction of each and every building specified in that plan, and provide for the construction of each and every one of them of granite, we ought yet to be able to complete the whole scheme and project of the reconstruction of the Academy at an expenditure of $8,000,000.

It is for Congress to say whether or not we have been building with too much grandeur, and whether or not we shall go back to the old brick and the old wooden structures, or whether we shall go ahead and build up this institution on a plan and scope that shall be commensurate with the scale of excellence which we are contemplating for our Navy, and with the wealth and greatness of the country, for which the future holds in store, as we believe, so much of progress and of glory among the nations, through the instrumentality of the naval arm of the public service.

I am in favor of the latter plan, Mr. Chairman, and I would push that plan vigorously toward completion.

About a year or so ago, in one of the hearings before the committee on this subject-matter of the Naval Academy, some one undertook to make comparison between the cost of this institution and that of an insane asylum in one of the States of this country, and rather vigorous protest was made because, it was stated, a building for an insane asylum, that had accommodated a great many more people than this, had been constructed at a much smaller expenditure of money.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is about the standard and style of comparison that has prevailed in former years in the consideration of plans for the building of this institution.

I would not figure upon any such standard. If we are to estimate the cost and the worth of the education of the young men we are training to be the future commanders of our navies by the cost of the maintenance of the inmates of an asylum or some of the penal institutions of the country, then we have been too extravagant in our calculations and provisions, and it is the duty of Congress to call a halt right now.

But I do not believe that Congress will look at this institution from any such standpoint. We are preparing to build up a great navy and put it in the front rank of the navies of the world. The Naval Academy is the foundation of our Navy, and the young men who are educated at this institution constitute the very flower and chivalry of those who make up and lift up and give the tone and character to that great branch of the service. When they enter the Academy they place themselves in a position that marks their transition from the domain of their homes to the work of the dedication of themselves to the service of their country. They ought to be cared for and trained in a manner worthy of the life and the great responsibilities that lie before them.

I would not place them in luxury or gaudy surroundings, but they should be so provided for, in the structures in which they live and do their work and receive their training, as to give them comfort and adequate facilities and to impress them with somewhat of the enduring character and magnitude and, if need be, the solid splendor of this institution of the Navy, and the broader and greater field that lies before them in their days of service upon the world's great highway of the seas.

I admit, sir, that the appropriation which we recommend seems to be a large sum of money. I admit that it would perhaps erect a more than adequate penitentiary building or a more than magnificent insane asylum, but I do not think that the requirements of these young men should be gauged by any such comparison as that.

There are, or there are supposed to be, about 350 cadets there. The Secretary of the Navy has told us that if we are to construct a building for their accommodation of the same general character as Congress has already authorized, we can not do it for a smaller sum than is here proposed. The architect, after a careful estimate, has calculated the cost of this building to be what we have provided in this bill.

This building is to afford not only quarters for the cadets, strictly speaking, but it is to furnish, to some extent at least, accommodations for offices for the various officers in charge of the cadets. We are to have a large memorial hall—I admit not a specially common and unpretentious hall, but one of dignity and architectural attractiveness—a hall suitable for graduation exercises, for meetings of the alumni association, and other such purposes. There are to be dining rooms—and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], what I trust will not offend his sensibilities as to the proper requirements and needs of these young men—that there are to be bathrooms, and separate sleeping rooms, comfortable and suitable quarters for them in the prosecution of the work which we have marked out for them.

We have, I say, or are supposed to have, about three hundred and fifty-odd cadets down there, the same number as there are members of Congress here. I do not believe that I would speak wide of the mark, or would shock the equanimity of this body, or disturb the harmony of the spheres, if I should hazard the suggestion that these three hundred and fifty-odd cadets, the future commanders of the navies of the United States, are, in many respects, of as much importance to the country as this body of three hundred and fifty-odd members of Congress, many of us of fleeting and uncertain tenure of incumbency.

I admit that $6,000,000, which the gentleman from Illinois seems to think an adequate ultimate expenditure of money for the reconstruction of this institution, seems to be a magnificent sum, but it is insufficient for the needs of the Academy under present conditions.

Six millions was the original estimate for the completion of this project, but this was upon a basis of calculation which contemplated the construction of these buildings of brick.

The Secretary of the Navy, in the last Congress, asked permission to construct the buildings theretofore authorized of granite, and Congress granted the permission. We have constructed the armory and the boathouses, or we are now constructing them, of granite; and I submit to every fair-minded member of this body that it would be a pity and an anomaly that this building, the cadets' quarters, which is to lie between and to be connected by covered colonnades with the armory and the boathouse, to be the most commanding and attractive building of all, to be located in the most commanding spot, and having the finest outlook upon the bay of them all, should be of brick or wood or some cheaper structure, thereby destroying the harmony and symmetry in design and appearance of the group which, with the others named, it will form, and which is intended to be the most attractive and, I admit, the most expensive part of the whole Naval Academy.

I do not know that it is worth while for me to discuss this phase of this proposition any longer.

If you restrict this building to a smaller expenditure than that which we have provided, you must entirely rearrange your plans; you must employ other architects and begin the work anew. You must call a halt, stop the work, and postpone the completion of this great institution, which has been so long delayed by a spirit of petty parsimony, if I should not say, and I do not want to say, sectional jealousy and discrimination.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My friend speaks of altering plans. Is there a general plan——

Mr. MUDD. There is just this——

Mr. DOLLIVER (continuing). And if so, what is it?

Mr. MUDD. Well, I can not, of course, draw the plan.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Has a plan been drawn?

Mr. MUDD. Yes; I will say to the gentleman there has been a plan drawn. It was a plan prepared, I repeat, by what is known as the Matthews board, in 1896. I think perhaps I have the general outlines of it before me now. At the head of this board was Commodore Matthews, and another member of it was Captain Cooper, then the Superintendent of the Academy. They constructed a plan, to some extent a complete plan, and that is the plan in conformation to which, as far as we have authorized the Secretary to go, he has been acting in the construction of the buildings heretofore authorized and appropriated for.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, I will say to my friend that a gentleman who, I think, is not evil-disposed, has told me that these plans involve buildings costing $12,000,000 and that the architect's fees in drawing the plans are upward of $600,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That would be the customary 5 per cent for plans and supervision, whatever it may be.

Mr. MUDD. I think the gentleman who gave to my friend from Iowa the information to which he refers must have been evil-disposed, or else badly and sadly mistaken.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It struck me that it was a little voluptuous.

Mr. MUDD. Yes, if there were any truth in the statement. The estimate for the total reconstruction of the Academy, made by the Matthews board, was $6,000,000, from start to finish. I have the plans here now, and the gentleman can inspect them if he would like to do so.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, the chairman just showed me an estimate of over $8,000,000, and that does not cover furnishing or anything of that kind, and it was made at a time when prices of material and labor were at low tide, and I have no doubt that that estimate now, with the advance, would put the increase to $12,000,000.

Mr. MUDD. I will answer that, Mr. Chairman. That is about a fair sample of the statements that have been made about this Academy and in order to prejudice it before this House.

I repeat again, that the Matthews board made an estimate of $6,000,000. Now, it is calculated, however, and the Secretary of the Navy asks, that we shall build each and all of these buildings, which the Matthews board recommended and for which that board asked an expenditure of $6,000,000, of granite. If such shall be the material of their construction, it is calculated that the added cost for all of the buildings and of the granite required would make a total of $8,000,000.

I recall the gentleman's attention to the statement on page 67 of the published hearings, in which the architect gives it as his opinion that if the enhanced prices of material which prevail now should continue, according to his plan there would perhaps be an increase of $1,000,000, making $9,000,000; but we have right here, as I have heretofore said as specifically as I knew how to do it, already made a reduction from the face of that estimate of $1,036,000, because the Matthews board estimated and planned for these cadets' quarters an expenditure of $3,536,000, and we have limited that to $2,500,000; so that, even if we should provide for every building contemplated and construct every one of granite, even at the enhanced price of material which now prevails, which may or may not continue, we should be able to provide for them all within $8,000,000. That is the amount I have been contending for, that I shall continue to contend for, and shall be willing to have fixed as the limit of expenditure for this Academy in this bill.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That is for all of the buildings?

Mr. MUDD. All the buildings.

Mr. SOUTHARD. But your scheme involves an expenditure far beyond that.

Mr. MUDD. The scheme involves no such thing. A misrepresentation of facts in this matter should not be permitted to affect the action of this House. It involves an expenditure, at the topmost limit, if we shall construct every single building of the style that the Matthews board planned, of not more than $8,000,000, for we have reduced the cost of the cadets' quarters $1,036,000.

It seems to me that I have made this statement now with sufficient frequency of iteration, and fortified it with sufficient proof from the official hearings before the committee, to satisfy any one, even the most incredulous or the most hostile to this institution.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does it involve the reclaiming of the land from the sea and the bay, or the purchase of new land?

Mr. MUDD. All of that. All of the reclamation that we have provided for comes within this estimate, as the architect stated before the committee this year, as the plans here show.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MUDD. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. You say you have reduced the estimate for the cadets' quarters a million and a half.

Mr. MUDD. One million thirty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. DOLLIVER. How did you arrange that?

Mr. MUDD. Why, because the Secretary suggested that we should build for about 550 cadets. The Secretary, I apprehend, feels as most of us do, that the number of cadets will be largely increased in a few years; but upon the suggestion of our committee and the advice of the architect, it was concluded that we could provide a commodious and suitable building in conformity with the surroundings for $2,500,000, which would accommodate, I believe, 400 cadets or thereabout. That is the action of the committee, wherein we have reduced the cost of these quarters in the manner and to the extent that I have indicated.

The demands of the service require more cadets now. While we are putting up these buildings we may as well provide for the demands of the future that will come upon us in a very few years. I think the gentleman from Iowa will agree with me as to the wisdom of this course.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to stop the buildings now in progress, and if we are to alter the plans for the construction of those for which we are now providing, it is possible that we might confine ourselves within the limitations of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois; but I do not think we ought to handicap and to cripple, alter, and mutilate the plans of the Department as to the cadets' quarters, which will be, and ought to be, the chief and distinctive building of the whole Naval Academy.

The great arm of defense of our country in the years to come is to be, not the Army, but the Navy. The Navy will grow, and it ought to grow. The number of cadets, who are to be the officers of the days to come, will be increased. We shall have occasion for larger quarters. Not so with the Army. It is to be hoped that there will be no necessity for an appreciable increase in the size of the Army of the country; but there will be an enlargement of the Navy and the needs of the Navy, a gradual, progressive enlargement, that shall be responsive to the new conditions and the recent rapid growth and expansion of the country, and its entrance upon a new field of power and influence among the nations of the world.

If there is a criticism which I would make upon this bill, Mr. Chairman, it is not that in any branch of it it appropriates too much, but rather that it does not appropriate enough.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his hearing before the committee, said that but for the fact that he feared Congress might consider it too extravagant, he would have asked for three battle ships as well as for the twelve gunboats, I believe it was, which he had already asked and which were at first contemplated to be provided for by the committee.

Admiral Dewey stated that he would recommend the battle ships, and if need be, as an alternative to that, in the way of a compensating reduction, that he would lop off the provision for the gunboats, inasmuch as we had captured some gunboats from Spain in our recent war.

I would provide for both, sir, both battle ships and gunboats. I am in favor of giving both Secretary Long and Admiral Dewey everything that they want and recommend in the line of development of the Navy.

I would build up our Navy until it would be not simply the fourth in rank among those of the world, as was stated by the chairman of the committee yesterday, but until it should be the first of the navies of the nations of the world; and I would provide for it now, now that there is an adequacy of revenue in the Treasury, and now that the vim and vigor of national spirit, as engendered by the splendid termination and magnificent results of the Spanish war, look perhaps with greater favor and with broader patriotism than ever toward the upbuilding of the Navy and all that follows in the line of the commercial development of this country.

We have not given this Naval Academy all that I would provide, but it is fair to the committee to say that they have given substantially and almost precisely just what the board of naval officers who came before the committee have asked for and have stated could be profitably expended and utilized in the time intervening between now and the reassembling of Congress in December.

Were I to have my own way, and had I the power, I would, in this bill, authorize the Secretary of the Navy to enter at once upon a plan and to contract for a project for the total reconstruction and rebuilding of the Naval Academy, at a limit, I should say, of about $8,000,000, along the lines of the plan which he has already before him, with such modifications as he in his judgment might see fit to adopt.

I would build up this institution until it should become the finest of its kind in the world; and if it should be that the style and character of the buildings and the excellence of their architectural design and beauty should be for this age and country what the age of Pericles was for Athens and for Greece, I should feel that we would have acted in accordance with the dictates of a sound public policy, and in accordance with the desire, the sentiment, and the pride of the people of the country.

Perhaps I may be an enthusiast upon this matter, but I hope and believe that I would vote for as liberal appropriations for this institution if it were situated in some other State or some other district than my own.

I have no apology to make for the feeling which I have shown and the activity which I have manifested in this behalf. I am familiar with this institution. Our State is proud of it. I have spent some days of my life in the midst of its surroundings and made frequent visits there, and the spectacle which I have witnessed and admired there in what has seemed to me to be the most splendid exhibition of young and vigorous American manhood to be found in this country may perhaps have touched the tender side of my nature and impressed me deeply with the idea and the conviction that we ought to be not merely just but generous and liberal in the provisions which we shall make for the education of these young men and the appropriations for the upbuilding of this branch of our country's Navy.

One thing, at least, will have been settled, and settled forever, by the passage of this bill and the enactment thereby into law of the provisions which it makes for this Academy. There will be no further agitation of the old question which long lingered in the minds of the committees of former years as to the removal of this institution from Annapolis. It will be rebuilt, as it ought to be rebuilt, and will remain where it ought to remain, where it is today, on the banks of the Severn, on the Chesapeake Bay, in the State which has furnished its complement and contribution to recent naval history; in the State which gave to this country its Schley [applause], and yet has within its borders none of that spirit which would dim the glory of other heroes in that or other struggles of this country [applause]; in the section of the country known as the South, where, in conjunction and in sisterhood with the Military Academy, which rests upon the Hudson at the North—the one belonging to the Navy and the other to the Army—it will tend to represent and to typify the splendid unification of the sections of this land of ours, which was brought to its best and highest and happiest development through the outcome of the recent Spanish war, in which the graduates of this Academy, for whose upbuilding I here now plead, did more than all other men and all other agencies and instrumentalities to bring about a successful and brilliant conclusion for this country. [Applause.]

Trusts and Failures of the Republican Administration.

HON. WILLIAM H. KING, OF UTAH,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, May 31, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the bill (H. R. 10539) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890—

Mr. KING said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The American people are watching with great interest the conduct of this Administration. Its accession to power was accompanied by many promises its eulogists in lofty panegyrics proclaimed what mighty results would be accomplished by it. The day is far enough advanced to enable us to judge of its achievements and anticipate what the limited period of its existence will permit. Can anyone not blinded by partisan zeal view with satisfaction the record of this Republican Administration or defend the unconstitutional, un-American, vicious, and destructive policies advocated and followed by it? It has been false to the traditions of the past and the teachings of the fathers. It has been led by false lights and has abandoned the inspiration that made our country great in liberty and majestic in the strength and power of its people.

It has broken its solemn pledges, violated the Federal Constitution, and permitted organized combinations of wealth and illegal and corrupt monopolies and trusts to assault the national organic law, destroy private enterprises, cripple competition, and rob and despoil the great army of consumers. It has made of the Constitution a "rope of sand," and sought to convert a republic into an empire. It found a people and government resting securely upon the foundations laid by patriots who consecrated their work more than a century ago, and attempted their overthrow by secret machinations and defiant conspiracies. It entered upon its career with a homogeneous people, with an indissoluble union of indestructible States, bound in fraternal union; it approaches the close of its day with a heterogeneous population, and a government of colonies and dependencies and warring and unconquered provinces.

It is only necessary to direct a glance at the record of President McKinley's Administration to ascertain the radical departure made from the policies and principles held sacred for more than a century. That this departure is proof of political, if not moral decadence, no student of history can deny. The passing of the years do not change the forces or currents that bear humanity.

The present finds its counterpart in yesterday. Time deals in reproductions. There are the same uplifting forces to-day as yesterday; and the same enemies of civilization and order and peace and the triumph of eternal verities, that have stricken down the individual and overturned the state.

Mr. Speaker, I charge the Republican party with having perverted our institutions and robbed us of our high ideals. The American people loved peace; they believed that a republic founded upon free and sovereign States, and a people having the same high purposes, impelled by the same principles, and all so equal and free as to be units in the social and political organism, would meet unchanged the storms and revolutions, and remain as a refuge to the oppressed and a living example to struggling peoples everywhere.

Now we think of war and standing armies and mighty navies, of military glory and renown, of becoming a "world-power" and a participant in the unholy contests of greedy and unbridled nations.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party is utterly indifferent to the cries of the masses. Every centralizing tendency, whether of wealth or power, finds its proponent and faithful coadjutor in the Republican party.

In every government there is a constant warfare to maintain a proper equipoise between the individual and the state. Democracy has struggled to preserve inviolably the sacred rights of individual liberty. It gave to this nation and its people political and civil liberty. It is now engaged in a titanic contest to preserve the industrial liberties of the people. What matters it if men have the crown of political and civil liberty if they dwell in industrial servitude?

To be told that one is free, that he is, in theory at least, the political equal of every other unit in the political or national organism, and yet to be condemned to social degradation and industrial bondage, is supreme irony and mockery, and adds to the bitterness of intolerable environments. Great wealth is being massed in few hands. Gigantic corporations control the channels of trade and the sources of wealth. This is an age of "bigness." Man is overshadowed and forgotten. Wealth is apotheosized. Individuals are lost in the vortex of power. The principles of justice, of equality, the question of right, of morals, these are regarded as too abstract and academic for consideration and too unreal and impracticable for rigid or literal enforcement. The light of the millionaire is obscured in the blazing effulgence of the billionaire. The speculator, the stock jobber, the wrecker of small fortunes and builder of stupendous ones, looks from dizzy heights upon struggling mortality below and accepts the servile flattery of some, while he remorselessly crushes all impediments to additional conquests.

The law of association is forgotten; the interdependence of man is ignored. It is forgotten that all the world is linked together, and that it should be, in fraternal power. To divide it, to dissever humanity by artificial and arbitrary and tyrannous conditions, is a sin the enormity of which is scarcely apprehended.

"An injury to one is the concern of all" is the motto of the Knights of Labor. Apart from the altruism involved in this motto, it announces a living truth, which lies at the basis of society. When governments are used as vehicles for the aggrandizement of those who control them, and the changeless and sweeping laws of trade are interrupted so that all the system does not receive their enriching influence, injury inevitably follows.

Providence has so organized and environed humanity that, when the least of His creatures suffers, retribution falls upon all. A truth promulgated advances all; an error accepted, though by a few, detracts from the moral reservoir of all. If one suffers in his liberty, in his right to earn a competency, in life, or the pursuit of happiness, directly and not remotely, all are harmed.

"As nations can not be rewarded or punished in the next world, they must be in this. By an immutable chain of causes and effects, Providence punishes national sins by national calamities." It is a national sin to deprive the people of power which is theirs. When the humblest is robbed, congestion results in some other place. Aside from the physical wrong, if such a distinction is permissible, resulting from taking power or rights or liberty from another, there is a moral wrong. The continuance of such wrongs produces a moral degeneracy which is a sure precursor to national decadence, if not destruction.

The application of unjust laws, the exercise of unrighteous authority, create unnatural conditions, which result in class distinctions, unequal conditions in society, combinations that illegally and corruptly enrich a few and pauperize many. Such combinations then seize power to perpetuate the evil system by them established and protect the wealth criminally acquired. Then follows the impulse for new markets in which to invest their illegal exactions; and so the appetite for criminal aggression is formed and the desire for colonial conquest arises.

It is a natural evolution. Then imperialism follows. With it comes the demand as well as necessity for standing armies and naval armaments. The tramp of soldiers, the sound of shot and shell, the cries of the distressed, are sweeter than the hum of industry and the grateful songs of a prosperous, God-fearing people.

Mr. Speaker, there is an infection in the air. People are intoxicated over the dreams of military splendor and renown. The simplicity of a republic is not as beautiful as the ostentation of empire. The rugged virtues of our fathers, their earnest, sincere lives, fail to find approval when measured by the superficial and volatile standard so much to be seen in our day. Jingoism finds an echo in imperialistic policies, and we are more interested in "seizing slices of the globe and glozing it over with religious posturings" than upholding the fundamental principles of the Republic.

By questionable, if not unconstitutional, legislation the Federal Government has become all powerful. Its shadow dominates the States and affrights the people. Under the legislation of the Republican party, paternalism has grown, the autonomy of the States interfered with, and the sovereignty of the individual assailed.

The Constitution has been violated and one of the money metals robbed of its high functions. The sovereign power to control the currency has been abdicated and a money trust has been organized.

Extravagance and profligacy followed the intrusion of this unwholesome spirit into our national life.

When the Government is regarded as the repository of all power, it is then seized upon and its authority prostituted to make a favored few the beneficiaries of usurped power. An eminent Senator has denied in effect that this is a Government of delegated powers, contending that "the sovereign power is in the Government" and not the people.

Under this view, there are no limitations upon the Federal Government. Impelled by this spirit, war taxes are continued and riotous extravagance in the Government prevails, the Chief Executive governs territory regardless of the Constitution, and wages war and seeks to conquer remote lands without constitutional warrant.

At the close of the fiscal year 1895 the United States owed $901,672,966.74, but at the close of the fiscal year 1899 our national obligations amounted to $1,155,320,235.19. There was a per capita increase of indebtedness of $2.27. During the fiscal year 1895 $390,373,202, or $5.69 per capita, was collected from the people; while in 1899, $610,982,004, or a per capita tax collected of $8.04.

In 1790 the per capita tax for all national expenses was 91 cents. In 1830, under Jackson, our national expenditures amounted to but $24,385,281, or $1.90 per capita, and at the close of Buchanan's Administration there had been no material increase.

In the year 1899 it cost the people of the United States more than $9 per capita to meet the expenses of the National Government. The expenditures of 1899 were $894,006,489.64 and for the fiscal year of 1900 $738,855,248.78, with millions yet to be added. In 1895 the expenditures for the War Department were $53,898,370; Navy Department, $29,208,069, and State Department $1,188,046. In 1899 the expenditures for these departments, respectively, were: War, $232,395,365; Navy, $64,354,735; State, $22,871,614. The tide of militarism is rising, and, departing from the paths of peace and safety, we are launching upon a sea of unrest and danger. Already we excite the animosities of monarchical nations, and foreign entanglements must result. Our standing army has been quadrupled and the demand is for a still greater increase. Mr. Edward Thery places the cost of the European war establishments at $900,000,000 annually. Three million one hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and thirty men were in the armies of Europe in 1897.

Mr. Speaker, the party in power in this Government is responsible for these reckless, un-American, unconstitutional, unrepublican policies now guiding us. It is time that the American people called a halt and threw from power those who are hastening our Republic toward Charybdis or Scylla. But, Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose in rising to discuss imperialism and the evils attending it. I purposed addressing myself mainly to the attitude of the Republican party upon the question of trusts and monopolies, and particularly its relation to the proposed constitutional amendment now under consideration.

A national election is at hand. The party in power, realizing its many delinquencies and cognizant (without contrition) of its betrayal of the people, is now engaged in the unsatisfactory effort of attempting to convince the people of its friendship for them. It is vastly amusing to witness the gyrations and smirks and smiles of those who for three years have been in power, without making the slightest effort to regulate or control or prohibit trusts and criminal combinations in restraint of trade, as they vainly profess abhorrence of such combinations and such sincere, disinterested and affectionate regard for the "people."

Do gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber imagine that the people of this country can longer be duped by the professions of friendship toward them on the part of the Republican party? The Republican party is not, nor has it ever been, the friend of labor. It favored the importation of pauper labor to compete in the markets of this country with the American workingman. Under the domination of its present leaders it exalts the dollar and attempts to debase the man. It refuses to prevent criminal combinations of capital, but attempts to crush out the organizations of the laborer. The power of the Federal courts is not invoked to destroy trusts, but the machinery of the law and Federal troops are employed to overthrow the associations of laborers.

The people know that since the passage of the Dingley tariff law and under the Republican Administration more than 400 trusts and combinations have been formed, with an aggregate capital of more than $8,000,000,000. Neither do they forget that though the Republican party has had control of all branches of the Government for more than three years it has made no law nor made the slightest effort to prevent the formation of these unlawful and harmful organizations. Though there is a Federal statute which, if strictly enforced, would drive many trusts out of existence and reduce to a minimum the outrages and exactions committed by them, the Administration has refused to execute it and has loudly cried for condonation of its course by juggling explanations and windy lamentations over the alleged impotency of the law. In an editorial in the American Law Review for March-April, 1900, this aspect of the Administration's derelictions is discussed, as follows:

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL ON TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

On the day following that on which the Supreme Court of the United States rendered its decision affirming the court of appeals for the Sixth circuit in the Addystone Pipe Company case Attorney-General Griggs sent his annual report to Congress, reviewing the work of the Department of Justice during the year 1899. He says that application is occasionally made to the Department to have legal proceedings brought in the name of the United States against corporations or combinations of companies that are alleged to be engaged in forming or maintaining monopolies or agreements in restraint of trade. He ought to have added that such applications have been frequently made in perfectly plain cases, by distinguished persons, both to him and to his predecessor, Judge McKenna, and that the letters in which they were made were not even answered.

"Such actions," the Attorney-General says, "can be maintained only when the offense comes within the scope of the Federal statute. The only Federal legislation against combinations in restraint of trade is contained in the so-called Sherman Act of July 2, 1890.

"It will be observed that this statute is directed only at combinations or monopolies in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. It does not pretend to go into other branches of business or commerce, or attempt in any way to interfere with those transactions which are carried on exclusively within the confines of a State, or which do not amount to what, under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, is understood by the term 'interstate commerce.'

"The Federal Government has no constitutional right to supervise, direct, or interfere with the transaction of ordinary business by the people of the several States, unless such business relates directly, and not incidentally, to interstate commerce; and such has been the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States."

The Attorney-General discusses this subject at some length, quoting freely from the decisions of the courts sustaining his position. In conclusion he says:

"In all cases where the facts presented to the Attorney-General were capable of legal proof and have established satisfactorily such an agreement or combination in restraint of interstate commerce as is contemplated by the Sherman Act, legal proceedings have been taken by him in the name of the United States either to dissolve the combination or to punish the offenders by indictment."

The last paragraph of the Attorney-General's report we take leave to qualify. We know the contrary to be the fact, so far as his predecessor was concerned in an important case and in the same case so far as he is concerned. When the office was held by Judge McKenna, Hon. Nathan Frank, who was personally acquainted with the Attorney-General and who had served with him on at least one committee in Congress, wrote to him requesting him to instruct the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Missouri to bring a proceeding in equity under the act of Congress of 1890, known as the Sherman anti-trust law, to restrain the Associated Press from maintaining its monopolistic feature, whereby its so-called "local board"—that is to say, the proprietors of newspapers whom it served in any particular town—could exclude any other newspaper from receiving its service, even by the dissent of a single one of them. This letter was never answered. Subsequently Hon. Frank Bartlett, counsel for the Sun Printing and Publishing Association, the publisher of the New York Sun, made a similar application to the present Attorney-General, and his letter was never answered.

The State of New Jersey, be it said to her shame, has invited the organization of these illegal combinations under her laws. Yet to that State the President goes to select an Attorny-General, and upon the latter devolves the duty of enforcing the anti-trust law of 1890. It is universally admitted that the trusts contributed millions of dollars to Mr. HANNA, which was used by the Republican party in the last national campaign. I have heard it stated on the floor of this House what amounts were paid by various corporations and there has been no denial. For what purpose were these millions paid? Can it be that the hope of immunity from prosecution was held out to the trust magnates? It is unnecessary to say that they are not philanthropists; that the contributions were not for charitable purposes. But passing over the reason of the gift, we discover that the administration of the law is intrusted to a distinguished gentleman who does not enforce it. While I frankly admit that the present law is too restricted to meet all emergencies, yet a faithful execution of its provisions will result in incalculable benefit to the people.

But the Republican party is the friend of trusts. It breeds them, and they feed and fatten upon its policies. Republicanism centralizes and congests power. Trusts are congestions of capital. They are combinations to restrain competition among producers; to crush and destroy the honest manufacturer and producer as well as vender, and to secure control of the armies of production and wealth. They destroy individualism. They are a "sordid despotism," that leaves sorrow and distress in its wake. The chairman of the national Republican party recently stated that there were no trusts. Later he declared that if they did exist, some were good trusts, and that in any event the Republican party would take care of them. That the latter part of his statement is true is evidenced by the fact that most all the trusts in this country have been organized within the past three years under Republican misrule. All are thrifty, and private competition is being destroyed and individual enterprise stifled.

That the Republican party is friendly to the trusts is further demonstrated by the fact that no trust is protesting against this proposed constitutional amendment offered by the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee. They regard it, as it is, as a delusion and a sham; as an effort to induce the people to support the Republican party in the coming campaign. The efforts of Republican politicians to convince the people that no trusts exist having proven futile; they now assume the heroic, and pose as the great and only trust-destroyers. Carnegie stated, "There is no possibility of maintaining a trust. The public may regard trusts or combinations with serene confidence." Doubtless many will have no difficulty in believing that Mr. Carnegie, whose profits last year from the steel-trust were perhaps $25,000,000, regards trusts with perfectly "serene confidence."

It is a significant fact that the Republican party found no evils in illegal combinations and trusts when it promulgated its platform of 1896. This is a most remarkable omission for a party that now pretends to be the foe of criminal combinations. I think the answer is found in the fact that to win the election unlimited wealth was required, the payment of which was promised by the trusts and the great corporations. The Democratic platform contained a ringing, emphatic declaration against the menace of capitalistic combinations, and the Democratic party stands ready to supplement present legislation by such as will protect the people against combinations of capital organized to prevent competition and to work serious evils to the masses. That organizations of capital into trusts are harmful and dangerous to society is almost universally recognized. The marvelous growth of trusts, the tremendous power they exercise, have aroused the people, who demand their suppression. So earnest are the people upon this matter that President McKinley directed the attention of Congress to the matter in his annual message December 5, 1899, in these words:

> Combinations of capital organized into trusts to control the conditions of trade among our citizens, to stifle competition, limit production, and determine the prices of products used and consumed by the people are justly provoking public discussions, and should early claim the attention of Congress. It is universally conceded that combinations which engross or control the market of any particular kind of merchandise, or commodity necessary to the general community, by suppressing natural and ordinary competition, whereby prices are unduly enhanced to the general consumer, are obnoxious, not only to the common law, but also to the public welfare. There must be a remedy for the evils involved in such organizations.

Notwithstanding this apparently earnest appeal for the suppression of the denounced organizations, nothing has been done by the party in power looking to the consummation of this desirable work. Of course I must except the labors of the House Judiciary Committee, now before us for consideration. But we challenge the good faith of the Republican party whenever its representatives approach this question. F. S. Monnett, the faithful attorney-general of Ohio, was refused a renomination by the Republican party because he endeavored to execute the law against the Standard Oil trust. Through the New York Journal, he says:

The Standard Oil trust has for eight years defied the supreme court of Ohio, and yet without punishment. A Republican legislature in Ohio deliberately voted down every anti-trust resolution offered this winter at the dictation of the bosses at Washington and the trust magnates of New York.

In a recent interview, the same gentleman expresses himself, in reference to the Republican party and its attitude toward trusts, in the following language:

I do not see how the Republican party can escape punishment this fall. The platform of the Republican party in Ohio strongly condemns the trusts and their unlawful methods. I was elected as attorney-general of Ohio on such a platform, and as the officer of the State and the representative of the party I carried out as best I could the paltform of the party. Yet I was not supported in this by many of the leaders, and the party organs criticised me for doing just what the platform of my party pledged me to do. Newspapers of the State, about 110 of them, printed paid articles criticising my actions, and they, too, party newspapers.

This is not all. The legislature which has just adjourned killed the Russell bill and the maximum freight bill, and that too by almost a strict party vote. Will not the people punish the party for such actions upon the part of its servants? The party, as such, is not in sympathy with such methods. Although the Russell bill was bill No. 10, it was side-tracked by the trust lobbyists and held back until near the adjournment, and then over the protest of some of the best men of the party, and almost all of the Democratic members, it was defeated. This was a repudiation of the party platform and the sentiment of the party. I can not believe that we will escape punishment, and I believe it will come this fall. Why should not the party be punished when the men who control its actions disregard the will of the people?

What shall be done with this growing evil? This should be no partisan question. It has ceased to be exclusively an economic question, and finds a prominent place in our political discussions, and requires legislative consideration. It can not be settled by demagogic appeals or by anathematizing the trusts and their promotors. Property rights are involved and the interests of all are concerned. We must consider the subject in the light of modern industrial development and the mighty changes that have been wrought during the last fifty years.

This century has witnessed the accomplishment of many economic wonders, chief of which are the inventions of labor-saving machinery, greatly multiplying the efficiency of labor in every art and trade; the application of steam power and electricity to the propulsion of that machinery; and the building of the vast net of railroads over all civilized countries, thus affording a rapid, safe, and reasonably cheap means of transporting the product of man's labor to almost every land and clime. This has aided the consolidations in business which now exist. The small shop yielded to the larger one, and that was displaced by the factory, and the factory was swallowed up in the maelstrom of combination. Competition was fierce between individuals, improved articles resulted, and prices were lowered to the consumer.

As an economic question, we first see man engaged in producing what he consumes; then as he advances in civilization, a division of labor ensues. One tills the ground, and another follows the chase, while still another manufactures the rude implements of husbandry, or the weapons used in war or field. Exchange and trade follow; the buyer and the seller then appear, and the prices of commodities are fixed; manufacturing increases; commerce expands. The net result is that competition stimulates activity, improves the production, and develops newer and improved methods of production, and cheapens prices.

To check this competition and control prices, to secure absolute control of commodities in the markets, and thus determine who shall be buyers as well as sellers, and what the former shall pay, is the object of the monopoly or trust, which in so sinister a form is attacking the peace and prosperity of the people to-day.

Many writers regard trusts as rapacious monopolies which annihilate the individual and by their exploitations breed discontent and socialism.

Judge Cooley, in an article in Belford's Magazine, June, 1888, uses this strong language:

They—

trusts—

are things to be feared. They antagonize a leading and most valuable principle of industrial life, and in their attempt to curb competition bring it under strict control. And when we witness the heartless manner in which some trusts have closed manufactories, and turned men, willing to be industrious, into the street, in order that they may increase profits already reasonably large, we can not help asking ourselves whether the trust, as we see it, is not a public enemy; whether it is not teaching the laborers dangerous lessons; whether it is not helping to breed anarchy.

Gen. Roger A. Pryor, before the New York State committee, announces some of the arguments against trusts, as follows:

1. Competition between buyers of the raw material enhances the price to the producer.
2. Competition between sellers of the manufactured article reduces its price to the consumer.
3. Reduction of price multiplies the number of consumers.
4. Increase of consumption stimulates production to supply the increased demand.
5. Increase of production implies an increase in the employment of labor.
6. Competition between employees of labor enhances the wages of laborers.
7. Enhancement of wages of laborers involves the material and moral amelioration of the condition of the laboring class.
8. Competition to sell stimulates to improvement in the quality of the article offered.
9. Competition to sell urging reduction in the cost of the article, ingenuity is quickened to the invention of expense—labor—saving machinery, and so a stimulus is applied to the progress of the useful arts and sciences. In short, competition ministers to the welfare of all classes of the community, and augments the resources and power of the state. But the evil of excessive competition is counteracted and arrested by the principle of self-interest and the operation of the law of supply and demand. On the other hand, all these salutary results are arrested and prevented.
(1) There being but a single buyer of the same material, he dictates to the producer what price he pleases.
(2) There being but a single seller of the finished article, he extorts from the consumer an exorbitant price.
(3) The increased price to the consumer diminishes the number of consumers and restricts consumption.
(4) Diminished consumption necessitates diminished production.
(5) Diminished production diminishes the employment of labor.
(6) There being but a single employer of labor, he hires it at his own reduced price.
(7) Monopolizing the market and assured of a sale in any event, the seller has no motive to increase production, but, on the contrary, is urged by interest to save the expense of, to him, unnecessary production, and so takes factories in the combine for the purpose only of dismantling them and stopping them.

In one word, monopoly despoils and oppresses all classes of the community and despoils and impoverishes the state.

But the political effects of the monopoly are even more menacing than its economic results, as is illustrated by the impressive warning of the late Judge David Davis. Great corporations and consolidated monopolies are fast seizing the avenues of power that lead to the control of the Government. It is an open secret that they rule States through procured legislation and corrupted courts, that they are strong in Congress, and that they are unscrupulous in the use of means to conquer prejudice and to acquire influence. This condition of things is truly alarming, for unless it be changed quickly and thoroughly, free institutions are doomed to be subverted by an oligarchy resting upon a basis of money and corporate power.

While the foregoing view of the results of trusts may be colored, there is much in the industrial conditions prevailing to warrant it. It is not a sufficient answer to say that trusts are the results of natural development and economic evolution. I grant that some combinations or trusts grew out of fierce competition, which made the enterprises in which they were engaged unprofitable. That large contributions of capital are the new order of things, may be believed; that a return to conditions of small business and limited capitalization is improbable, I think will be admitted by all. The desire of all should be to promote legitimate business, stimulate activity in every industrial department, impose no barrier or restriction to honest toil or proper investment. All evils can not be cured by legislation. Arbitrary governmental interference destroys enterprise, hampers trade, lowers wages, and produces stagnation, with the resultants of diminished rewards of labor and increased sorrow and distress.

Many of the new school of economists regard the present movements of capital toward consolidation and union in great undertakings as unavoidable, and the necessary outgrowth of organic development.

Even President Andrews, Professor Jenkes, and Mr. George Gunton "approve of the tendency toward organization, which they believe to be necessary, but they think that control and protection against the frequent abuses of combinations are badly needed." Van Halle (trusts), 118.

Upon the statement of Stephenson that "when combination is possible, competition becomes impossible," President Andrews, fifty years later, was led to observe that "the day of competition has set. Law or no law, capital will henceforth march in phalanxes."

Our country while it was purely agricultural was not confronted with this momentous question. But as manufacturing was entered upon and railroads were constructed, the opportunities for combinations of capital multiplied, and the advantages to those concerned became apparent. As early as 1882 Rockefeller obtained control of the oil trade and organized the Standard Oil trust. Other combinations followed, spreading ruin and devastation. The idea stated by Professor Ely that "production on the largest possible scale will be the only practical mode of production in the near future" was accepted as the rule of business and financial activity, and a relentless warfare was waged against the small dealer. As this mighty Juggernaut advanced it crushed helpless victims.

The small manufacturer, producer, and dealer, whether buyer or seller, was bankrupted; the country factory, giving employment to a score of people, was dismantled; the independent, prosperous owner was compelled to yield to the rapacity and ruthless oppression of the monopoly. The combination triumphed; the employers became employees; the country poured its population into the cities; monopolies flourished; stock gambling, wild and hazardous speculation, predatory financial and operating schemes, and an unwholesome congestion of wealth replaced legitimate enterprise, honest, conservative business, and a harmonious development of all the interests of the people.

To restrain this growing power, a strong sentiment set in against the physiocratic principles which had prevailed. The belief that the Government ought not to interfere with the business enterprises of individuals, when acting in a corporate capacity or otherwise, underwent modification. The doctrine of laissez-faire (that the government should confine itself to the prevention of violence and crime, and the maintenance of its honor and integrity, leaving the industries of the country to develop according to natural law) was assailed and attacked with a determination which presaged at least a different application of its spirit, if not a modification of its principles, in the affairs of life.

It was contended that though the Constitution aimed at securing equal personal rights to all, and the prohibition by the Government of national interference in private and individual concerns, yet when through monopolies and combinations competition was destroyed, private enterprise hindered if not prevented, and the control of the commodities of life compassed by a few, then the personal rights of the many were assailed and the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness arrested; and the interposition by the Government for their protection is not only proper but imperative, under the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

In 1885 Congress yielded to the demands of the people, abandoned the attitude of noninterference, and after two years of consideration passed the interstate-commerce law, which prohibited discriminating rates among railroads.

In 1890 the Sherman anti-trust law was passed. While this law has many imperfections and fails to reach manifold evils existing, still it is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace combinations engaged in interstate business. Though importuned to enforce its provisions, this Administration has declined. Evidence of a conclusive character has been furnished the Attorney-General of the United States as to the existence of criminal combinations in restraint of trade, which were daily violating the provisions of this law, yet a Republican Administration refused to prosecute. Its conduct upon this point is indefensible and justifies the charges that it is in league with the trusts and is sheltering them under its protecting mantle.

If the law is inadequate to suppress the trusts, as the Attorney-General claims, why has it not been amended? If it needed emendation, this fact was known when President McKinley convened Congress in special session in March, 1897. There was no suggestion by the President or the Republicans in Congress that legislation should be enacted against the trusts, although their operations were becoming stupendous and their power oppressive. It is admitted on this side of the Chamber that the present law is imperfect, that it does not reach many of the illegal combinations and monopolies, but we are ready to join hands with those on the other side, and exhaust the full authority of the Federal Government in legislating upon this serious and perplexing problem.

We know that gentlemen on the other side are insincere in pretending to desire anti-trust legislation; that this sudden spasm results from a desire to "fool" the people, and by this coup de théâtre and play of virtue to secure a vote of confidence. This is apparent from the fact that notwithstanding the marvelous growth of trusts during the past three years, together with the bold and menacing attitude assumed by criminal monopolies, neither the Administration nor a Republican Congress (until within the past few days) has presented any measure for their suppression or to strengthen existing law.

It is also conclusively proven by the fact that the constiiutional amendment now proposed is unnecessary, is such a monstrosity as to provoke dissent from every student of our Constitution and the history of our Government, and can not be ingrafted upon our organic law. The party in power has had time to pass an infamous tariff law, filled with discriminations against the people, and which fixed such prohibitive rates as to surrender to trusts and monopolies the absolute control of the home market, as a result of which billions of dollars of capital were marshaled and formed into a destructive oligarchy to further magnify the few and enslave the many.

Foreign competition being thus prevented and the primacy of the trusts being thus secured, the work of spoliation and ruin was vigorously prosecuted. The small dealers were devoured, local competition destroyed, the flags of honest commerce driven from the sea and the flags of the freebooters were flung to the breezes, while "Republicanism and Robbery" were acclaimed. Republicans have had time enough to pass a law for the further bonding of this nation, and under its terms $200,000,000 of bonds were issued. They have had ample time to pass a war-revenue law by which millions of dollars more of taxes are annually wrung from the people; but they have found no time to repeal it or relieve the people from its intolerable burdens.

They found that the days were sufficiently numerous to permit the formation of trusts, the illegal monopoly by them of the commodities and necessaries of life, the destruction of private enterprise and honest competition, the conspiracy to raise prices, and increase the dividends paid to trust magnates; but the days and months and years have been too short to permit expressions of regret for the victims whose name is legion, or to admit of any effort to throttle or restrain these criminal combinations in their infamous work. They have found time to turn the law against labor organizations, but not against labor destroyers.

Nor have they experienced difficulty in taxing the poor; but when the Democrats in the Fifty-fifth Congress urged an income tax, they flew to the protection of wealth.

Tyrannous in the exercise of the taxing power, they have been prodigal in the expenditure of the people's money, unjustly taken from them. Not satisfied with plunder at home, they have sought exploitation abroad. They have held and still hold Cuba, as Rome held Britain, if we are to believe Tacitus, as a rich pasture in which Administration heelers and politicians may satiate their rapacity. They have had the time, as well as the inclination, to send such precious scoundrels as Neely and Rathbone to Cuba, as well as hordes of Administration minions and carpetbaggers, who are to instruct the ignorant, barbarian people of that island in the purity of our motives and the disinterestedness of our efforts, as well as the essentials of self-government.

There is time, too, to allow the Executive to govern by military power for years, a "foreign country," and to become the evangel of the new doctrine that he is above and beyond the Constitution, outside of its limitations, and independent of Congress or the people; but there is no time to withdraw our troops, or subordinate the military to the civil power, or redeem our pledges, or recognize Cuba as belonging to the Cubans, or practice honesty toward them, or economy in the use of their money, or to observe constitutional limitations in our conduct toward that island.

This administration has had ample time to attempt the destruction of the Monroe doctrine; to enter into a treaty with Great Britain (the Hay-Pauncefote treaty), by which the latter's right to participate in the canal to be constructed and have a voice in the affairs of this hemisphere are recognized; to agree that the canal when constructed shall not be employed to defend this Government and its people, though constructed and paid for by it, but that it shall be completely neutralized; to court a rapprochement with Great Britain, and promote foreign entangling alliances; to view with complacency the Tory policy of England which starves millions in India and overthrows republics in South Africa; to surrender the fiscal affairs of the Government to the bankers and money-changers of Wall Street and Europe, and write upon the statute book of our country such measures as were prepared by them; to wage a bitter warfare against silver, though promising to labor for international bimetallism, and at last to compass its defeat; to pass the most infamous currency bill ever devised, under the operation of which the gold standard is fixed upon the people, the issue of currency by the Government prohibited, and the retirement of the greenbacks, silver certificates, etc., now outstanding accomplished; and to abdicate the sovereign power of the Government to control the issue of money, in favor of private persons and moneyed corporations.

The Republicans have proven beyond question their friendship for trusts and their hostility to the people by legislating to destroy one-half of our standard money, thus increasing the purchasing power of the residue. This results in advancing the value of the dollar, measured by toil and the results of labor, to the great advantage of the rich and the creditors and the impoverishment of the poor and the debtors.

This Republican Congress has organized the most gigantic trust the world has ever witnessed. By striking down one-half of our metallic money, the gold being controlled by the creditor class, and yielding supreme power to private banks to determine the volume of paper money in circulation, to expand or contract the quantity at pleasure, it has created a money trust compared to which all other trusts are Lilliputians, and before which States, nations, and monarchies must do obeisance.

During the campaign of 1896 the Republican party masqueraded in silver attire and pretended to favor its remonetization. When invested with power it threw off all disguise, confessed its hypocrisy and fraudulent pretenses, and, with premeditation, planned the destruction of silver, recking naught of its past promises or the wishes of the people.

To obtain favor with the friends of civil-service reform it professed attachment to the present civil-service law and promised important extensions in its operations, but when clothed with power it violated every promise and profession, and with a brazenness and disregard for law and decency that is without parallel it foisted into position incompetent place hunters and pestiferous, scurvy party workers, whose services demanded that they should feed upon the public.

When the war with Spain was in progress officers and men of experience and character were ignored and commissions were distributed to the "sons of someone" as political rewards. In the War Department chaos and incompetency were supreme and extravagance and recklessness prevailed. "Canned beef and Algerism," incapacity and insubordination, jobbery and wastefulness to the point of criminality characterized this period of the Republican Administration. If these were blunders, what can be said of the Philippine policy? There is not one bright spot to be found. We discover 8,000,000 of Asiatics, in a tropical clime, thousands of miles from our shore, differing in everything, unassimilable. War is declared against Spain for "humanity's sake," to free the Cubans from unbearable tyranny and unspeakable cruelties, and is then prosecuted against the inhabitants of the Philippine Archipelago (who have struggled intermittently for more than a century, as Cuba did, against the same tyrannies and the same cruel master) by this country, that was a "liberator."

Though they possessed at least a de facto government, which preserved peace and protected life and property, and though the power of Spain was broken, and the impossibility of Spain's supremacy ever again being established or restored was recognized and known by this Administration, yet it deliberately planned the purchase of the Philippine Islands and the subjugation of their people.

The lives of nearly 2,000 American boys have been sacrificed; millions of dollars have been spent, and the end is not yet. The revolution had been so successful in the Philippines that when the treaty of Paris was negotiated Spain had no soverignty over or property in them. The islands, except a few fortified cities, were held by the forces of Aguinaldo and were lost to Spain. And yet the Republican Administration paid $20,000,000 for a people that had won their independence.

When Mr. McKinley was inaugurated revolution was devastating the island of Cuba and spreading death and destruction among her people. The revolutionary forces had made such progress as to entitle them to belligerent rights at the hands of this Republic. The American people, with remarkable unanimity, insisted that the President accord to the Cuban people the rights of belligerents, contending that if such were done the latter would soon secure their independence, and that without any interposition on our part.

The bondholders and other influences prevented the adoption of this course. The sickening struggle continued until at last the force of public sentiment drove the Administration to act, and war with Spain resulted. It would have been avoided if the course suggested had been pursued.

Not satisfied in rescuing Cuba from Spanish control and obtaining fair indemnity from the defeated nation, the Administration found time and determined to enter upon a scheme of conquest and colonial development. The madness of empire was in its blood, and the dream of military greatness lured it from the path of safety.

The statement of President McKinley was soon forgotten: "The war with Spain was undertaken not that the United States should increase her territory, but that the oppression at our door should be stopped. This noble sentiment must continue to animate us, and we must give to the world a full demonstration of the sincerity of our purpose." This high-sounding declaration is conspicuous, because it evidences the great gulf between promises and fulfillment.

Though we declared at the time Spain was required to recognize the independence of Cuba that the Government "disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof," and also asserted a determination, "when that is accomplished, to leave the control of the island to its people," our course toward the Cuban people is such as to cause them to question the sincerity and good faith in the occupation of the island. Indeed in many quarters of our country it is boldly said that we will never relinquish Cuba.

There seems to be no intention upon the part of the Administration to carry out the solemn pledge given to the world. The regulations being enforced in Cuba, and the whole bearing of this Government, would rather indicate a purpose to permanently retain control of the island and its people. Cuba is pacified, and yet our armies are quartered there and American soldiers and officers enact and execute the law. We began a war for the liberation of the Cubans and the independence of their island, and have so far progressed that we subject her people to military rule, and by peculations and scandals and frauds provoke the contempt, if not hatred, of the Cubans, and the derision of enlightened nations. We have also been so successful in this humane policy that we take death and destruction to the Philippines, overturn their government, fill their islands with thousands of armed men, and their harbors with fleets that bear destruction on their wings.

The Filipinos fought for freedom against Spain, and we deny their aspirations, denouncing them as barbarians and fit subjects for republican colonial experimentation. But, Mr. Speaker, the Republicans, while not having time to legislate against trusts or execute the present law for their suppression, found time to make a most deadly assault upon the Constitution, and to announce to the Filipinos and the inhabitants of the desolate and sorrowing isle of Porto Rico that the Constitution had no application to them; that it was not the palladium of their rights, nor did it give them shelter when the blasts of oppressive legislation fiercely assailed them; that they could be held by the United States, but not be a part of them; that they were to be governed by this nation, but not to be a portion of it; that the flag must float, but only as a symbol of power and not of freedom; that the Constitution was a mere dead, inanimate thing, which could be vitalized only when touched by the omnipotent hand of Congress, and being so much less than the legislative branch of the Government created by it, it had force and efficacy only when that branch willed; that the right of trial by jury, freedom of speech and thought and press, the right to religious liberty, and to a participation in the affairs of government, including the right of representation, were not to be guaranteed to them, and were not to be their heritage.

This unconstitutional, un-American, un-Republican, un-Democratic, and infamous doctrine is the creation of the Republican party of to-day. It is supported by the trusts, buttressed by Mr. HANNA and the legions marshaled by him, and finds support in the mercenary, brutal, unholy, grasping, sordid commercialism of the hour. The question of expansion is not involved; the issue can not be concealed; it is whether this Republic will survive or perish.

The Constitution of the United States does not permit this Government to acquire territories and peoples to be held as subjects and vassals. It does not authorize wars of conquest. The Republic is a union of States, and our organic law contemplates that all territory shall be carved into States and all the inhabitants of the same shall be citizens of such States and of the United States. This view is entertained by the Supreme Court of the United States, as shown by the following language:

> There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given, and if a new State is admitted, it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative rights and powers and duties of the State and citizens of the State and Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire a new territory to be held and governed permanently in that character.
> And, indeed, the power exercised by Congress to acquire territory and establish a government there according to its own unlimited discretion was viewed with great jealousy by the leading statesmen of the day. * * *
> We do not mean to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of new territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

Justice McLean said:

> In organizing the government of a Territory, Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit, so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

The true theory of our Government is that the Constitution is supreme, and that Congress possesses only such authority as is expressly conferred by the Constitution; and that the encircling arms of the Constitution are found protecting wherever the flag of the Republic floats. But this sacred and, as was always supposed, impregnable doctrine has been challenged by the Administration. It has found time to attempt the overthrow of constitutional government.

The "privileged classes," the "rich and well-born," the trusts and mighty combinations of wealth see beauties in the monarchial systems of Europe. They see that Rome held provinces and dependencies; that the full glory of Roman citizenship was denied to the people of such colonies and the right of self-government withheld; that by such a course the exploitation of the people was most easily effected, and by condemning them to political inferiority, bureaucracy flourished. They see that Great Britain has "Crown Colonies," and that "land grabbing" and founding colonial dependencies are the policies of "great nations."

To establish a like system the Constitution must be disregarded, and the policy which has made our nation the greatest and most glorious on earth must be overthrown. The Constitution declares that "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." Porto Rico is a part of the United States, and her people are entitled to the protection of all constitutional guaranties. This fact was recognized by President McKinley, who declared that it was "our plain duty" to provide for unrestricted trade between Porto Rico and the rest of the United States.

But the sugar trust and tobacco trust urgently demanded that tariff duties be imposed, and this Administration found time to surrender to the trusts and to establish a precedent for the destructive and odious doctrine that we can treat acquired territory as a colony and give to it and its people no government or such government as we please. Under this view the people of Porto Rico can be held in vassalage; they can be governed by a satrap or tyrant; they can be taxed without representation and denied any right that makes life dear. To hold distant possessions, to govern by military power, to have colonies and dependencies require standing armies, mighty navies, heavy taxation; the spirit of freedom is obscured; the equality of man before the law is ignored; social and other distinctions arise, and so imperialism advances.

Professor Sumner says:

The question of imperialism, then, is the question whether we are going to give the lie to the origin of our own national existence by establishing a colonial system of the old Spanish type, even if we have to sacrifice our own existing civil and political system to do it. I submit that it is a strange incongruity to utter grand platitudes about the blessings of liberty, etc., which we are going to impart to these people, and to begin by refusing to extend the Constitution over them, and still more, by throwing the Constitution into the gutter here at home. If you take away the Constitution, what is the American liberty and all the rest? Nothing but a lot of phrases.

After reciting the treatment accorded to her colonies by Spain, the same author proceeds:

We now hear it argued that she is well rid of her colonies, and that if she will devote her energies to her internal development and rid her politics of the corruption of colonial officials and interests she may be regenerated. That is a rational opinion. It is the best diagnosis of her condition and the best prescription of a remedy which the occasion has called forth. But what then will happen to the state which has taken over her colonies? I can see no answer except that that nation, with them, has taken over the disease, and that it now is to be corrupted by exploiting dependent communities, just as she has been. That it stands exposed to this danger is undeniable.

To the impious crime already committed by this Administration of assaulting our fundamental law the sin of cant and hypocrisy is added. Republicans, adopting the same pretexts and excuses ever offered by land grabbers, imperialists, and tyrants, piously assert that "benevolent assimilation"—the uplifting and civilizing of the ignorant, the restoration of law, and the bequeathment of liberty—is our mission and purpose.

King George III of England suggested this as justification for resisting the Revolutionary fathers:

I am desirous of restoring to them the blessings of law and liberty equally enjoyed by every British subject, which they have fatally and desperately exchanged for the calamities of war and the arbitrary tyranny of their chiefs.

Lincoln answered this position as follows:

Those arguments that are made, that the inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying; that as much as can be done for them as their condition will allow—what are these arguments? They are the arguments that kings have made for enslaving the people in all ages of the world. You will find that all the arguments in favor of king's craft were of this class. They always bestride the necks of the people, not that they wanted to do it, but because the people were better off for being ridden. That is their argument, and this argument of the judge (Douglas) is the same old serpent that says you work and I eat; you toil and I will enjoy the fruits of it.

Turn it in whatever way you will, whether it came from the mouth of the king as excuse for the enslaving of the people of his country or from the mouth of men of one race as a reason for enslaving the men of another race, it is all the same old serpent; and I hold if that course of argumentation, which is made for the purpose of convincing the public mind that we should not care about this, should be granted, it does not stop with the negro. I should like to know if, taking the old Declaration of Independence, which declares that all men are created equal upon principle, and making exceptions to it, when will it stop? If one man says it does not mean a negro, why not another say it does mean some other man? If that declaration is not the truth, let us get the statute book in which we find it and tear it out. Who is so bold as to do it? If it is not true, let us tear it out. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Let us stick to it then; let us stand firmly by it then.

The Washington Post, an able and influential paper, courageously and honestly shows the bathos and insincerity of Republican pretensions upon this matter. In an editorial, January 14, 1900, it speaks as follows:

LET US BE HONEST!

Why can not we be honest in our utterances touching the territories we have recently acquired? Really, it would save time and trouble, to say nothing of life and treasure, to come out frankly with the announcement that we have annexed these possessions in cold blood, and that we intend to utilize them to our profit and advantage. All this talk about benevolent assimilation; all this hypocritical pretense of anxiety for the moral, social, and intellectual exaltation of the natives; all this transparent parade of responsibility and deep-seated purpose; all this deceives nobody, avails nothing, helps us not an inch in the direction of profit, dignity, and honor.

We all know down in our hearts that these islands, groups, etc., are important to us only in the ratio of their practical possibilities. We value them by the standard of their commercial usefulness, and by no other. All this gabble about civilizing and uplifting the benighted barbarians of Cuba and Luzon is mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Foolishly or wisely, we want these newly acquired territories, not for any missionary or altruistic purposes, but for the trade, the commerce, the power, and the money there are in them. Why beat about the bush and promise and protest all sorts of things? Why not be honest? It will pay.

As a matter of fact, we are not concerned in the ethical or religious uplifting of the Filipinos. After all, the difference between a breechclout and a starched shirt front is a mere matter of climate and personal opinion. Dishonesty, untruth, crime, and general wickedness are here in our midst—present with us as part of our daily life and growing with our growth. We need not go to the West Indies or the Philippines in search of material for moral rescue. Our own slums abound with opportunities for missionary zeal.

Why not tell the truth and say—what is the fact—that we want Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Luzon, together with any other islands in either ocean that may hereafter commend themselves to our appetite, because we believe they will add to our national strength, and because we hope they will some day become purchasers at our bargain counters? We might as well throw off the pious mask and indulge ourselves in a little honest candor. It will cost us nothing, and it may profit much. At any rate, we shall have the comfort and satisfaction of being honest with ourselves and the privilege of looking into the mirror without blushing.

Mr. Speaker, the record of the Republican party during the last three years is perfidious in the extreme, a shameful betrayal of the people, an unbroken line of violated promises and unredeemed pledges. Republicanism is the impersonation of the evil forces and tendencies of the times. It stands for the destructive forces in our nation; for high taxes; oppressive burdens upon the poor; governmental favoritism; militarism, with the concomitants of mighty armies and unequaled navies; lust for power and greed for conquest; imperialism, with its tyrannies and inequalities, its exaltation of the powerful and its degradation and oppression and enslavement of the weak; for jingoism and rapacity; for Hannaism and the view that money is supreme, even to the destruction of patriotism or party fealty or love of country.

With a record so foul and unclean, it impudently asks the indorsement of the country and insolently demands a retention of power.

Six months ago the Congress convened, the Republicans having control of all branches of the Government. What have they done to answer the demands of the people for legislation to protect them from the tyrannies of the trusts? Though numerous measures have been offered by Democratic members of the House, which if enacted into law would have proven of immeasurable advantage to the people, the Republican majority refused to report them for consideration.

But now, after a resolution has been adopted providing for the adjournment of the House within six days, and when appropriation bills and measures of the greatest importance are crowding for consideration, an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is submitted, together with a bill containing some meritorious features. The fraud and transparency of the trick is apparent to all. There is no hope or expectation of either the proposed amendment or the bill passing both Houses of Congress. Why was the presentation of this matter delayed until the closing hours of Congress? Here is a proposition to amend the great charter of our liberties, to commit to the Federal Government transcendent powers, and yet so momentous a question is thrust upon members without opportunity for consideration or full and fair discussion.

Gentlemen of the opposition, your proposition is a mere "bluff," a trick and a sham, as is privately confessed by many distinguished Republicans, offered for political purposes and party advantage. It is thought that the people will be satisfied with your explanation for failing to legislate against trusts, and this is offered to conceal the true situtation and with the ardent hope that Republican devotion to monopolistic combines and plutocracy may be hidden from the American people.

It is openly charged on the floor of the House that our Republican friends are indulging in a game of "buncombe" in submitting this proposed constitutional amendment.

The New York Sun, a Republican paper, and a powerful ally of the Administration, supports this view in a strong and trenchant editorial found in to-day's issue.

Mr. RAY of New York. What kind of a paper did you call it?

Mr. KING. I called it a Republican paper.

Mr. RAY of New York. It never has been a Republican paper.

Mr. KING. My friend knows that it is a Republican paper. He knows that it has been charged on the floor of this House repeatedly that it is under the domination of the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I know that it is not a Republican paper and never has been. It was formerly a "fool" Democratic paper.

Mr. KING. Well, it would need something more than my friend's statement, veracious as he is, to convince the members of this House that it is not a Republican paper. It is supporting Mr. McKinley; it is supporting the Administration; it is supporting most of the follies and foibles and sins of the Republican party in this House. That makes it a pretty good Republican paper. It supported my friend and his party in the Porto Rican matter.

A MEMBER. And the Cuban steal.

Mr. KING. Yes; that is a part of the trust that the Republican party believe in. They believe in the Neely trust and the Rathbone trust. They believe in exploiting the Philippines and holding them for the purpose of sending trustees over them—trustees, not in the hands of Providence, as one of the Senators said, but trustees in the hands of the Republican party, to steal all they can and hold all they steal. The editorial is in part as follows:

THE ANTI-TRUST AMENDMENT—DISHONESTY THE WORST POLICY.

The Jenkins joint resolution proposing a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution to enable Congress to deal with trusts reads as follows, after having been amended by the House Committee on the Judiciary:

"That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

"The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation."

When we say plainly that this is the most dishonest, and therefore the most discreditable, piece of work achieved during the present session by the leaders of Republican policy in the House, we are not speaking of the merits of the proposed amendment. Its revolutionary character, the sweeping change it would effect in the entire system of our institutions, the bestowal upon Congress of an unlimited and arbitrary power over all private business in all the States and without regard to State lines or State rights, need not be discussed. There is no more prospect of its adoption by a two-thirds vote of both House and Senate and of its ratification by the legislatures of three-forths of the forty-five States than there is of the adoption of a constitutional amendment vesting in the Federal Government the direct management of all the myriad industries of this land.

The dishonesty of the performance lies in the fact that there was no expectation on the part of the author of this resolution, or of the Republicans on the Judiciary Committee who favorably reported it, or of the Republicans in the House who were willing to vote for it, that the proposed sixteenth amendment will ever amount to more than a campaign trick of the cheapest and unworthiest description. * * *

With cynical indifference to every consideration except the desire to "put the Democrats in a hole" on the trust issue, this farce has been allowed to proceed to the point which it reached in the House yesterday. As a mere trick for temporary advantage on the eve of the national conventions and the Presidential canvass it has proved successful. The Democratic caucus of the House has been forced into an attitude of opposition to a Republican measure professing to aim at the suppression of trusts. * * *

To such satisfaction as this triumph of ingenuity brings to the souls of the Republican statesmen who chuckled and winked at each other and nudged each other under the ribs when Mr. RAY of New York first reported the Jenkins resolution, on May 15, they are unquestionably entitled.

Mr. Speaker, this editorial, it seems to me, conclusively demonstrates the hypocracy of the Republican party in presenting this resolution. They do not intend to pass it, they never intended to, but designed it as a campaign trick; but the people will see through the pretense of Republicans and when November comes they will relegate that party to the rear and advance into power the party that is worthy the suffrages and confidence of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the conduct of the majority in relation to the consideration of this question is arbitrary and so utterly partisan as to be outrageous. It is known to all that no legislation was desired by the majority in Congress to further curb and control the trusts, and that during this entire session the Democratic minority has earnestly sought the people's welfare, and demanded that the Republican majority release itself from the domination of corporate influences and enact appropriate legislation upon this question. When driven to bay, and having prevented the consideration of the subject until this late hour, they now, with Falstaffian courage and tragic voice, cry out, "Where are the trusts!"

To prevent a thorough analysis and discussion of the question the majority fixed the time of adjournment for the 6th instant, and then, under the plea of want of time, they abrogate the rules of the House and prevent the Democrats from offering the slightest amendment to the resolution submitted, by bringing in and passing a special rule. Under this but a few hours' debate is permitted, and members are then compelled to vote upon a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. This high-handed course will not meet with the approval of the intelligent and patriotic people of the country. No matter what defects may be pointed out or what obnoxious features may be exhibited, this rule compels us to-morrow, without having an opportunity to suggest and vote upon an amendment to the resolution, to vote for or against it.

One not familiar with Republican methods might suppose that when so serious a matter as changing the fundamental law of our land was under consideration the combined wisdom of all would be sought. "This is our measure," gentlemen say, "and you must take it, whether it is good or bad, without chance to cross a 't' or dot an 'i.'"

And so, under Republican rules, do politics and partisanship rise above statecraft and patriotism. If the proposed amendment shall pass the House, gentlemen know its passage can not be secured in the Senate. Still, in harmony with the purpose to reap party advantage, Republicans will in the coming campaign say to the people: "We will pass it in December; time was too limited during the session." And to the trusts they will say: "Of course we knew it would meet defeat in the Senate; such was intended. It was merely for campaign purposes."

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party is led by adroit politicians. Its great leader is masterful. No cause so sacred or question so lofty that will not be made to subserve if possible the cause of the Republican party.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to briefly consider the resolution under discussion, and submit some reasons why I can not support it.

The first question to be considered when it is proposed to change the Constitution is, "Is it necessary?" Republicans contend, at least for campaign purposes, that trusts can not be suppressed without a further grant of power to Congress. This position is paradoxical, to say the least, when simultaneous with the presentation of the resolution to amend the Constitution, a bill (H. R. 10539) is offered amending the anti-trust law of 1890.

It is argued by gentlemen on the other side that Congress is powerless to afford the people relief; that unless the Constitution is amended nothing can be accomplished looking to the suppression of monopolistic conspiracies. Yet they confess the falsity of this position by offering a bill which, if enacted into law, will materially strengthen the hands of honest Federal officials in their efforts to control the evils complained of. This bill is a confession that a majority of the members of the Judiciary Committee are of the opinion that the power of Congress to deal with monopolies and trusts was not exhausted by the Sherman Act of 1890.

The amendment of the Constitution is so serious a matter that it should be approached with grave and deep concern. Nothing but the conviction of an overwhelming necessity for changing it will justify even the suggestion of amending it; but it is palpable that this proposed amendment is not offered in good faith. As stated, the matter is left until the closing hours of the session, when, even if favorable action were had in the House, the resolution would fail in the Senate. The proposed amendment offered by the majority is as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the Republicans have offered this resolution in extenuation of their omission to execute the existing law and to excuse their party for failing to enact such legislation as is authorized under the Constitution as it now exists to destroy monopolies in restraint of trade. They will contend, doubtless, in the coming campaign that there has been no movement by them against trusts because of a lack of power and that until the Constitution is amended the people are without relief from their oppressions. If the Democrats vote against this resolution, Republicans will, with pretended seriousness, claim that the minority is responsible for the continuance of trusts. If we vote for it, they will joyfully declare that the Democrats conceded that there can be no abatement of monopolistic tyranny without change in the organic law.

They well know that, even if the Democrats in the House should join with them and pass this resolution, giving the requisite two-thirds vote, it will never be incorporated into our Constitution; they know the Republicans in the Senate would not pass it; they know that, even if its passage were effected, three-fourths of the States of this nation would never ratify it; they know that through the stormy scenes of a century, with the mutations through which our Government has passed, no amendment has been possible except those growing out of a sanguinary civil conflict; they know that by confessing a want of power in the Federal Government to suppress trusts, which the passage of this resolution would be tantamount to, monopolies and conspiracies in restraint of trade would be pleased, as it would continue their existence and increase their power.

To vote for this proposed amendment is a declaration in favor of trusts and their continuance. It is an open alliance with them. It is a vote for their protection and perpetuity. Gentlemen upon the other side know that if this resolution went to the States for their approval, even if the trusts and the representatives of wealth failed by corrupt and improper means to withhold the support of eleven of the States, there would be many more than that number that would never ratify it because of its inherent vices and the monstrous propositions which it embodies. So we see that this resolution is not offered in good faith with the hope or expectation of its passage or ratification by the States. It is clear that it was offered only to meet the exigencies of the campaign and for the protection, if possible, of Republicans from the just condemnation of a patient but outraged people.

Mr. Speaker, powerful as trusts are, their destruction can be accomplished, in my opinion, if Congress will exercise the authority possessed by it under the Constitution. Indeed, it is not certain but what the present law, if enforced by faithful officials, could not be effective to that end. But before discussing that question I desire to point out some of the objections to this proposed amendment which I have just read in full.

The first section of this proposed sixteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution is an anomaly. It has always been an accepted doctrine of this Republic that the Constitution extended ex propria vigore to every part of the domain under the flag; that wherever the Constitution went, the flag went. The Supreme Court over and over again have declared that "the personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them and to their citizens by the price of constitutional liberty, which restrained all agencies of the Government, State and national;" and in numerous other decisions they have determined that whenever territory was acquired by the Government, whether by cession, or treaty, or discovery, or conquest, it was held subject to the Constitution, and its inhabitants entitled to all the immunities and protection prescribed by that immortal instrument.

Section 1 of this proposed article is obnoxious to every view heretofore entertained upon this point and is in direct contradiction of the many utterances of the Supreme Court upon this important question. It has been so fashionable with this Administration to violate the Constitution that gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber find no difficulty in continuing their assaults. A vote for this measure is a vote for militarism, for the colonial system; and is an indorsement of the great national apostacy led by the sugar and tobacco trusts and the Republican party; it is a vote to indorse the declaration that the Constitution and the flag are separable; that the people of Arizona and New Mexico, as well as the inhabitants of other territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, are outside of the protection of the Constitution, and can be governed by military power or as Spain governed her colonies.

In other words, this proposed amendment declares that this is no longer a Republic constitutionally governed, and that to show to the world that we are advancing toward a monarchical form of government we write in the Constitution that the inhabitants of the territory belonging to the United States are no longer citizens of the United States, but are subjects and vassals, and are to be treated as such by Congress. That this is the correct interpretation of section 1 is admitted by its proponents. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. RAY], in reporting this measure, and the Republicans who have spoken confessed that its purpose is to crystallize the Republican view as expressed upon the Porto Rican question and to declare that the Constitution, with all of its blessings and benefits, can only go where Congress allows.

Ex-Senator Edmunds, in a letter written to Senator PROCTOR on the 21st of March of this year, when this new, dangerous, and destructive doctrine was being urged by the Republicans, shows its infamy, as well as its unconstitutionality. In his letter he uses the following language:

MY DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 20th instant, and, both as an American citizen and an original and constant Republican, am very glad to learn that you are opposed to legislation having the effect of imposing on the people of Porto Rico (whether we call them citizens or subjects of the United States) any kind of revenue burden or benefit that is not common to the whole people of the United States. Any such measure, if enacted, will, I believe, be unique in our whole history. It will imitate and parallel the acts of the British Parliament which forced our fathers to just resistance and revolution, and led them to establish a Constitution which in studied and explicit terms forbade any such discrimination.

I know there are many gentlemen engaged in public affairs whose intelligence and patriotism are above question who believe that our Constitution does not embrace the Territories, and that as to them the President and Congress possess the same omnipotent powers that the British Crown and Parliament have always possessed over their possessions. While I think that position is untenable as a matter of law, I believe the proposed action is still less defensible viewed in the light of those principles of liberty, justice, and equality of rights we all profess to believe in, and which, whether we believe in and practice or not, are still living and will live and bear fruits more and more among men, in spite of all the tyrants—well-meaning or otherwise—in the world.

I need not weary you by referring to the often-stated arguments on the general subject, but I will mention one aspect of it which, so far as I have noticed, has not been particularly adverted to. Congress is the creature of the Constitution and not the reverse. A law passed by Congress is its creation, a mere expression of its will, which it may repeal or change at pleasure. If, therefore (assuming that the Constitution does not exist in Porto Rico), Congress were to enact a statute declaring that the present Constitution shall be extended over and be in force in that island, the Constitution gets its only force there by the virtue of the statute. It is a statutory constitution and nothing else, and a repeal of the statute would extinguish it.

But the Constitution as such, I suppose all admit, is not subject to the control of Congress, either to enlarge or diminish, to expand or contract, or to be applied to or withdrawn from any people or place. It is not a movable thing, like the Ark of the Covenant of the Israelites, to be set up and moved here or there, as the tribes might wander. It is the actual event and condition, and not the legislative or executive will that must in the nature of things determine the status of a man or a country under it.

The instances in which Congress has declared in statutes organizing Territories that the Constitution and laws should be in force there are no evidence that they were not already there, for Congress and all legislative bodies have often made enactments that in effect merely declared existing law. In such cases they declare a preexisting truth to ease the doubts of casuists. Porto Rico and its people came under the sovereignty of the United States by force of the treaty with Spain, and I think all will agree that if any part of the people of the island levied war against the United States or adhered to our enemies, etc., they would be guilty of treason. But treason is an exclusively defined constitutional crime, and it can not exist on the island unless the Constitution that defines it is in force there.

Mr. Speaker, I shall adhere to the good old faith of the fathers, and maintain, so far as within me lies, our Constitution in all its beauty and power. I shall not vote for a proposition declaring that the Stars and Stripes can or will float over an enslaved people. I shall not give my support to this dangerous heresy that the President of the United States is above the law and beyond the Constitution; that Congress, the creation of the Constitution, can rise above it, and that the President or Congress can govern despotically and tyrannously, and without constitutional limitations, millions of people and unlimited territory, floating the flag as the symbol of their authority, but with no restrictions to arbitrary power or unbridled ambition.

Mr. Speaker, insuperable objections exist to paragraph 1, section 2, of this proposed amendment. Its language is as follows:

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

In the act of 1890 the combinations, trusts, and conspiracies denounced were those "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States," etc. Notwithstanding this limitation imposed by the words "in restraint of trade and commerce," it is well known that the Federal courts have regarded that act as a weapon with which to punish labor organizations. In the celebrated Debs case the act referred to was employed for the purpose of punishing combinations of workingmen. The circuit judge, in disposing of the case, directly held that the act covered organizations of workingmen, and that their acts when seeking to redress their grievances might amount to a conspiracy "in restraint of trade."

I doubt whether any person, at the time of the passage of the Sherman anti-trust law, conceived that it ever could be invoked against the toiling masses of the United States who, for the redress of grievances, either real or imaginary, might effect organizations. If the act of 1890, which contains words of limitation with respect to combinations, trusts, and conspiracies—namely, that to be illegal they must be "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States"—is employed by the courts to suppress labor organizations and to punish those participating therein, can there be any question as to what the same courts would do under the power conferred by this proposed amendment? It will be observed that the proposition here is to give Congress power to "define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise."

They need not be engaged in interstate commerce, nor need their objects be to "restrain trade between States or foreign nations." Every combination is denounced by the amendment, and the Federal Government is empowered to regulate or prohibit it. It is not necessary to submit authorities in support of the proposition that the power to regulate, control, and prohibit carries full authority to impose penalties upon those in any manner connected with the subject or combination legislated against.

Therefore, under the proposed amendment every organization of labor, every association of people for mutual protection, every honest and legitimate combination to remonstrate against grievances or wrongs, can be punished, and that, too, even though the organization, combination, or association, and all the members thereof, were limited in their operations to a single State.

The evil to be suppressed is of an interstate character. Monopolies and criminal combinations to restrain trade and commerce, to destroy legitimate competition, and to place in the hands of a few the avenues of trade and production—these are the enemies whose destruction should be sought. Why did not the Republicans upon the Judiciary Committee, when they prepared this proposed amendment, if they were sincerely the friends of the people and desired to strike at the source of the trouble, limit this section to the combinations and conspiracies against whose usurpations the people are contending? Why did they omit from the section the words "in restraint of trade and commerce?"

I have no desire to inveigh against the Federal judiciary, but recent events warrant the apprehension, so often expressed by Jefferson, of the insidious usurpation of the Federal courts.

Generally speaking, they are unfriendly to labor and are ever ready to support the rich and the powerful, the strong and the mighty, in the unequal contest that our present civilization and modern economics and industrial condition present. Can it be doubted that, with a constitutional amendment such as is proposed, hostile legislation would be leveled against organizations that are legitimate, and the judicial machinery of the Government employed, at the instigation of capital, against those who in self-defense were resisting its aggressions?

Why do not the majority permit us to amend the section so as to remove the objection suggested? The fixed determination to prevent even the offering of an amendment confirms the charge that the Republicans are hostile to labor interests. If the proposed amendment should be adopted, Congress would have the power to declare strikes and remonstrances by laboring men, and petitions for increase of wages, and associations to secure better treatment at the hands of employers, illegal, and make criminals and punish, all laborers connected therewith.

No man who appreciates the value of labor and has regard for the great forces that produce our wealth and glorify our country, can give assent to such legislation.

If there were no other reasons, Mr. Speaker, than the one just suggested, this proposed amendment would not command my support. While there may be just criticism against some individuals who have employed labor organizations improperly, still when we see what has been accomplished in the direction of ameliorating the condition of millions of earth's toilers, through organizations and agitation for the repeal of obnoxious laws, for a fair wage and honest treatment, we can not but regard such organizations as wholesome factors in our industrial organism and body politic.

If, as gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber contend, Congress has not sufficient power to control trusts, and therefore a constitutional amendment is necessary, why do they not, conceding, as they are compelled to do, that the combinations, monopolies, and trusts that are menacing the people are interstate and are carrying their products to and conducting their business in various States, accept what the gentleman from Texas would have offered as an amendment, if an arbitrary rule had not prevented, which provides that the power to "define," "regulate," "prohibit," or "dissolve" monopolies and combinations, which is conferred upon Congress, shall be limited to such organizations as are engaged in interstate commerce and are formed in restraint of trade and commerce.

Do gentlemen think that the States are going to willingly grant to the Federal Government powers which they have reserved? All of the amendments to the Constitution, except those born of the civil war, were restrictions upon the General Government and not concessions of power.

Has the spirit of imperialism so inoculated Republicans that they desire to rob the States of their sovereign powers?

Under this proposed amendment the Federal Government can reach into each State, control every corporation therein (though it is a State corporation and limits its business exclusively to the State creating it), dissolve such corporate body, and punish the members thereof; it can seize the farmers of Illinois or Utah who agree to hold their wheat or corn until a fair price is paid, and confiscate their property and impose fines and imprisonment upon them. The most harmless organizations of individuals Congress would have the power to declare illegal combinations, and visit pains and penalties upon all connected therewith.

The States now have the right to define trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and to punish, dissolve, and prohibit such as are confined in their operations within their respective States. They control their own corporations and organizations. This power, I am sure, they will not surrender to the Federal Government. Therefore the sixteenth amendment, in its present form, will never receive the approval of the people of the Commonwealths.

Section 2, as proposed, confers the exclusive power upon Congress to "define" trusts, monopolies, or combinations; not only such as are engaged in business outside of the State in which they are organized, but such as are purely local. With the definition supplied by Congress the States would be bound.

A most obnoxious monopoly might spread itself like an octopus over the State, and yet if it was not embraced within the description enacted by Congress the former would be powerless to control or destroy it. With the States thus shorn of power to define trusts, except to adopt the definition of Congress, can there be any doubt what the result would be? If so, note the victories of the railroad companies.

For years efforts have been made to repair the imperfections in the interstate-commerce law so as to prevent discriminations and to protect the people. It is unnecessary to state that the railroads have circumvented the demands of the people, the arm of right has been paralyzed, and the great legislative branch of the Government has not overcome the obstacles interposed to the wholesome and necessary legislation desired.

Besides depriving the States, as suggested, of power to control their own domestic affairs, section 2 deprives them of the right to extirpate conspiracies and monopolies by conferring upon Congress this extraordinary grant of power. It is evident that if Congress can declare that certain acts constitute a combination or conspiracy, no State would have the right, under the proposed amendment, to declare that certain other acts constituted a conspiracy or monopoly. If Congress should control or regulate any organization or association, no matter how harmful or harmless it might be, as a monopoly or combination, no State law could contravene it. It must be admitted, then, that if Congress should define innocent acts to be a combination or conspiracy no State could declare any other acts, no matter how vicious or harmful, to be a combination or conspiracy.

Many States have already enacted wise and salutary laws against monopolies, which are being vigilantly enforced, to the terror of the trusts and the benefit of the people. Texas presents a striking example of what can be done by the States to suppress the trusts. The Standard Oil Company has been driven from its borders, and insurance companies are supplicating for permission to enter the State and transact business. If this resolution were to become a part of the Constitution, every State would be at the mercy of Congress in its legislation upon the trust question.

These wholesome State laws now in force unquestionably would not harmonize with Congressional enactments in many details. They would, therefore, be nugatory. Congress might validate that which the people of some States might regard as a menacing combination, or condemn that which was regarded by the people of many States as legitimate and beneficial. In either case the paramountcy of Congress would be recognized. State laws would be overthrown. The power of States to control their own people and combinations and organizations would be gone. They would, Sampson-like, be shorn of their strength and become the puppets and playthings of the Federal Government.

They might authorize individuals to engage in most desirable enterprises, wholly within the State and purely for the advantage of the people of the State. Congress having full power, pursuant to this proposed amendment, over the whole subject of organizations and combinations, no matter their purpose or situs or form, could so define trusts and combinations as to include such enterprises, and thenceforth they would be illegal. The charter of the State, the seal of the people's approval, would afford no protection.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of "State's rights," as is asserted by some who are seeking to arouse ancient prejudices. The point at issue is whether our dual form of government shall be maintained.

The people are the repository of all power; they have confided a portion to the States and have made the General Government the custodian of a part of the residue.

It has been wisely determined that local and domestic concerns shall be directly controlled by that government which is nearer to the people, one with which they are in constant association. Despoil the States of this authority and the equipoise of our Government is gone. Transfer the control of local affairs to the parent Government and the States serve no purpose; the Union becomes an empire.

The power to define or control a combination, without limiting in any manner this authority, would be the most serious assault ever made upon the Constitution, except, perhaps, such as attended our civil conflict.

A combination is the act or process of combining or uniting persons or things; is association, alliance, union, confederation. The union of States is a combination. Every success of life, every triumphant victory is the fruit of combination. Yet Republicans can offer only one remedy for illegal and criminal conspiracies, which aim at the destruction of lawful trade and commerce, and that to deprive the people of the power to control domestic institutions and vest in Congress the authority to pass the most odious laws and supervise the details of private affairs and local organizations.

Under this proposed amendment Congress has the power to "define" trusts, "regulate" monopolies, etc. Is not this an exclusive grant of power, which prohibits State legislation against any form of combination?

Unquestionably if Congress "defines" a trust, or prescribes a "regulation," no State law could contravene it. If this great power were delegated to Congress who can doubt but that every illegal combination would concentrate all power to control Federal legislation? If successful, the States would be stripped of authority to destroy the trusts, and their nefarious proceedings would continue.

Congress, under the suggested amendment, could license trusts, or impose such limited restrictions as to permit their continuance. No matter what State laws were enacted they would be invalid.

Mr. Speaker, no amendment to the Federal Constitution is necessary to destroy trusts, but so earnest are gentlemen on this side of the Chamber to prevent further extortions and destruction by these voracious organizations that they would forego any convictions regarding an amendment, and support a properly prepared and honest one, one which could not be employed against organized labor, legitimate association and union, or deprive Commonwealths of the right of local sovereignty and the power to control their domestic institutions.

I have given, though imperfectly, some of the objections which I entertain to the proposed amendment.

There is still another, and a cogent one, namely, that no necessity for the amendment exists.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

It is unnecessary to say that the States have plenary and ample power to control their domestic affairs, and to regulate and destroy all trusts, conspiracies, and combinations organized and confined in their business operations within the States. The monopolies and conspiracies that are to be conquered are carrying on commerce between States. This distinction must be kept in view in considering this question. All instrumentalities and organizations not criminal, employed as instruments of trade or commerce between the States or foreign nations, are subject to control by Congress alone; but where the combination is illegal and is a monopoly in restraint of trade, not only can Congress denounce and punish it, but its products and articles of commerce become subject to the control of the States under their police powers.

In the Rahrer Case (140 U. S., 545) the court say:

> The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive. And this court has uniformly recognized State legislation, legitimately for police purposes, as not in the sense of the Constitution necessarily infringing upon any right which has been confined, expressly or by implication, to the National Government.

The question suggests itself, What may Congress do under the section of the Constitution just referred to?

The Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, in reporting the proposed constitutional amendment, strongly urge as a reason for it that Congress has no power "to repress or control monopolies of any kind * * * unless it be a monopoly to control interstate commerce." They admit that all corporations engaged in interstate commerce may be controlled and dissolved by Congress, but contend that the Supreme Court has decided that over manufacture and production no Federal authority to regulate can extend, even though the monopoly in manufacture or production seriously affects and cripples interstate commerce.

It is true that in the Knight Case (156 U. S., 1) the court held that the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause limited its legislation and control to interstate commerce, and that a monopoly formed to control manufacture or production was not subject to the control of the Federal Government, nevertheless the moment that the fruits or products of the monopoly seek to pass from one State to another such monopoly is engaged in "interstate commerce," and it can be "regulated" by Congress. The manufactured goods, the production of the monopolistic organization, pass under the control and jurisdiction of Congress and may be confiscated or treated in such manner as Congress may determine.

No matter how odious a conspiracy to monopolize all the manufacturing plants in a State may be, the combination is a monster without teeth until it begins shipping and vending its products. When this occurs and these products go into the channels of trade between the States the jurisdiction of Congress attaches, and all persons contracting in any manner respecting the products, as well as the contracts, over the articles so manufactured, become the subjects of national concern, and are subject to such regulations as Congress may prescribe.

If a criminal monopoly is confined in its operations to a State, the State will quickly destroy it. If a monopoly be one to control manufacture it is not harmful—speaking nationally in contradistinction to locally—until it reaches out to place its articles of production upon the market.

If, as stated, its field of operations is limited to a single State, it will quickly be crushed by the State; it can only be a peril or wrong to the people outside of such State when and as it seeks to intrude its productions into the markets of other States. That moment, though it be a monopoly to control manufacture, it ceases to be a local evil or State monopoly and is dominated by the Federal Government as a combination or instrumentality interstate in character. As stated by Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case:

> The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce.

Under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution Congress passed the act of 1890, declaring that any monopoly or an attempt to monopolize "any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations" constituted an offense, and also that "every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce" * * * between States was illegal, and that those connected therewith should be subject to punishment. This law has been reviewed upon a number of occasions by the Supreme Court of the United States, and its provisions upheld.

Under this statute proceedings were instituted to perpetually enjoin six corporations, engaged in the manufacture, sale, and transportation of iron pipe, from further acting under or carrying on the combination alleged to have been formed. The Supreme Court upheld the law and enjoined the defendants from carrying on under the combination interstate business.

Discussing the law, the court uses the following language:

> Under this grant of power to Congress that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void and prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce. (And when we speak of interstate we also include in our meaning foreign commerce.) We do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to the individual to enter into private contracts limits the power of Congress and prevents it from legislating upon the subject of contracts of the class mentioned.
> The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It has been held that the word liberty, as used in the Constitution, was not to be confined to the mere liberty of person, but included, among others, a right to enter into certain classes of contracts for the purpose of enabling the citizen to carry on his business. (Allgeyer vs. Louisiana, 165 U. S., 578; United States vs. Joint Traffic Association, 171 id., 505, 572.) But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature, and wholly irrespective (among other things) of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject.
> The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.
> We have no doubt that where the direct and immediate effect of a contract or combination among particular dealers in a commodity is to destroy competition between them and others, so that the parties to the contract or combination may obtain increased prices for themselves, such contract or combination amounts to a restraint of trade in the commodity, even though contracts to buy such a commodity at the enhanced price are continually being made. Total suppression of the trade in the commodity is not necessary in order to render the combination one in restraint of trade. It is the effect of the combination in limiting and restricting the right of each of the members to transact business in the ordinary way, as well as its effect upon the volume or extent of the dealing in the commodity, that is regarded. All the facts and circumstances are, however, to be considered in order to determine the fundamental question—whether the necessary effect of the combination is to restrain interstate commerce.
> If iron pipe cost $100 a ton instead of the prices which the record shows were paid for it, no one, we think, would contend that the trade in it would amount to as much as if the lower prices prevailed. The higher price would operate as a direct restraint upon the trade, and therefore any contract or combination which enhanced the price might in some degree restrain the trade in the article. It is not material that the combination did not prevent the letting of any particular contract. Such was not its purpose. On the contrary, the more contracts to be let the better for the combination.
> It was formed not for the object of preventing the letting of contracts, but to restrain the parties to it from competing for contracts and thereby to enhance the prices to be obtained for the pipe dealt in by those parties. And when by reason of the combination a particular contract may have been obtained for one of the parties thereto, but at a higher price than would otherwise have been paid, the charge that the combination was one in restraint of trade is not answered by the statement that the particular contract was in truth obtained and not prevented. The parties to such a combination might realize more profit by the higher prices they would secure than they could earn by doing more work at a much less price. The question is as to the effect of such combination upon the trade in the article, and if that effect be to destroy competition and thus advance the price, the combination is one in restraint of trade.
> Decisions regarding the validity of taxation by or under State authority, involving sometimes the question of the point of time that an article intended for transportation beyond the State ceases to be governed exclusively by the domestic law and begins to be governed and protected by the national law of commercial regulation, are not of very close application here. The commodity may not have commenced its journey and so may still be completely within the jurisdiction of the State for purposes of State taxation, and yet at that same time the commodity may have been sold for delivery in another State. Any combination among dealers in that kind of commodity which in its direct and immediate effect forecloses all competition and enhances the purchase price for which such commodity would otherwise be delivered at its destination in another State, would, in our opinion, be one in restraint of trade or commerce among the States, even though the article to be transported and delivered in another State were still taxable at its place of manufacture. (Addyston Pipe and Steel Company et al. vs. United States, 172 U. S. —.)

Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt as to the power of Congress to destroy trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. The equity power of the Federal courts can be invoked to dissolve corporations engaged in monopolies, or to grant perpetual injunctions restraining them as well as individuals, from engaging in combinations to restrain trade and commerce. The criminal law may also be resorted to, and fines and punishments imposed upon all engaged in the forbidden pursuits.

Under the common law monopolies in restraint of trade are offenses. Why is it not within the power of the States to punish those who are engaged in combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade who come within their borders? It is the duty of the State to protect its residents in their life and property and pursuits. If their lawful business pursuits are destroyed by the conspiracies and unlawful monopolies of those who may be engaged in interstate commerce, it would seem that the power rests in the State to afford protection.

If not, why not? The power granted the Federal Government is to "regulate commerce between the States," etc. At the time the Constitution was adopted monopolies and contracts in restraint of trade were denominated "crimes against trade." These crimes were not legalized by the Constitution, and were not, by the commerce clause, metamorphosed into "commerce."

It is not a "regulation of commerce" to pass an act punishing crimes in restraint of trade. Therefore it would seem that if a corporation, engaged in commerce between the States, violated the common law and the State law of either of the States in which it was doing business, and combined and conspired to restrain trade, to create trusts and monopolies, that the State could, under its sovereign power and its duty and authority to protect its citizens, resort to its criminal courts and punish those who violated its laws and injured its people. It would also seem that it possessed power to prevent those engaged in such criminal pursuits from engaging in business within its borders, or contracting with respect to the articles produced for such illegal and unlawful purpose.

It is the duty of the State to protect its inhabitants against fraud and oppression, conspiracy and criminal organizations designed to destroy their business; and if persons engaged in world-wide commerce conspire against the people of such State to form monopolies and restrain trade and destroy their business, what "regulation of commerce" or authority of Congress to "regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the several States" is violated or trenched upon?

It must be apparent that if this differentiation is sound the trust problem can speedily be solved. With the States enforcing the criminal provisions of the common law, just adverted to, or similar or more drastic statutory ones, against monopolies and trusts, and those connected therewith, they and their evils would soon be overthrown. This view finds support in the recent case of Austin vs. State (101 Tenn., 564).

Tennessee passed a law making it a misdemeanor to sell or bring into the State for the purpose of selling or giving away any cigarettes, etc. The validity of the statute was questioned, because, as the defendant contended, it interferred with interstate commerce. The court held that "Every State has the right under its reserved police power to prohibit the importation and sale of all articles inherently unworthy of commerce" * * *; that cigarettes not being legitimate articles of commerce, the provision of the Constitution invoked afforded no protection.

If certain acts constitute a crime, and pursuant to that crime certain articles are produced to be sold in furtherance of the offense, and to fully accomplish the unlawful act entered upon, why should not the States under their police powers protect the people from the effects of such crime?

When articles and commodities are outlawed—that is, are produced by unlawful combinations—they cease to be legitimate commerce. They are not, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, "merchantable." Therefore I contend that on principle the law is that "The self-protecting power of each State may be rightfully exerted against their introduction, and such exercise of power can not be considered regulation of commerce prohibited by the Constitution."

I do not question the doctrine so strongly intrenched in the announcements of our highest judicial tribunal, that legitimate interstate commerce can only be affected by State legislation which is permitted under the exercise of the police power of the State. (Bowman vs. Chicago Railway Company, 125 U. S., 465.)

But, waiving this point, the States can punish those engaged in interstate-commerce trusts, and can crush monopolies and combinations, if Congress will pass a law analogous to the act of Congress passed August 8, 1890, commonly known as the "Wilson Act."

By the terms of this law all intoxicating liquors transported into any State or Territory are made subject to the operations of the local law enacted under the police power of the State. Accordingly it was held that where liquor was shipped from California into South Carolina it could not be sold, being subject to the law of the State, which prohibited sales except by the officials of the State under its dispensary enactment.

When Congress outlaws the productions of combinations and declares them noncommercial, then the power of the State to control the articles and forbid their sale and punish those within its jurisdiction who are in any manner connected with their production can not be doubted.

It will thus be seen that with the States fully empowered to control and dissolve all purely State monopolies and combinations, and also in the exercise of their police power to protect the life, health, safety, and comfort of their people, as well as the safety of their property, and to that end to outlaw the products of criminal organizations, the same being noncommercial, and Congress under the interstate-commerce clause having unbounded power to regulate and dissolve all operations engaged in interstate commerce, and for that purpose to confiscate their property and prevent, by pains and penalties and the injunctive power of the court, the transportation on the articles produced by them—that trusts can be destroyed and monopolies in restraint of trade extirpated.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber have confessed, as before stated, that emendations can be made to the present anti-trust law without exhausting the power of Congress over the subject. The penalties of the present law are increased and additional sections are added in the measure reported by the Judiciary Committee and known as the Littlefield bill.

While I approve of such amendments, and shall vote for the measure, I would very much prefer to support the bill offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] in behalf of the minority of the Judiciary Committee. Some of the provisions of the Terry bill will do much, if adopted, to remove the perils to which the people are subjected from illegal combinations. We invite the Republican members of the House, if they desire to (as they pretend) destroy trusts, to support the Terry bill; but we are already assured that the salutary and wise provisions embodied therein will not receive the indorsement of gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber.

The Terry bill contains many excellent provisions and I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks a few of the sections:

SEC. 9. That every corporation, association, joint stock company, or partnership formed or made, or managing or carrying on its business, in whole or in part, for the purpose of controlling or monopolizing, or in such manner as to control or monopolize, or tend to control or monopolize, the manufacture, production, or sale of any article of commerce or merchandise, intended for interstate commerce or commerce with foreign countries, or for the purpose of controlling or increasing or decreasing the cost or price of the same to the purchaser, user, or consumer thereof, for the purpose of preventing, or in such manner as to prevent, competition, or of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, or sale thereof, is, for the purposes of this act, hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly; and all such corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships, and their officers, agents, managers, and attorneys are hereby forbidden and prohibited from shipping or putting in transit any such article of commerce or merchandise to any State, Territory, foreign country, or place, outside the State, Territory, or place in which it was manufactured or produced, and from selling or offering to sell any such article or merchandise to be so shipped or put into any such transit, unless for the private or personal use of the consignee; and for any violation of this provision shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and by imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

All such corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships as above declared illegal shall be, and hereby are, forbidden and prohibited the use of the United States mail in aid or furtherance of any such business or purposes, and all laws now in force for the prevention of the fraudulent use of the mails, so far as the same may be applicable, shall apply in the execution of such prohibition.

Any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership may be proceeded against at the suit of any person or persons, or corporation or association, or by and in behalf of the United States, and perpetually enjoined and restrained from doing or carrying on any interstate or foreign commerce whatever, either with the States or the Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country; and no article of commerce produced or manufactured or owned and dealt in by any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership so organized, formed, managed, or carrying on business shall be transported or carried without the State or Territory in which produced or manufactured, or in which same may be, or without the District of Columbia if produced, manufactured, or found therein, by any individual, corporation, or common carrier, in any manner whatever.

All such articles of commerce shipped in violation of the provisions of this act shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by any person duly authorized by law to make such seizure, and when so seized shall be condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

SEC. 11. That every contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy, tending to create a monopoly in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in any article of commerce or merchandise, entering into trade or commerce among the States or with foreign countries, or designed to create impediments to, or resulting in restrictions to, such trade or commerce or aids to commerce, or to limit or control the manufacture or production of such articles or merchandise, for the purpose of increasing or decreasing, or operating in such manner, or with such result, as to increase or decrease the price of such article or merchandise to the user or consumer, for the purpose of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in such articles or merchandise, or to give power to charge unreasonable prices for merchandise or articles produced or manufactured to be bought, sold, exchanged, dealt in, or transported in such trade or commerce, or for the purpose of imposing, or in such manner as to impose, unjust or onerous restrictions upon, or impediments to, the lawful business of any person, company, or corporation engaged in the production or manufacture of such merchandise or articles, is hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly within the meaning of this act, and every person who shall make, or enter into, or engage in, any such contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, or shall be a promoter thereof or officer or agent therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000 and by imprisonment not less than six months and not exceeding one year.

SEC. 12. That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the price of any commodity or article of merchandise has been enhanced in consequence of any monopoly as defined in this act, he shall issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on like articles of merchandise or commodities brought from foreign countries. Such suspensions shall continue as long as such enhancement in price of such commodity or article of merchandise exists, and until revoked by the proclamation of the President.

SEC. 13. That wherever any State or Territory shall, in any law against trusts, combines, combinations, or monopolies, provide that no foreign corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership, or stockholder, member, or officer belonging to or interested in any such trust, combine, monopoly, or combination of any kind, shall be permitted to carry on or do any business, or have any office or place of business, in such State, or shall make provision to regulate or suppress the business of any such corporation, association, or partnership, or prohibit the sale or offering for sale in such State of any article or merchandise produced by it, every such corporation, association, or partnership carrying on, or attempting to carry on, or do any business or have any office or place of business therein, and all its articles or merchandise carried thereto, shall be subject to the operation and effect of such law, to the same extent and in the same manner as though it had been incorporated, organized, or formed in such State and such articles or merchandise had been made and not brought therein; and no such law shall be regarded as in any way trenching upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States or with foreign nations: Provided, however, That such articles or merchandise may be shipped and transported into any such State or Territory for the personal and private use of the consignee.

SEC. 14. That every corporation, association, joint stock company, or partnership in the United States, or any Territory thereof, or in the District of Columbia, whether organized or formed under and pursuant to the laws of the United States or of a State or of a Territory, owning or controlling any plant or business, or a majority of the stock in any plant or business, similar to its own, in any other State, Territory, or place outside of the one in which it was first chartered, organized, or formed, shall, before being permitted to ship, consign, take, carry, or transport, or sell or deliver for shipment, to any other State or Territory, or into or from the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise of its own production or manufacture, or receive consignments or shipments of articles of commerce or merchandise, manufactured or produced in any other State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, file in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, association, or partnership, together with a duly verified statement showing the article or articles or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it or intended to be manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it; a copy of its by-laws, rules and regulations; the names and places of residence of its officers and stockholders; the amount of its capital stock and the amount thereof actually issued; the amount thereof actually paid in in cash; the nature and value of the property owned by it, and also a full statement of all its debts and liabilities; the number of its employees and wages paid; the dividends paid, if any; the amount of its surplus, if any; the character of additions and improvements made each year and the cost thereof, and a statement of its operating and other expenses, together with a balance sheet showing its profits and losses; and shall annually thereafter file in said office a report, verified by a majority of the directors of a corporation, or by a majority of the members of an association, joint stock company, or partnership, showing the same facts as then existing, and shall, before shipping, or offering or attempting to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way for transit, to any other State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it, plainly and conspicuously stamp thereon, when susceptible of being so stamped, and also on the outside of packages, boxes, or tanks containing the same, the name of the article or merchandise, and the name of the corporation, association, joint stock company, or partnership manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the same, and the place from and to which it is to be shipped or transported.

Every such corporation, association, or partnership as referred to in this section, and every officer, agent, or attorney thereof, that shall ship, or offer or attempt to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way of transit, to any other State or Territory, or to the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or merchandise dealt in, manufactured, or produced by it, or shall violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment of not less than six months and not more than one year.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, but what a denial of the use of the mails to these criminal combinations would seriously cripple their operations, if not prevent their continuance in business. Suppose the law prevented them from sending any letter or paper in any manner connected with their business, and also prevented the transmission through the mails of any newspaper containing advertisements of any monopoly; it can easily be foreseen what the result would be.

In this marvelous age of activity and strenuous effort no business could continue that was extensive and found lodgment in the States or foreign countries without the use of the mails. That Congress has the power to enact this measure is not controverted. The Louisiana Lottery was destroyed when access to the mails was denied it, and evidences are of daily occurrence where fraudulent organizations are driven from business by closing the mails to their communications and advertisements.

The confiscation of all articles produced by monopolies in restraint of trade and carrying on interstate-commerce business would be a powerful blow against them. If, for instance, the binding twine trust knew that whenever it loaded a car with binding twine and shipped it beyond the State in which it was manufactured, it was subject to seizure by the Government, who can doubt but what this trust would hesitate long before undertaking so great a risk? And can there be any doubt but what a few seizures would result in the dissolution of the trust?

Another potent provision is offered to suppress monopolies. It is shown in section 12 of the Terry bill.

It is known to all that the Dingley tariff law has been a prolific breeder of trusts. Instead of being a bill to raise revenue by tariff duties, it is a measure to increase internal taxation and to prohibit importations in order to foster monopolies and permit the home manufacturer to absolutely control the market.

A few years ago the duty collected upon imported articles was equivalent to from four to five dollars per capita; now it is less than $2 per capita. Taking advantage of these prohibitive tariff duties, manufacturers in the United States have combined to create grinding monopolies. If the President were directed to suspend the tariff laws with respect to articles controlled by these unlawful combinations, it would be a long step in the direction of breaking down the trusts. That such legislation is constitutional is conceded. Under Republican laws the President is authorized to order a suspension of tariff duties, in his efforts to promote free trade or reciprocity between the United States and other nations.

The Federal Government is not limited in its power to prevent combinations in restraint of trade to the interstate-commerce clause or the clause under which it controls the postal affairs of the Government. It possesses the taxing power, which, as Chief Justice Marshall said, "is the power to destroy." Congress has resorted to it upon numerous occasions. All are familiar with what is considered by many the arbitrary manner in which it was exercised to destroy State banks.

Congress has the power to tax corporations and business pursuits. It taxes those who are engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine, and a bill is now pending to impose a tax of 10 cents per pound upon all oleomargarine manufactured in the United States. Suppose that under this taxing power the products of every trust and monopoly were heavily taxed, can anyone doubt what the result would be?

Under the taxing power, Congress can impose a graduated occupation tax upon corporations engaged in interstate commerce. It could be so levied with reference to the capital employed as to render unprofitable the formation of gigantic trusts or combinations and monopolies.

It has also been suggested during this discussion that the patent laws, which protect the use of inventions for a term of years, be so amended as to provide that whenever any trust acquires the use or control of an invention the benefit of the law be denied. When it is remembered that many trusts are aided materially by the exclusive use of some device or article or invention, it will be clear to all that if the use of such invention were accorded to all, without limitations, it would seriously affect trusts.

These and many other remedies can be provided against the peril of monopolies, regarded as so ominous. The power is ample to absolutely destroy every trust and monopoly in the land. The trouble is that the forces of wealth are so strongly intrenched, the influences of the plutocrat and monopolist are so extensive, and their control over public affairs and public men is so great that legislation which will accomplish the desired result is not enacted.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic party is fighting the battle of the people and to preserve civilization and liberty in the earth. It seeks a return to fundamental principles, and the overthrow of the pernicious policies prevailing in the land.

The Republican party, dominated by the selfish and sordid commercialism of the hour, has been untrue to the interests of the people.

In the coming contest the Democratic party will confidently appeal to the patriotism of the American people, believing that the party which is fighting their battles and strenuously contending for the preservation of the Republic and the liberties of the people will be rewarded with victory.

North Carolina Suffrage—The Proposed Amendment to the Constitution of the State.

There is only one course open for the white men of North Carolina to pursue. Let them stand by their homes; let them preserve the civilization of their fathers and solemnly resolve to maintain the supremacy of the race who founded this Republic and have preserved its institutions. Thus will contentment, good government, and prosperity prevail and the happiness of all her people be conserved.

HON. JOHN H. SMALL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 3, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11212) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. SMALL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I dislike to obtrude upon the House any remarks upon the administration of the internal affairs in my State, but the circumstances seem to demand it. The people of North Carolina are conservative in the management of their own internal affairs, and they are patriotic in their relations to the Government of the United States. They are quiet, unobtrusive, patient, and long-suffering, and yet, when they are aroused to action against injustice, misgovernment, and internal disorders, they are determined, persistent, and irresistible. Since the adoption of the fifteenth amendment and the assumption of their relations with the Union they have at all times shown a disposition to accept the new conditions and have always accorded full justice to the negro race. The negro has been protected in his civil and political rights, and her courts have at all times been open to him to redress any invasion upon his rights of person or property. As burdensome as was the duty, her people with open-handed generosity have provided for the unfortunate of that race, as is evidenced by the splendid asylums which have been constructed and maintained for the deaf and dumb and blind and insane within her borders.

Schoolhouses have been built and teachers have been employed for the education of the children of that race, and such advancement as they have made since the days of slavery is due to the generosity and justice of the white man alone. Only a pittance of the vast sums which have been expended for the benefit of the negro in North Carolina during the last thirty-five years has been contributed by the negro himself. While entertaining the opinion that the conferring of the franchise upon the negro by virtue of the provisions of the fifteenth amendment was a mistake and a crime against civilization, yet they have accepted the inevitable with patience and forbearance. If the negro had been fitted to exercise the responsibilities of citizenship or if he had shown capability of appreciating his new relations with the white people of the State, it is not probable that there would have been any race issue presented as a source of constant friction for determination. He was not content to vote in solid mass with one political party, but whenever the opportunity presented he insisted either upon electing to office the worst representatives of that party or in aspiring to office himself, either one of which courses has always resulted in local misgovernment, debauchery, or corruption.

There are in many counties good Republicans, but they were in a hopeless minority and were powerless to check the results of negro domination. The result has been that the dominant element which controls the vote of the negroes has always brought bad government to the State, counties, or the towns whenever they have exercised control. This state of affairs could not continue indefinitely, and it reached its climax after the general elections in North Carolina in 1896. In 1898 a legislature was elected not only representative of the best element of the white people of the State, but the individual members of that body constituted the very flower of North Carolina manhood. When this body met in January, 1899, they conferred with serious and patriotic deliberation upon the conditions which had prevailed, and in response to a well-grounded sentiment they drafted an amendment to the State constitution regulating the exercise of the suffrage. This amendment was not adopted in a convention removed from the immediate supervision of the people, but has been submitted to the popular vote at an election to be held in August next. There will be a full discussion of its provisions, and the people will have an opportunity to pass upon it at the polls.

THE PEOPLE OF NORTH CAROLINA ARE CAPABLE OF DECIDING THIS QUESTION.

It would have been most appropriate if the people of the State had been permitted to discuss and decide this question without outside interference. Each State in its sovereign capacity has the right to fix the qualifications for the exercise of suffrage by its citizens, subject only to the limitation that such provision shall not contravene the Constitution of the United States. Congress can exercise no judicial functions, and no question has been presented to this Congress which would give it the right to pass either directly or indirectly upon the proposed amendment to our constitution. It will be time enough when the amendment is adopted to institute before the proper court any inquiry as to its constitutional features.

In the face of this condition the senior Senator from North Carolina, Senator PRITCHARD, saw fit to introduce a resolution in the United States Senate during the early days of this session attempting to have that body pass quasi judgment upon the proposed amendment. The resolution was not introduced with any idea that it would be considered by the Senate, but with the purpose of discussing it before the country and with a view of influencing the voters of the State. The Senate is largely Republican, and if they had desired to do so, or had the right to do so, they could have passed this resolution at any moment. The junior Senator from my State, Senator BUTLER, who was elected as a Populist, although by fusion with the Republicans, also submitted some remarks in the Senate based upon the resolution of his colleague, and sought to inveigh against the proposed amendment and the people of his State. He has taken this position, although the large majority of the Populists in the State are zealously supporting the amendment, and in the face of the fact that the State Populist convention, which recently met in Raleigh, declined to declare against it and left it to the decision of the individual voter.

This House has also been edified by some remarks upon this question by the member from the Eighth district [Mr. LINNEY], who chose not only to make an inconsistent tirade against the amendment, but he professes to find in the election laws of the State much to make him unhappy. His panegyric upon fair elections will deceive no member of this House and will be correctly interpreted by his constituents in his district. I am tempted at this stage to make reference to the variegated political opinions and the assumed indignation of the gentleman from the Eighth district [Mr. LINNEY]. He has professed allegiance to all political parties and been an extremist in each. How ridiculous that the gentleman should pose as the exponent of fair election methods! By what right does he essay to deliver a moral lecture to the people of North Carolina as to the manner of their elections? Certainly he does not obtain such authority by virtue of his present allegiance to the Republican party. Certainly he can not claim the right to teach the best people of the State their duty in elections by virtue of his own past record, if I have read correctly the political biography of the gentleman who claims no other criterion in political morals than the demands of political necessity.

One need go no further back than the record of the gentleman in the recent contest before this House of Pearson vs. Crawford and wherein he played the leading rôle in the disfranchisement of more than 19,000 voters in the Ninth district of North Carolina. It would be gratifying to the country to have the opinion of these sturdy mountaineers, whose ballots have been nullified and whose good name has been traduced, as to the political morality of this modern apostle of honest elections. And this opinion will be pronounced in no uncertain terms, not only by the men whose votes have been cast aside, but their brethren all over the State will join in resentment of this high-handed outrage. The colleague of the gentleman from the Eighth district [Mr. WHITE] has also essayed to express his opinion of the white men of North Carolina and of their attempt to guard the exercise of the franchise. It may also be gratifying to the member from the Second district to know that it was his vote that made possible the unseating of Crawford and the seating of PEARSON. However satisfactory to some persons this fact may appear, it will hardly tend to alleviate the righteous indignation of the men of the mountain district at the crime which has been committed against them. Mr. Chairman, such speeches and representations in this Congress have made it appropriate that some comments should be submitted in defense of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent.

THE RACE QUESTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

There exists a deep-seated reason for the submission of this amendment in my State. The whole number of electors in the State are probably not more than 340,000, but certainly not to exceed 360,000, and of this number at least one-third, or 120,000, are negroes. If you take 65,000 from the 240,000 white voters and add these to the 120,000 colored voters you have a majority of 5,000 over the remaining white voters in the State. The senior Senator from North Carolina admits that there are twelve counties in the State which have a majority of negroes. In connection with these facts, if you will consider the further fact that these twelve counties are situated in the eastern part of the State and that most of the negroes in the other counties are similarly situated, it will be apparent that the situation is very much complicated.

That we have had negro domination in North Carolina can not be questioned by anyone familiar with the conditions, and the situation has appealed for some appropriate solution. I have been very much relieved upon this point by the able and painstaking speech of my colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, who has submitted facts and illustrations which must have convinced the most skeptical of the truthfulness of this statement. I shall not repeat the statement of fact which he has given, but will state that I believe all of the representations made by my colleague are absolutely correct and have not in the least exaggerated the prevailing conditions. I desire, however, to call attention to a statement made by Senator PRITCHARD, interpolated by him in the speech of Senator H. D. MONEY of Mississippi, while discussing the question of suffrage in North Carolina. Senator MONEY had just read the affidavit of Hon. J. D. BELLAMY with reference to the condition of affairs in Wilmington, N. C. I will now read an extract from the RECORD:

Mr. MONEY. But certainly the Senator will not deny the statement made by Mr. BELLAMY under oath, that forty of the magistrates were negroes, and that many other officers of that city and county were also negroes, and the condition of things which existed there during the time of that canvass.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I am not prepared to deny what Mr. BELLAMY has said about the matter, but I am prepared to show that there is not a single instance wherein one of the colored justices of the peace to whom my distinguished friend refers ever attempted to exercise jurisdiction in a case wherein a white man was concerned or interested, either in property or otherwise.

Mr. MONEY. That may be true.

Mr. PRITCHARD. That is absolutely true.

Mr. MONEY. I do not doubt but that you think so; but it is a very queer magistrate who discards jurisdiction because of the color of the man who comes before him—a very queer sort of a magistrate.

Now, this condition of things exists in a part of North Carolina. There is not a particle of doubt about it, and the legislature has sought to put an end to it.

It is fair to presume that the honorable Senator from North Carolina intended to make the statement that there was not a single instance in the entire State where any colored justices of the peace attempted to exercise jurisdiction as to the property or personal rights of white persons. If he knew of such an instance he ought to have admitted it, and I have no reason to believe that he would have denied it. It is therefore the charitable view to take that the Senator had no knowledge of any such instance.

After the publication of the speech of Senator MONEY and of this colloquy, and the matter had been called to the attention of the citizens of Newbern, N. C., evidence was formulated and intended to be submitted to Senator MONEY. I will now read an affidavit by Hon. L. J. Moore, of Newbern, N. C., who is a distinguished lawyer of many years' practice, and was for years a prominent Republican. He now holds the position of referee in bankruptcy in the eastern district in North Carolina. His statement is verified before Romulus A. Nunn, a notary public. The facts contained in the statement by Mr. Moore are also sworn to by J. J. Baxter, S. R. Street, a notary public and justice of the peace, M. W. Watson, clerk of the superior court, and F. T. Patterson, the present mayor of the city of Newbern:

NEWBERN, N. C., February 28, 1900.

Hon. H. D. MONEY,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Senator PRITCHARD would lead the Senate to believe that negro justices of the peace in North Carolina had not issued any process against white persons, and had not exercised jurisdiction over the rights of person and property of whites.

I can not see what moved the Senator to make such statements.

I am a practicing attorney of thirty years' experience and upward and resident in Newbern, and have been known by Senator PRITCHARD for about thirty years, and have no interest in the matter except to let the truth be known.

The following facts are of my own knowledge: In 1896 I was called upon to defend Mrs. George W. Gaskill, wife of a druggist, and a white lady of high character and standing, on a charge of abducting a negro girl made in a warrant issued by H. H. Green, a negro justice of the peace, and placed in the hands of a negro constable to be served on the complaint of a negro, and returnable in the barber shop of said justice, situate in the negro quarter of this city and patronized exclusively by negroes. The attorney representing the prosecutor was also colored. My client did not care to appear in said court under all the attractions presented and I desired to waive examination and give bond to appear in the higher court. The justice and prosecuting attorney insisted on the defendant's presence, and not until the threat of the rising of the white people and the intervention of J. P. Stanly, the negro constable of the city, used his good offices, did the court waive the presence of the defendant. There was absolutely no pretense of a foundation for the charge, and the action was dismissed in the higher court.

In the spring of 1896 the same justice of the peace, on the complaint of a negress, issued a warrant against a white woman, who was arrested under it and taken to said barber shop, prosecuted by a colored lawyer, and bound over to court. The only white persons present were my client, Mr. D. L. Ward, my associate counsel, and myself. The balance of those present consisted of about 150 negroes.

Only a few weeks ago M. W. Chapman, a negro justice of the peace, issued process against H. W. Steinhilper, a highly respected citizen, who came here some years ago from Pennsylvania and was then a Republican.

There have been a great many cases in this county since 1895 in which negro justices exercised their official functions over the personal and property rights of whites, and in fact it has been a matter of frequent occurrence.

The constable of this township has been J. P. Stanly, colored, and he has served criminal and civil process on hundreds and perhaps thousands of white persons.

The colored deputy sheriffs have, during the same time, likewise arrested and served other process on a great many white people.

Truly,

L. J. MOORE.

The above does not constitute an isolated instance. Certain interested gentlemen, who should know better, have endeavored to ridicule the statement that there has been negro domination in North Carolina; but they nevertheless know that they have misrepresented the facts, or, like the honorable Senator, they must plead ignorance for their statement.

Such were the conditions which prevailed in North Carolina, and so numerous were the offices held by negroes that it was beginning to be considered an ideal location for negroes to hold office, and these facts were generally recognized by the race outside of the State. In the Independent, which, as I understand, is a paper published for the colored race in the city of Washington, D. C., there appeared in the early part of 1898 an editorial referring to North Carolina, which was entitled "The best State for negroes." The editorial is as follows:

[From the Independent.]

BEST STATE FOR NEGROES.

North Carolina is, probably, the best State now for the negro. He is recognized politically, and is allowed to speak for himself. There is also far less conflict between him and the whites, especially the people of the mountains, than in Georgia and Tennessee. A colored Representative has been sent from North Carolina to nearly every Congress since the war, and one man held his district for seven sessions. South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Virginia, Mississippi, Florida, and Alabama have all sent colored members, and at one time there were seven negroes in the House. At present we have but one, the Hon. GEORGE H. WHITE, of North Carolina. A graduate of Howard University, he has long had his home in Washington, and is well known among the colored people here. He is a man of tact, as well as judgment, for he has succeeded in appointing, without difficulty, forty colored postmasters in his district. When we remember the horrible tragedy in South Carolina a few weeks ago over such an appointment, this is remarkable and encouraging.

I direct attention to the fact that not only were negroes holding offices under the State, but according to this statement, Congressman WHITE, the only negro Representative in the House, had succeeded in having 40 colored postmasters appointed in his district. It is true that many of these have since been found incompetent and have been charged with defalcation in office and have been convicted and punished, but this does not affect the conditions which I have attempted to portray.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY FAVORS THE APPOINTMENT OF NEGROES TO OFFICE.

It has frequently been charged by the white men of the South that the Republican party favored the appointment of negroes to office, and they have often complained of this policy of that party.

They have submitted time and again the reasonable statement that negroes should not hold office which brought them in contact with white people and which thus enabled negro officeholders to conduct themselves offensively toward the white people of the South. This statement has often been denied by local Republicans in North Carolina, particularly during the campaigns, and they have endeavored to persuade white voters that the success of that party did not carry with it the appointment of negro officeholders. That such is the fact, however, is well known, and in corroboration I am glad to be able to quote such high authority as Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR, the distinguished member of this House from the State of Ohio. He modestly disclaims being the representative of the present Administration, but nevertheless he is recognized as occupying a very high place in the estimation of the President and in the councils of his party.

General GROSVENOR has just made a speech in the House from which I quote:

I can not let pass this opportunity, at the close of a long session of this Congress and at the end of three years of this Administration, without putting into permanent form for a record to enlighten future generations the history of the part which the colored citizen has had in the stirring events of this remarkable period.

The speaker then proceeds to narrate the part which the negro played in the recent war with Spain and the number of officers and enlisted men which participated. I again quote:

In the civil service of the Government the colored man has participated more fully than ever before. President McKinley, who has always shown a disposition to honor the race and to grant it a fair and just share of the honors he had the power to bestow, has called the colored man to many positions of honor, to a larger number than any other President in the history of the country. * * *

Now let us consider the financial side of the question. The colored citizens had during the war 206 officers, approximated, and a fair average of salaries, at $1,600, $425,600; 14,784 privates, at $208, $3,075,472; 5,000 men employed as drivers, cooks, servants, laborers, etc., at $250 per year, $1,250,000. Total, $4,751,072.

Add to this the honor attached to the following names and positions: Col. J. R. Marshall, of Illinois; Col. James Young, of North Carolina; Col. J. M. Brown, of Kansas; Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor, of North Carolina; Maj. John R. Lynch, of Mississippi; Maj. R. R. Wright, of Georgia; Maj. Charles Young, of Ohio; Major Haywood, of North Carolina; Major Walker, of North Carolina.

PROMINENT COLORED MEN IN THE COUNTRY'S SERVICE.

The following is a partial list of colored men and women in the service of the country, appointed in every instance by President McKinley or those acting under his instructions. And here it is proper to say that while Mr. McKinley has been deeply engrossed with the most intricate problems of statecraft, he has not been unmindful of the just claims of the race. He has distributed the official rewards with rare tact and judgment, and no element which assisted in the masterful triumph of 1896 is without representation. The negro vote has fared handsomely at his hands. Colored men of intelligence and character have been selected from every section of the country to fill positions of trust and profit under the Administration, and the instance has yet to be recorded where the honor has been bestowed unworthily.

Indeed, while it is a fact of great significance that the President has within nineteen months appointed fully twice as many negroes as any previous Administration, developments are now being so shaped by him, through a revision of the civil-service regulations, that the number of negro officeholders will be increased fourfold. Not only this, but the constitutional rights of the negro will continue to be sacredly regarded and his future in the new possessions will be surrounded by every guaranty calculated to insure his peace and material well-being. The great work which the Administration has done in the line of negro recognition is graphically illustrated by the subjoined roster, which gives some of the more important positions to which eminent negroes have been assigned since the advent of the present régime. From this roster is omitted dozens of Army appointments, scores of civil-service appointments, promotions, and retentions, State recognition, and hundreds of minor departmental positions, which are the legitimate fruits of the great victory of 1896, and which should be placed to the credit of the Administration.

It will be observed from the reading of the above panegyric upon the President and his Administration that in the list of Federal appointments given to colored men and located in the United States all except two are located in the South, the two exceptions being the postmasters located in Pennsylvania. After a careful search I am unable to find the name of one negro appointed to office in the State of Ohio or in the great States of the Northwest. Why this discrimination? Certainly there are some negroes in Ohio, and certainly they would accept office. This speech was evidently intended to influence the negro vote in Ohio and other Northern and Western States. Why has not this liberal policy toward the race been exemplified in the President's own State? The people of the South will consider these questions very pertinent.

ANOTHER WITNESS.

In the light of the above record made by the present Administration of the Republican party I recur to an extract from a speech made by the Hon. GEORGE H. WHITE, Republican member of Congress from the Second district of North Carolina, the only negro member of Congress in the United States. He was addressing, in 1898, the Republican State convention in Raleigh, and he has been frequently quoted as using these words:

I am not the only negro who holds office; there are others. There are plenty more being made to order to hold offices. We do not hold as many as we will. The Democrats talk about the color line and the negro holding office. I invite the issue.

The newspapers reported that these sentiments were loudly applauded.

THE NEGRO HAS NOT EXHIBITED CAPACITY FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The best sentiment of the people of this country now recognizes the fact that the fifteenth amendment was a monumental mistake. Even the honorable Senator, Mr. PRITCHARD, said in his speech before the Senate:

I do not propose to discuss the question as to whether or not the adoption of the fifteenth amendment was the particular course to pursue at that time.

The junior Senator from North Carolina, Mr. BUTLER, in his speech before the Senate said:

I believe that the majority of the voters of this State would to-morrow, if the question were before them, vote to repeal or amend the fifteenth amendment.

At the session of that voluntary convention which recently met in Montgomery, Ala., to discuss the question of negro suffrage, it was contended by speakers from the North and the South that this amendment was a mistake and that it was a blow at the civilization and progress of the Southern States. There are various eminent Republicans throughout the country who do not hesitate in private conversation to make the same admission. I do not intend to speak unkindly in making the statement that the negroes have not measured up to the expectation of many of their best friends in the North in the discharge of their duties as citizens and voters. As a race they do not exhibit the capacity to appreciate their condition or their limitations. They have not shown the capacity to govern nor do they seem to possess the other equally important faculty of submission to wise leadership.

One would suppose that they would take note of the discussions which have proceeded for many years concerning their status as citizens and voters and recognize their incapacity, and under wise counsel would endeavor to fit themselves for their proper station. The white people of the South do not feel unkindly toward them; in fact, eliminating their fruitless ambition to hold office and institute bad government, the white people are their best friends and their wisest counselors. They must know how futile it would be to meet the efforts of the white people of the South to elevate the franchise by exhibitions of force and violence, and yet some foolish leader of their race occasionally advises them to that effect. One of their reputed leaders, T. Thomas Fortune, an editor, of New York, recently made a speech in Brooklyn, an extract from which was recently published as a part of an editorial in the Washington Post, from which I quote:

SPECIMEN NEGRO LEADERS.

In significant contrast with the tone of the Montgomery conference (composed of white men) we find the New York Sun's account of a negro—we beg pardon, an Afro-American—meeting held in Brooklyn last Sunday evening, and of the temper of the address delivered on that halcyon occasion. The chief orators were T. Thomas Fortune, who seems to be an editor, and a Mr. W. O. Murphy, of whom we have not had the privilege of hearing until now, and whom, therefore, we can not accurately identify. It will be seen from the utterances, however, that they are both men of great force and wisdom and just the kind of leaders that a lot of fools, looking for trouble, would naturally select.

We give a few samples of Mr. T. Thomas Fortune's interesting froth:

"It cost tons of blood to put the fifteenth amendment into the Constitution, and it will cost tens of tons to put it out. You must organize and keep your powder dry in order to demand an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth in the great crisis which will soon be upon the negro, in which much blood may be spilled. The first gun of the fight was fired at the Montgomery conference.

* * * * * * *

"If the negro wants his rights in the South, he must fight for them, or he must leave the South. I have formerly opposed Bishop Turner in his appeal to the negroes to leave the South, but I shall myself start a crusade to have all the negroes leave the South and come North, or go elsewhere where they can be men.

"There is no use living in the South and crying, 'Peace, peace!' when there is no peace. I believe in law and order, but when the law does not protect you, you should fight and die, if need be. You should demand an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. The negro will never command respect until he shall strike a blow that will win for himself the respect of the world, for even God has no respect for a coward. The negro should be brave and follow his leaders, whether they lead to Calvary or to a scaffold in West Virginia. There is coming a great crisis for the negro, and the first gun was fired at Montgomery, Ala., when it was proposed that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution should be repealed. But there can be no settling of the negro problem with the negro out of it, it matters not how many conferences of white men are held.

"There are now 10,000,000 of us, with 2,000,000 fighting men, and in some great crisis in this country these 2,000,000 negroes will get at the throats of the white men who have wronged and outraged their citizenship."

It was hardly kind on the part of the Sun to reproduce this lamentable paroxysm so literally. It puts Mr. Fortune in a very ridiculous position. Haranguing an ignorant and excitable crowd for purposes of mere temporary popularity is one thing. To have the pestiferous drivel put in cold type for the perusal of intelligent and responsible people is quite another thing. Normally, Mr. Fortune is not the stupid incendiary indicated by his Brooklyn speech. He is well educated, a good and forcible writer, and, under ordinary circumstances, a very sensible and well-meaning person. We wonder whether he realizes that in this frantic outburst he has illustrated the most pessimistic estimate of the negro character—the proposition, for example, that no amount of scholastic training or contact with Caucasian civilization will ever eradicate the savage instincts of his race.

With rare exceptions it would appear that the so-called leaders of the race are wonderfully adept in giving bad advice to their followers. They do not seem able to withstand prosperity, and slight elevation renders them utterly unfit for the exercise of common sense and patriotic judgment. The situation has been so well portrayed by the recent editorial in the Philadelphia Record that it is worth quoting. It illustrates the statement just made that this race question is one which agitates the whole country and is to be considered and solved in a spirit of justice and with due regard to our future civilization and progress. I quote this editorial as follows:

NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

[Philadelphia Record.]

There is very little difference of opinion among those persons who have given the question of negro suffrage dispassionate investigation that the unqualified extension of the elective franchise to the negro race, on the same terms upon which it has been exercised by whites, has resulted in practical failure. It was a terrible mistake to add such a large element of incapacity and ignorance to the body of the electorate. But, having made the negro a voter, and having fastened the suffrage upon him by constitutional provision, what remedy is possible? We can not deport the negro, nor stop the increase of the negro population. We can not deprive him of the full citizenship bestowed upon him. Unless we can bring him up to the measure of intelligence necessary to safe participation in the duties of self-government, we shall have imperiled our own without improving his position.

The people of the Southern States are taking the only practical way toward a remedy by making the right to vote subject to certain qualifications. The voter must either be able to read and write, or must be the owner of a certain amount of property. * * *

The negro in the United States is the white man's burden. He is becoming more and more a peril in the Northern as well as in the Southern States as a helper in debauching the suffrage. He must be lifted up to a higher plane of life and living or he will pull us down nearer his level. The way to elevate him is to draw the line around the ballot box so that the approach to it shall come through the schoolhouse. This is an immediate question in Virginia, where the people have voted for a revision of the State constitution; but it is hardly less important in Pennsylvania.

WHAT SAY THE WHITE MEN OF NORTH CAROLINA?

In the face of the almost universal sentiment which prevails upon this question of negro suffrage; in the face of the fact that unqualified suffrage for the negro has brought upon the State so many instances of misgovernment, misrule, peculation, and other evils, What shall be the course of the white man in the South—of the white men of North Carolina—in the face of the proposition which is submitted, the object of which is to remedy in part the evils which have resulted? This question must be settled by the white man. The negro has never yet risen to an appreciation of his true position and he may be expected to solidly oppose any efforts to elevate suffrage. No friend of his race, no wellwisher of his kind can hesitate as to his plain duty in the emergency which is presented.

IS THE AMENDMENT CONSTITUTIONAL?

I shall not submit the argument which I have prepared upon this point, both for lack of time and because the question has already been so ably considered by many eminent lawyers. Many of the most learned lawyers in North Carolina have studied this question and have over their own signatures submitted briefs upon the same and have, in their opinion, said that it was not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Among others I might mention the names of such well-known lawyers as Hon. George Rountree, of Wilmington; Hon. James H. Merrimon, of Asheville; Hon. F. H. Busbee, Hon. James E. Shepherd, of Raleigh; Hon. T. M. Argo, of Raleigh; Hon. Thomas Settle, of Asheville (the last two prominent Republicans); Hon. W. A. Guthrie, of Durham (a prominent Populist); Hon. William Shepard Bryan, of Baltimore; Hon. W. W. KITCHIN, a member of this House, and Hon. H. G. Connor, of Wilson, and others.

There is no more distinguished lawyer in the State than Hon. J. E. Shepherd, until recently chief justice of the supreme court. His opinion was largely upon the question as to whether, if any part of the amendment were declared unconstitutional, such part would be eliminated or the whole would fail, in which he ably sustained the latter contention. I will simply quote his brief statement upon the constitutionality of the amendment as a whole:

I do not understand that in reference to your first question—that is, as to the constitutionality of the proposed amendment of our State constitution—you expect me to write an opinion. I am glad of this, as the ground is so completely covered by the able arguments of Judges Merrimon and Connor, Representatives Rountree and Winston (whom I think were in charge of the bill), Major Guthrie, Mr. Busbee, Mr. Simmons, and other prominent gentlemen both in and outside the legislature, that anything I might say would be a needless repetition. I will therefore merely express my concurrence in the conclusion they have reached that the amendment is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution and the amendments thereto.

The Republicans in the State should entertain some confidence in its constitutionality because of the opinions of Hon. Thomas Settle, former Representative in Congress, and Hon. T. M. Argo, Hon. H. R. Starbuck, Hon. E. V. Cox, and Hon. A. W. Shaffer, all of whom are eminent Republicans. Populists should have at least confidence in its constitutionality, because the ablest lawyer in their party, and who was their candidate for governor in 1896, Hon. W. A. Guthrie, of Durham, has written a most able and instructive argument to the effect that the amendment is clearly constitutional. A copy of the amendment as recently amended at the adjourned session of the general assembly of North Carolina will be appended as a part of my remarks.

If further legal advice were necessary, I will state that a large number of the leading lawyers of North Carolina have generally signed an opinion concurring in the conclusion that the amendment is not in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It must be borne in mind that since this opinion was written and signed the general assembly has met and consolidated sections 4 and 5. As amended, it also contains a provision that all the sections shall be considered indivisible, making clear that the intent of the legislature was that the several sections should stand or fall as a whole. I submit the opinion, as follows:

The undersigned lawyers, members of the North Carolina bar, after having examined and considered the provisions of the proposed amendment to the Constitution submitted by the legislature of 1899 to the people for ratification, give it as our opinion that the said amendment is not in conflict either with the State or Federal Constitution.

We further give it as our opinion that the fourth and fifth sections of said amendment are so connected in subject-matter, each so clearly dependent and conditioned upon the other, that both must stand or fall together, and that it is too clear to admit of a doubt that the fourth section can not stand if the fifth section should be declared unconstitutional.

It is clear this amendment, if ratified, will not disfranchise, either now or hereafter, any person who was himself entitled to vote at any time prior to 1867, or whose ancestors were entitled to vote at any time prior to 1867, either in this State or any State in the United States in which he then resided, provided he registers once before 1908 and does not thereafter become disqualified by crime.

Of course it is understood that those who contend that it is unconstitutional take the position that it violates the fifteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, which reads as follows:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The honorable Senator, Mr. PRITCHARD, who is an acknowledged Republican leader in North Carolina, has made several speeches in the State, and, as I am informed, has argued that the effect of the amendment would be to disfranchise poor white men as well as negroes, and that the plain provision of the amendment in favor of the illiterate white would prove ineffectual. However that may be, yet Senator PRITCHARD in his speech before the Senate admitted that the amendment would not prevent illiterate white men from voting who registered prior to 1908. I will quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that part of the speech of the Senator containing the colloquy between the Senator, Senator CHANDLER, and Senator MASON:

Mr. PRITCHARD. It is plain that it is an attempt to deprive the colored race of the right to vote, which is now guaranteed them by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator if he knows why the date January 1, 1867, was fixed?

Mr. PRITCHARD. It was fixed, I understand, with a view of caring for the white men of the State who were entitled to vote at that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. That being the date of the reconstruction acts of Congress which gave the right to the colored people to vote?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes, sir. You will remember that the fifteenth amendment was not ratified by the several States and the result announced until about the 20th of March, 1870, I believe it was. In 1867 they were not entitled to vote.

Mr. MASON. That is, the ancestor of the black man was not entitled to vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD. No, sir.

Mr. MASON. But the ancestor of the white man was?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes.

Mr. MASON. Regardless of any qualifications?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONEY. I did not intend to do so but for the two questions put by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Illinois. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that the descendants of those who could vote in 1867 were entitled to vote under the proposed amendment. That is your proposition?

Mr. PRITCHARD. That is what the proposed amendment provides.

Mr. MONEY. They are not compelled to comply with the requirements of section 4 of the proposed amendment?

Mr. PRITCHARD. The way the constitutional amendment was read at the desk was that those who voted at that time——

Mr. MONEY. Or prior to that time.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. Either in North Carolina or in any other State.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. Does not the Senator from North Carolina know that up to 1835 the colored people did vote and there must be in that State a great many descendants of such people; and is it not quite likely that many colored people under the amendment will be able to vote? I only ask that question in view of the two questions which have been asked.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me, I will ask a question so that he can answer it with the question of the Senator from Mississippi. The question is whether that language was not intended by the framers to mean white people alone?

Mr. PRITCHARD. I so understand it.

I will also quote from the same speech a question to the Senator by Senator CAFFERY, and his answer thereto:

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRITCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. The fifth section of the amendment proposed for adoption by the people of North Carolina provides virtually that all white men who could vote on or before the 1st of January, 1867, their sons and grandsons, shall be entitled to vote under the suffrage amendment, notwithstanding that they do not possess the qualifications required by the fourth section. Now, would not that qualify the illiterate white people whom he says this ordinance would deprive of the right of suffrage?

Mr. PRITCHARD. It would, provided the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that section 5 is constitutional. I will discuss that phase of the question later on.

Now, I submit that the distinguished Senator should take either one horn or the other of the dilemma. Having admitted in the Senate that the amendment will discriminate against the negro and that the object of the amendment is not to disfranchise a single white man, we must insist that he shall maintain the same position in his speeches before the people of North Carolina or else publicly retract his declarations made in the Senate. Perhaps the distinguished Senator may decide to stand by his construction of the amendment as announced in the Senate. Hence these tears.

LOUISIANA AND ITS CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

In 1898 the people of Louisiana adopted an amendment to the constitution of that State substantially similar to that proposed to be adopted in North Carolina, except that the North Carolina amendment does not contain a property qualification. If the results of the operations of this amendment have been satisfactory to the people of that State, if it has brought contentment to her people, honest State and local government, and has contributed to her material progress, such results would necessarily be influential with the voters of North Carolina in determining their course in the coming election. Fortunately there is abundant evidence, which can not be contradicted, as to the favorable results which have been attained in our sister State.

Hon. Josephus Daniels, the able and versatile editor of the News and Observer, an influential paper published at Raleigh, N. C., recently made an extended trip through Louisiana. The results of his observations have been published in his paper and circulated among the people of the State. The testimony of the best people of Louisiana, composed of professional men, active politicians, prominent farmers, and representatives of various business interests all concurred in the statement that the operation of the amendment had been entirely satisfactory, that her people were never more contented, that honest and peaceable elections had been assured, and that a stable and progressive government thereunder would be maintained in all the future for that State.

Recently Louisiana has had her first general election under the operation of her amendment. The members of Congress from that State were present during the campaign which preceded the election, and they bear willing testimony to the truth of the observations which have been above outlined.

I shall now read a letter from Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, Member from the First district, and Hon. R. C. DAVEY, Member of Congress from the Second district of Louisiana, and also a letter from Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, Member of Congress from the Fifth district of Louisiana:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1900.

DEAR SIR: At your request, we, the undersigned, members of Congress from the State of Louisiana, submit the following statement in regard to the constitutional amendment adopted in the State of Louisiana in 1898: This amendment is substantially similar to the proposed amendment for North Carolina. We have just held in Louisiana our first general and State election since the adoption of this amendment, and we had an opportunity to observe the working of the same. We had the most quiet and satisfactory election which has been held for years, and the election was conducted with absolute fairness and with entire satisfaction to the white people of the State.

Every white man who could vote prior to 1867, or whose ancestors could vote, has had an opportunity to register and vote in the State, and no white man has been disfranchised.

The white people of the State are satisfied with the conditions existing under the amended constitution, and would not repeal the amendment if they had an opportunity to do so.

The best lawyers in the State of Louisiana who have examined the question believe that the amendments which have been adopted are not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and we have heard of no one in the State who intends or threatens to contest the constitutionality of same. Not only has our first election under the amended constitution been peaceable and orderly and fair, but we expect to have a continuance of good government and contentment and progress in Louisiana for all time to come, because the government of the State has now been placed in the hands of the white people.

Very respectfully,

ADOLPH MEYER,
Member of Congress from the First District of Louisiana.

R. C. DAVEY,
Member of Congress from the Second District of Louisiana.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1900.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry about the practical workings of the suffrage clauses of the Louisiana constitution of 1898, I desire to say that the people of my State are very much pleased with same. Under its provisions we have held municipal elections in many of the towns of the State and in the city of New Orleans, one special election to fill a vacancy in Congress caused by death, and a general State election for all offices from governor to constable. The New Orleans election in December, 1899, and the State election last April were very hotly contested by rival white factions and the law had a thorough and complete test. It was demonstrated beyond any question that the negro has ceased to be an important factor in Louisiana politics, and that every white man who could vote anywhere in the Union prior to January 1, 1867, or whose ancestors were legal voters then, can now register and vote in Louisiana. These elections were perfectly fair in every respect, and their results were cheerfully accepted by all.

In the great "black belt" where I live there are about nine negroes to one white man, but the registration books showed fully ten times as many whites registered as negroes, and there were so few of the latter entitled to vote that they took no interest whatever in the election. It was, for the first time in many years, a white man's election. I believe the negroes are well satisfied with the law. If there was any complaint or dissatisfaction among them because of it, I have yet to hear of same.

When the convention was in session the constitutionality of this law—the so-called grandfather clause—was thoroughly examined by the entire bar of the State and agreed to with practical unanimity. Further investigation has strengthened the conclusion then formed, and the best lawyers of the State agree that it does not violate the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. E. RANSDELL, M. C.,
Fifth District of Louisiana.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Washington, D. C.

When the amendment to the Louisiana constitution was being canvassed among her people, the same arguments were adduced against it as are now being urged in North Carolina. It was said to be unconstitutional by its opponents, and yet, although it has been in operation two years, and although the courts have been open to any citizen who might desire to test its constitutionality, no one during that time has instituted any such suit, and, according to uncontradicted testimony, no citizen in Louisiana has announced any intention of doing so.

I call upon some of the newly developed constitutional lawyers in North Carolina to kindly explain why an amendment so clearly unconstitutional, as they allege, has been permitted to stand unchallenged in another Southern State for two years.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND THE SUFFRAGE.

It would appear that our friends of the Republican party have not pursued an entirely consistent course upon the question of suffrage. While protesting with pious indignation against the sovereign right of the States of the South to prescribe the qualifications of electors and to regulate the exercise of the franchise along constitutional lines, that party has not applied the same standard in framing the laws governing suffrage in some of our newly acquired territories.

In the bill to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, and which passed the United States Senate, and was favorably reported to the House by the unanimous report of the committee, the following qualifications of electors were set forth. Section 60 of said bill provides as follows:

That in order to be qualified to vote for representatives, a person shall—
First. Be an actual citizen of the United States.
Second. Have resided in the Territory not less than one year preceding, and in the representative district in which he offers to register not less than three months immediately preceding the time at which he offers to register.
Third. Have attained an age of 21 years.
Fourth. Prior to each regular election, during the time prescribed by law for registration, have caused his name to be entered on the register of voters for representatives for his district.
Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid on or before the 1st day of March next preceding the date of registration all taxes due by him to the government.
Sixth. To be able to speak, read, and write the English or Hawaiian language.

SEC. 62. Provided the qualifications of voters for senators as follows: That in order to be qualified to vote for senators a person must possess all of the qualifications and be subject to all of the conditions required by this act of voters for representatives, and in addition thereto he shall own and be possessed in his own right of real property in the Territory of the value of not less than $1,000, and upon which local taxes shall have been paid on that valuation for the year next preceding the one in which such person offers to register; or shall have actually received a money income of not less than $600 during the year next preceding the 1st day of April next preceding the date of each registration.

The above provisions for qualifications of voters were retained in the bill as it passed the Senate and came over to the House, and was referred to the Committee on Territories, who reported the bill with substantially similar provisions. In lieu of the fifth qualification in the recital of qualifications for voters for representatives the House committee substituted these words:

Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid a poll tax of $1 for the current year, due by him to the government.

When this bill was before the House in Committee of the Whole, Mr. WHITE, member from North Carolina, moved to strike out the fifth provision of section 60, and, after debate, his motion was rejected.

Our friends the Republicans were twitted so frequently upon these provisions that subsequently, in committee of conference, the provision for the payment of taxes was stricken out of the bill, and also the property qualifications in section 62, providing qualifications for the election of senators.

The law as it finally passed Congress contains the same provisions as above cited, except that the fifth clause of the qualifications of voters for representatives was stricken out, and the property qualifications of voters for senators was also stricken out.

THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO.

Section 29 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, being "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," provides certain qualifications for voters for the election of delegates by the people of the island. I quote the following language from said section:

At such elections all citizens of Porto Rico shall be allowed to vote who have been bona fide residents for one year and who possess the other qualifications of voters under the laws and military orders in force on the 1st day of March, 1900, subject to such modifications and additional qualifications as to registration as may be prescribed by the executive council.

By the courtesy of the Secretary of War, I am enabled to present extracts from certain military orders in force in that island on the 1st day of March, 1900. General Orders, No. 112, promulgated by General Davis on August 7, 1899, contains these provisions:

4. The qualifications of the voter are that he must be a bona fide male resident of the municipality; he must be over 21 years of age; a taxpayer of record at the date of this order, or he must be able to read and write.

General Orders, No. 160, promulgated by General Davis on October 12, 1899, contains additional provisions, setting forth the qualifications of electors in municipal elections in that island. I quote from section 8:

An elector to vote at such elections shall possess the following qualifications:
(a) He must be a bona fide male resident of the municipality.
(b) He must be over 21 years of age on the date of the election.
(c) He must be a taxpayer of record in the municipality in which he votes at the date of this order, or he must be able to read and write.
(d) He must have resided in Porto Rico two years next preceding the date of his registration, and for the last six months of the two years within the municipality in which the election is held.
9. All candidates for office shall be able to read and write.
10. In determining the ability of voters to read and write any book or newspaper may be used, the voter being required to write one or more phrases from dictation, as may be required by the president of the board of supervisors.

To those who are acquainted with the condition of the people who inhabit the island of Porto Rico it will be perfectly apparent that in any elections held under the above laws regulating suffrage only a very small proportion of the male citizens of Porto Rico could vote. This fact was well known to General Davis, in command, and was well known in Congress when the act was passed providing a civil government for the people of that island.

Why will our Republican friends be inconsistent? Why do they desire to prevent the several States of the South from regulating the exercise of the franchise along constitutional lines? And why do they oppose their efforts to limit the exercise of the franchise to those of their citizens who are best qualified to exercise it?

SUFFRAGE UNDER THE CONSTITUTIONS OF SOME OF THE STATES OF THE NORTH.

It is known that the provisions of the constitutions of many of the States of the North provide rigid qualifications for the exercise of the suffrage. I have examined two volumes, entitled American Constitutions, containing copies of the constitutions of the several States of the Union which were in force on January 1, 1894, and I obtain my information from these volumes. I presume that the constitutions of none of the States to which I shall advert have been altered or amended since that date; at least I have no knowledge of such.

CONSTITUTION OF CONNECTICUT.

I quote from the constitution of Connecticut, touching the provisions as to suffrage:

ART. VIII. Every white male citizen of the United States who shall have attained the age of 21 years, who shall have resided in this State for a term of one year next preceding, and in the town in which he may offer himself to be admitted to the privileges of the elector at least six months next preceding the time he may so offer himself, and shall sustain a good moral character, shall, on his taking such oath as may be prescribed by law, be an elector.

The above article was adopted in 1845.

Article II, adopted October, 1855:

Every person shall be able to read any article of the Constitution or any section of the statutes of this State before being admitted an elector.

Article XXIII, adopted October, 1876:

That Article VIII of the amendments to the Constitution be amended by erasing the word "white" from the first line.

It will be observed that, according to the constitution of Connecticut, only white male citizens were entitled to vote until 1876:

CONSTITUTION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

ART. III. Every male citizen of 21 years of age and upward, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, who shall have resided within the Commonwealth one year, and within the town or district in which he may claim a right to vote, six calendar months next preceding the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, Senators, or Representatives, shall have a right to vote in such election of governor, lieutenant-governor, Senators, and Representatives, and no other person shall be entitled to vote in such elections.

ART. XX. No person shall have the right to vote, or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the Constitution in the English language, and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be 60 years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

ART. XXVIII. No person having served in the Army or Navy of the United States in time of war, and having been honorably discharged from such service, if otherwise qualified to vote, shall be disqualified therefor on account of being a pauper; or if a pauper, because of the nonpayment of a poll tax.

ART. XXX. No person otherwise qualified to vote in elections for governor, lieutenant-governor, Senators, and Representatives shall, by reason of a change of residence within the Commonwealth, be disqualified from voting for said officers in the city or town from which he has removed his residence until the expiration of six calendar months from the time of such removal.

CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

ARTICLE VIII.—Suffrage and elections.

SECTION 1. Every male citizen 21 years of age, possessing the following qualifications, shall be entitled to vote at all elections:

First. He shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month.

Second. He shall have resided in the State one year (or if, having previously been a qualified elector or native-born citizen of the State, he shall have removed therefrom and returned, then six months) immediately preceding the election.

Third. He shall have resided in the election district where he shall have offered to vote at least two months immediately preceding the election.

Fourth. If 22 years of age or upward, he shall have paid within two years a State or county tax, which shall have been assessed at least two months and paid at least one month before election.

CONSTITUTION OF RHODE ISLAND.

ARTICLE II.—Qualifications of electors.

SECTION 1. Every male citizen of the United States, of the age of 21 years, who has had his residence and home in this State for one year, and in the town or city in which he may claim the right to vote six months next preceding the time of voting, and who is really and truly possessed in his own right of real estate in such town or city of the value of $134 over and above all incumbrances, or which shall rent for $7 per annum over and above any rent reserved or the interest of any incumbrances thereon, being an estate in fee simple, fee tail, for the life of any person, or an estate in reversion or remainder, which qualifies no other person to vote, the conveyance of which estate, if by deed, shall have been recorded at least ninety days, shall thereafter have a right to vote in the election of all civil officers and on all questions in all legal town or ward meetings so long as he continues so qualified.

CONSTITUTION OF VERMONT.

CHAPTER II.

SEC. 21. Every man of the full age of 21 years, having resided in this State for the space of one whole year next before the election of representatives, and is of a quiet and peaceable behavior, and will take the following oath or affirmation, shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State:

"You solemnly swear (or affirm) that whenever you give your vote or suffrage touching any matter that concerns the State of Vermont, you will do it so as in your conscience you shall judge will most conduce to the best good of the same, as established by the constitution, without fear or favor of any man."

CONCLUSION.

It must be apparent to all disinterested persons, to all whose judgment has not been blinded by self-interest or partisan prejudice, that a necessity exists in North Carolina for an amendment to the organic law regulating the right of suffrage. It is equally apparent that the weight of opinion is in favor of the conclusion that such an amendment as is proposed is not in violation of the Constitution of the United States and that the contrary argument is only made for the purpose of influencing and intimidating white men against voting for this amendment.

It has been shown that the argument of the two distinguished Senators from North Carolina and other opponents is inconsistent. They endeavor to show to the country that the effect of the proposed amendment would only be to disfranchise negroes and not to disfranchise a single white man, and therefore that the proposed amendment discriminates against negroes and is unconstitutional; and yet when they appear before the people of North Carolina they take the position that the effect of the amendment would be to disfranchise both negroes and white men. They should endeavor to be consistent. It has been shown that the record of the Republican party upon this question of suffrage has also been inconsistent. They antagonize the efforts of the Southern States to elevate suffrage by eliminating the ignorant, vicious voter, and yet when that same party frames laws for the government of Territories, they enact even more drastic provisions qualifying the suffrage, and for the same reasons which are actuating the people of North Carolina.

Are the leaders of the Republican party possessed of such prejudice against the Southern people that they can not consider impartially the very serious problems which confront the Southern States? It has been shown that the constitutions of some of the States of the North contained provisions substantially similar and even more comprehensive in their limitations, and yet the representatives of the party in some of those States appear utterly unable to make application of the golden rule. There is only one course open for the white men of North Carolina to pursue. Let them stand by their homes; let them preserve the civilization of their fathers, and solemnly resolve to maintain the supremacy of the race who founded this Republic and have preserved its institutions. Thus will contentment, good government, and prosperity prevail, and the happiness of all her people be conserved.

APPENDIX.

An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to amend the constitution of North Carolina," ratified February 21, 1899, the same being chapter 218 of the Public Laws of 1899.

The general assembly of North Carolina do enact:

SECTION 1. That chapter 218, Public Laws of 1899, entitled "An act to amend the constitution of North Carolina," be amended so as to make said act read as follows:

That Article VI of the constitution of North Carolina be, and the same is hereby, abrogated, and in lieu thereof shall be substituted the following article of said constitution, as an entire and indivisible plan of suffrage:

ARTICLE VI.—Suffrage and eligibility to office.

SECTION 1. Every male person born in the United States, and every male person who has been naturalized, 21 years of age, and possessing the qualifications set out in this article, shall be entitled to vote at any election by the people in the State, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. He shall have resided in the State of North Carolina for two years, in the county six months, and in the precinct, ward, or other election district in which he offers to vote, four months next preceding the election: Provided, That removal from one precinct, ward, or other election district to another in the same county shall not operate to deprive any person of the right to vote in the precinct, ward, or other election district from which he has removed until four months after such removal. No person who has been convicted, or who has confessed his guilt in open court upon indictment, of any crime, the punishment of which now is, or may hereafter be, imprisonment in the State's prison, shall be permitted to vote unless the said person shall be first restored to citizenship in the manner prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. Every person offering to vote shall be at the time a legally registered voter as herein prescribed and in the manner hereafter provided by law, and the general assembly of North Carolina shall enact general registration laws to carry into effect the provisions of this article.

SEC. 4. Every person presenting himself for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the constitution in the English language; and before he shall be entitled to vote he shall have paid, on or before the 1st day of May of the year in which he proposes to vote, his poll tax for the previous year, as prescribed by Article V, section 1, of the constitution. But no male person who was, on January 1, 1867, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under the laws of any State in the United States wherein he then resided, and no lineal descendant of any such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote at any election in this State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications herein prescribed: Provided, He shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this section prior to December 1, 1908.

The general assembly shall provide for the registration of all persons entitled to vote without the educational qualifications herein prescribed, and shall, on or before November 1, 1908, provide for the making of a permanent record of such registration, and all persons so registered shall forever thereafter have the right to vote in all elections by the people in this State, unless disqualified under section 2 of this article: Provided, Such person shall have paid his poll tax as above required.

SEC. 5. That this amendment to the constitution is presented and adopted as one indivisible plan for the regulation of the suffrage, with the intent and purpose to so connect the different parts and to make them so dependent upon each other that the whole shall stand or fall together.

SEC. 6. All elections by the people shall be by ballot, and all elections by the general assembly shall be viva voce.

SEC. 7. Every voter in North Carolina, except as in this article disqualified, shall be eligible to office, but before entering upon the duties of the office he shall take and subscribe the following oath:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of North Carolina not inconsistent therewith, and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of my office as ———. So help me God."

(SEC. 8.) The following classes of persons shall be disqualified for office: First, all persons who shall deny the being of Almighty God; second, all persons who shall have been convicted, or confessed their guilt on indictment pending, and whether sentenced or not, or under judgment suspended, of any treason or felony, or of any other crime, for which the punishment may be imprisonment in the penitentiary, since becoming citizens of the United States, or of corruption or malpractice in office, unless such person shall be restored to the rights of citizenship in a manner prescribed by law.

(SEC. 9.) That this amendment to the constitution shall go into effect on the 1st day of July, 1902, if a majority of votes cast at the next general election shall be cast in favor of this suffrage amendment.

SEC. 2. This amendment to the constitution shall be submitted at the next general election to the qualified voters of the State, in the same manner and under the same rules and regulations as is provided in the law regulating general elections in this State, and at said elections those persons desiring to vote for such amendment shall cast a written or printed ballot with the words "For suffrage amendment" thereon; and those with a contrary opinion shall cast a written or printed ballot with the words "Against suffrage amendment" thereon.

SEC. 3. The votes cast at said election shall be counted, compared, returned, and canvassed, and the result announced and declared under the same rules and regulations and in the same manner as the vote for governor, and if a majority of the votes cast are in favor of the said amendment, it shall be the duty of the governor of the State, upon being notified of the result of said election, to certify said amendment under the seal of the State, to the secretary of State, who shall enroll the said amendment, so certified, among the permanent records of his office.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification.

In the general assembly read three times, and ratified this 13th day of June, 1900.

C. A. REYNOLDS,
President of the Senate.

H. G. CONNOR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OF

HON. JOHN J. LENTZ,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. LENTZ said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was exceedingly pleasant to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] apologize for the third time for the treatment that the Republican party has given Attorney-General Monnett. Mr. Monnett prosecuted one trust vigorously, honestly, beyond the temptation of a bribe of $400,000; beyond the browbeating of the press of the State, beyond the cold shoulder of every leader in the Republican party. He stood incorruptible, he stood unyielding, on the Republican State platform of 1895 against trusts, a platform more radical than that adopted in the State of Ohio a few weeks ago by the Republicans, and more radical against trusts than the platform will be which they will adopt at Philadelphia in two weeks.

But I propose to let Mr. Monnett speak for himself as to how he has been treated in the State of Ohio. I send to the Clerk, to be read from the desk, an interview given on the 19th of May by Mr. Monnett, as reported in the Columbus Citizen and reproduced in the Lancaster Democrat, telling what he thinks of the Republican party and its course in that State, not only with reference to himself, but particularly with reference to the trusts.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUNISHMENT FOR REPUBLICAN PARTY SEEMS CERTAIN, SAYS MONNETT, WHO THINKS IT IS LIKELY TO BE GIVEN BY THE PEOPLE THIS FALL.

Ex-Attorney-General Frank S. Monnett has returned from Toledo and says that he was not present at the conference of Silver Republicans and anti-trust leaders. Mr. Monnett, however, says that he met Mr. Charles Towne and had a very pleasant chat with him, and also with others who were there attending the conference.

Answering the question regarding his position on the trust question during the coming campaign, Mr. Monnett said that he was the Ohio member of the National Anti-Trust Association and as such would do his duty to the organization.

"There will be no compromise with the trusts. They are a social, commercial, and political evil, with which there can be no compromise. I fancy that there will be a great effort to win votes from our party on this question the coming campaign. I do not see how we can escape punishment either. When a party breaks its pledges it is usually punished by the people. At the national convention at St. Louis, when President McKinley was nominated, Senator THURSTON, who presided as chairman of that meeting, declared that 'the American people will return the Republican party to power because they know that its administration will mean the protection of the public from all unlawful combinations and unjust exactions of aggregated capital.'

"He went further and declared that the party must do this to retain the confidence of the American people.

"The platform of the Republican party in Ohio strongly condemned the trusts and their unlawful methods. I was elected as the attorney-general of Ohio on such a platform, and as the officer of the State and the representative of the party I carried out, as best I could, the platform of the party. Yet I was not supported in this by many of the leaders, and the party organs criticised me for doing just what the platform of my party pledged me to do. Newspapers of the State, about 110 of them, printed paid articles criticising my actions, and they, too, party newspapers.

"This is not all. The legislature which has just adjourned killed the Russell bill and the maximum freight bill, and that, too, by almost a strict party vote. Will not the people punish the party for such actions upon the part of its servants? The party as such is not in sympathy with such methods. Although the Russell bill was bill No. 10, it was side tracked by the trust lobbyists and held back until near the adjournment and then, over the protest of some of the best men of the party, and almost all of the Democratic members, it was defeated. This was a repudiation of the party platform and the sentiment of the party.

I can not believe that we will escape punishment, and I believe it will come this fall. Why should the party not be punished when the men who control its actions disregard the will of the people? Why should the people, who believe in the enforcement of law and believe that party platforms and principles are more than men, not punish the party, and do it this fall? I know no reason.

I can hardly talk on this question with propriety. I am not in politics or public life. I am practicing law and should not take part in such matters, but I will say that there will be no compromise with the trusts, and personally I will not discontinue my efforts to bring about a better condition of trade and honest competition.

Mr. LENTZ. I doubly appreciate the gentleman's [Mr. GROSVENOR'S] certificate of character and Republicanism which he has just given Mr. Monnett, because Mr. Monnett says that as a just penalty on his own party it ought to be defeated in the State of Ohio this fall for its repudiation of its pledges against the trusts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LENTZ. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will note that Mr. Monnett does not claim that he was turned down for attorney-general.

Mr. GAINES. You did not indorse his administration.

Mr. LENTZ. I note that the gentleman now says Mr. Monnett did not say that he was turned down, but I will give the gentleman from Ohio a little history from the convention of last summer. You know and everybody in Ohio knows that Mr. Monnett's name was mentioned throughout the State by the Republicans who are honestly opposed to trusts as a candidate for governor, and out of the 813 delegates that went to the State convention not a single delegate dared to lift his voice for Frank S. Monnett for governor, although he was the champion of the people against the trusts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You know another thing, sir, that the trusts went with their corruption funds into Mr. Monnett's own county and prevented him from securing even the few delegates of his own county for renomination for attorney-general. You know that no man in the United States has made as loyal, as intelligent, as honest, as persistent a fight against the trusts as Frank Monnett, and notwithstanding the fact that he has demonstrated to the people of the State of Ohio and of the United States that he is the best qualified man in the country to fight the trusts, yet your party repudiated him and turned him out of office before he could finish his litigation against the Standard Oil trust.

You talk about two terms. The people of Ohio did not apply the two-term rule to you. The people of Ohio did not apply the two-term rule to McKinley, nor to Garfield, nor to Hayes, nor to many others in State and national service. Mr. Monnett had carried into execution your promises to the people in your platform of 1895, and yet you repudiated him, and when he did come before the State convention for renomination, not as attorney-general alone, but as the lawyer to prosecute the trusts in that State, he got only 28 votes for attorney-general and not one for governor.

Now, you have the reputation of being "Old Figgers." [Laughter.] I should like to have you figure for us. If Mr. Monnett, after fighting the trusts faithfully and honestly—aye, after fighting only one trust—could not get one vote for governor, how many would he have gotten had he fought all the trusts? Or solve this problem by the simple rule of three: If he got only 28 votes for attorney-general out of 813 votes, how many votes would he have gotten for renomination as attorney-general if he had been fighting all of the trusts? Solve those problems, if you please. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

If Mr. Monnett, after fighting the trusts for four years as a Republican, could not get one delegate out of 813 for governor, how many years will he have to fight all of the trusts before you nominate him for that position? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] After you have answered those questions, and your pencil and your figures are worn out, answer these questions:

If Mr. Monnett is to be repudiated because he has honestly fought the trusts; if Mr. Monnett is to be repudiated in Ohio for fighting the greatest monster that is before the people to-day; if

Mr. Monnett was the champion of the cause of the people, a cause which you hypocritically come in here now and say requires an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, why did you not keep Mr. Monnett in the public service, helping you fight these trusts, if you were honest about it. You need such a man as Monnett.

Ah, my friends, if you thought this constitutional amendment was a menace to the trusts, it would have gone to the wastebasket, just as Mr. Monnett has gone to the political wastebasket. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, do not undertake to fool the people. Mr. Lincoln told you that you could fool all of them a part of the time and a part of them all of the time, but that you can not fool all of them all the time. I invite you into my district and challenge you to discuss your amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. LENTZ. Not now. The gentleman from Iowa does not know anything about our Ohio politics.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think I do, and that is the reason I want to ask a question.

Mr. LENTZ. I do not yield now. If you can get my time extended, if you will give me some of your time, I will yield later. I want to go on with Mr. Monnett and read from a report made by him, as attorney-general of Ohio, a few months ago on retiring from the office, and here is what he says about trusts and about constitutional amendments:

> The potency of the State in controlling trusts we believe has been greatly enhanced by the passage of this act, and that the true source of relief to the small capitalists and the oppressed by the obnoxious workings of monopolies is vested in the state through the executive department, and that quo warranto is the true remedy to punish either domestic or foreign corporations when they violate the public policy of the State by monopolistic contracts, or when they openly defy the anti-trust laws or any other laws of the State.
> In this respect the State is more powerful than the Federal Government, because, as has been repeatedly enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States, the Federal Government's power in this behalf is limited to corporations doing an interstate business, while the State is sovereign over its own corporate creatures as well as over the franchises of foreign corporations exercised in the State's domain.
> It is manifest that this evil of absorbing commercial interests by monopolistic combinations has had rapid growth in the last few years in this State as well as adjoining States, and that determined and concerted action of all the executive officers of State should be taken to protect the masses from the oppression incident thereto; and I beg leave to report to your honor that in the opinion of this department no backward step should be taken by the legislative or executive department in protecting the people from such aggression.

That, my colleagues, is the reason Frank Monnett was driven out of the office of attorney-general and retired to a political graveyard by the Republican party. The very fact that he said that the laws now on the statute books are sufficient to enable us to destroy the trusts made him objectionable to the 813 delegates in that convention, and they would not entertain his name for governor, nor could he get but 28 votes out of 813 for attorney-general. Facts speak louder than fancies.

This is what you have done with Frank Monnett. Not a man to speak a tender word in his behalf. My friend General GROSVENOR, the gentleman from Athens, alone has given him a certificate of character here which should go out to the country, because in Ohio the Republicans speak his name with the same contempt which once characterized the language of certain men against Abraham Lincoln. The Democratic party was not born in the woods, to be scared by a screech owl. We are not afraid of your talk about the constitutional amendment, because we will make the country know before Saturday night that you came here with hypocrisy in that amendment, and nothing else.

You know that Frank Monnett, the Republican attorney-general, and I would stand side by side, Republican and Democrat, telling the people of Ohio that we need no constitutional amendment to drive the trusts out of the State if we can only get the agents of the trusts, the Republican officeholders, out of the State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Retire the Republican representatives of the trusts from the public offices, and at the same time while you count one, two, three, you will retire the trusts; in other words, both will go out together. You know that, and I know it; everybody knows it. We need no constitutional amendment in Ohio. What we need to liberate us from the trusts is to have the facts go to our people as they are going, and when we are liberated from the trust agents, the Republican legislators and executives and attorneys-general, we shall be liberated from the trusts.

Now, let us see whether you are against the trusts. You remember that we had an election in 1896. Trusts were known then. You called an extra session on the 15th day of March, 1897, ten days after you got into power. Did you legislate against trusts in 1897? You did not. Did you legislate against trusts in 1898? My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] talks about demagogic party speeches against trusts and claims that you are going to give us practical legislation against trusts by proposing an amendment to the Constitution which you know will never be adopted, and you do not expect to be adopted.

Not only that. In 1898 we had a beef trust doing business, and it cost this country several hundred thousand dollars to whitewash the trust that was in the beef business, notwithstanding it murdered 4,800 of our young men. You against trusts! You have whitewashed the protector of trusts. We found by a court-martial that a man by the name of Eagan was unfit to wear the uniform of a soldier, but your trust-ridden President put him back on the pay roll at a pay which will cost the people of the United States $75,000 if he lives his natural expectancy, although he will never do another day's service for the country. Explain this if you dare!

Oh, yes; you are against trusts. You have taken care of this man because he had something that he could tell out of school. That is not all. We know something else. In the last week of the long session, just now, it dawns on you that we need an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Why, the sugar trust——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TERRY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LENTZ. Now, we have the sugar trust. It was discovered when you passed the Dingley bill, that you called the extra session for the sole purpose of passing that bill, and you adjourned us from day to day and week to week, holding us here for four and a half months for no other purpose, and we all remember that when Havemeyer went on the witness stand some months ago he stated that the Dingley tariff is "the mother of trusts." But when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] brings in an amendment, simply asking to strike off one article, that of paper, and putting it on the free list, you stand by the "trust mother," the Dingley tariff law, and continue to protect the trusts.

If we were to offer to put nails on the free list, you would stand by the "mother of trusts." If we were to ask you to put wire on the free list, or glass, or pottery, or any of the hundred commodities that go into the food, clothing, and shelter of the community, you would resist step by step every practical proposition to limit the evils of the trust.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there was an amendment proposed on this side of the House providing against the protection of articles if they became subjects of trusts, and that that was ruled out on a point of order made by the gentleman from Maine, the lamented Mr. Dingley.

Mr. LENTZ. Yes; we all remember that, and the Republicans will continue to rule out any and every restraint upon the trusts so long as the Republican party has a majority.

Now let me tell you another thing about these trusts. We have a President of the United States who told us of our "plain duty" to Porto Rico. Immediately a couple of trust magnates visited the city of Washington, and from the President of the United States down to the smallest member over there you changed your minds in a day and a night; and you never told anybody where or when you changed nor whether it was before or after midnight when you changed. Nor have you told who was present when you changed your minds. Oh, yes; you are against trusts, all of you. [Laughter.]

You are very anxious to amend the Constitution under which you established despotism in Porto Rico, the Constitution under which you established a trust of carpetbag thieves in Cuba [applause], under which you paid bribes and pensions to Mohammedans and polygamists in the Sulu Islands [laughter and applause], the Constitution under which you had power to shoot to death a congress of Christian people in Luzon who had fought, bled, and died for liberty and the right of self-government, and yet you now claim you have not power sufficient to stop the trusts from using the mail while they are fleecing the Republic of thousands, of hundreds of thousands, and millions of dollars.

You could prevent the lottery trust in New Orleans from using the mails, but your Constitution is too weak to prevent the wire and nail trust, or the sugar trust, or the tobacco trust from using the mails!

Who says the Constitution will allow postal laws to prevent obscene matter, but will not allow postal laws to prevent the trusts from robbing the people?

You know very well how you can reach the trusts. The best-informed man on this subject in your party, Mr. Monnett, told you how he would get rid of the trusts, and instantly you got rid of him. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Oh, yes; you are against the trusts! I will tell you how to get rid of the trusts. If the trusts elect McKinley in November, constitutional amendment or no amendment, the trusts will do business at the old stand for four years more. If the people elect William Jennings Bryan [applause], no amendment will be necessary, and after the 4th of next March we shall have an Attorney-

General who will not go on sleeping while the trusts go on fattening, for he will keep the trusts so busy that it will be hotter for them than any part of the tropical islands of our empire.

Let William Jennings Bryan give us an honest Attorney-General, not from the State of New Jersey [laughter] but from a State where they are not trust-ridden, and I assure you that if Mr. Bryan is elected we shall need no constitutional amendment. We will not go to the home of the trusts for an Attorney-General of the United States: we will not ask a governor, made such by the trusts of New York and the State of New Jersey, to come over to Washington and sit in the Cabinet and protect the trusts. We will do business under the law as it now exists, and trusts will depart from this land. [Long applause on the Democratic side.]

* * * * * * *

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] undertakes to run under the cover of a man named Sheetz, whom nobody in the State of Ohio heard of as a lawyer or anything else until the trust representatives nominated him for attorney-general. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If he prosecutes the trusts with the same ability that Monnett did, he will not be renominated for attorney-general by the Republican party; he will be a disappointment to those who nominated him.

Now, my friend talks about the Porto Rican tariff. He says the chairman of the national Democratic committee introduced a bill providing for returning to the trusts this money. That is no worse than you did [addressing the Republican side].

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will allow me to explain. I did not say "a bill;" it was an amendment to the Porto Rican bill.

Mr. LENTZ. Yes, an amendment; but practically the same thing. Here is the proposition: You proposed in your bill a 25 per cent tariff, but after the magnates of the two trusts, tobacco and sugar, came to Washington, although you had been pretending to raise this money for schools and roads, you decided to turn back to the trusts 10 per cent of the 25 per cent and only put on a tax of 15 per cent.

Now, I do not wonder that Chairman JONES made a mistake. Chairman JONES was not as well acquainted with these gentlemen who are operating the trusts as are the gentlemen on the other side, and I believe he was innocent enough to think that the people down there would get the benefit of this money after it had been returned; but you men, being on the inside at the Arlington Hotel when you discussed this tariff, knew in an instant that Mr. JONES had made a mistake.

They knew in an instant that Mr. JONES did not understand who was to get the return of this tariff. He supposed the people of Porto Rico were to get it, and not the men who were making the bargain for the reduction from 25 per cent to 15. They, the trust agents, knew who was to get the 10 per cent and they instantly knew who would get the other 15.

Now, so far as the Porto Rican tariff is concerned, there is another element in it. They put it on for two years. Why? To depress those people, to humiliate those people, to keep them down in the mire of despondency until the trusts and the syndicates and the capitalists and the speculators of this country can option and buy up every valuable piece of property, and after they become the owners of it at the reduced price, by reason of this infernal tariff or taxation without representation, undoubtedly then the syndicates and the trusts will control the future legislation of this body, if it happens to have a Republican majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is what that means. If gentlemen on the other side are looking around for legislation and for a constitutional amendment, you might have noticed that the Supreme Court, by a vote of 5 to 4, had declared the income tax unconstitutional, strange to say, one of them having changed his mind one night. We do not know what time in the night nor who was present.

But notwithstanding that change, if you want to put an effective constitutional amendment on the statute books, for which you could probably get the vote of this side of the House in a very large number, and of the States, you have but to propose a graduated income tax upon the incomes of these very marauders of the land, these wholesale jobbers, these fancy Jesse Jameses, who live in the palaces and the castles of New York City, who are taking $3 out of every farmer's pocket every time he buys a hundred pounds of wire or a keg of nails.

Every time he buys a thousand pounds of wire they assess him $20. They might as well steal his watch. It is grand larceny instead of petty larceny. But you have not found any law that will reach that kind of a thief. Why? Because you expect him to contribute from now on until November. I can tell you how to limit the evil of the trusts. If you would propose it here this afternoon, we would vote for it.

Bring in a proposition to prevent any trust owner or any corporation stockholder or director from contributing more than $100 to a campaign fund; a bill that will prevent any one of your trust owners from contributing a corruption fund to come out in my district or any other district; a bill which will compel that corruption fund to be expended in the district where the contributor lives.

That will relieve this country of the evil of the trusts, by bringing more honest men into the legislative department of the Government of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will bring more men here who are not subservient to the trusts which pay out their money and buy seats for their agents on your side of the House.

Four years of Democratic rule! You say they wrangled on this floor. Yes; they wrangled on this floor, and they continued to wrangle until they met in July, 1896, at Chicago, when they settled the wrangle; and those who were here in Washington legislating and operating under the dictation and control of the money trust which now controls and operates you were thrown out of that Chicago convention; and the convention at Kansas City will nominate men who will not be the tools of the trusts.

The Wall street nomination of certain men during those four years did keep this Congress silent so far as trust legislation was concerned, and they want to continue to keep Congress silent and impotent, just as they have succeeded since they made the bargain in 1896 to run a man for President who for fourteen years had been advocating the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and who undoubtedly promised that if nominated and elected to the Presidency he would be a single gold-standard man through to the finish—at least until he got his renomination. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] to a fact which I think he will admit, and that is that Mr. Attorney-General Sheets overcame a Democratic majority of 5,000 in the judicial subdivision in which he was elected to the court of common pleas, just three or four years prior to his election as attorney-general.

Mr. LENTZ. He evidently had the trusts with him; and I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that Mr. Finck overcame 5,500 of your majority, and yet he did not come here either. He ran 5,500 ahead of his ticket in your district.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Finck ran 5,500 ahead of his ticket in your district, but that does not prove that you are a bad man.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He did not run 100 ahead of his ticket.

Mr. LENTZ. You got a majority of but 4,500 in a district that has a normal Republican majority of 10,000. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, the gentleman does not want to stand up here and make such a statement as that.

Mr. LENTZ. I will prove it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My district gave me the first time I ran a little over 2,000 majority.

Mr. LENTZ. We are not talking about that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the highest it ever gave in its whole organization of ten years is less than or about 4,500.

Mr. LENTZ. I must say I will disprove that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And Mr. Finck was beaten by myself clear up to the very top of the margin.

Mr. LENTZ. Do you say that in 1893, 1894, and 1895 your district gave no more than 4,500 majority?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do say so. When a candidate for Congress was running.

Mr. LENTZ. You are mistaken.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman's district sometimes goes 3,000 and sometimes 123.

Mr. LENTZ. It gave McKinley a majority of 248, and it gave D. K. Watson a majority of fifteen hundred and ninety-one. I came here, it is true, by a majority of 49, after you undertook to steal the seat and counted me out of 57 votes. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The last time I carried the district by a majority 16 to 1 times as large as I did in 1896, and I am perfectly willing to go back now, notwithstanding the fact that you and HANNA and McKinley are credited with having the intention to dump the largest barrel you have got into that district. But I will be there all the time until the vote is counted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is dealing in slush.

Mr. LENTZ. No, I am not; I am dealing in facts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman knows I have no more interest in his district than I have in any other district in the country.

Mr. LENTZ. The only slush in my district is put there by your campaign committee, and my boys get it. [Applause.]

But, leaving this subject, I turn my attention for a moment to disprove General GROSVENOR's statement that the highest Republican majority ever given in his district in its whole organization of ten years is less than or about 4,500, and I submit here the following facts and figures, together with tables, which speak for themselves.

ANNUAL REPUBLICAN MAJORITIES FOR THE HEAD OF THE TICKET IN MR. GROSVENOR'S DISTRICT FROM 1894 TO 1899, INCLUSIVE.

Each of these counties gave a Republican majority for the head of the ticket each and every year from 1894 to 1899, inclusive, except Hocking for the years 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899, and Perry for the years 1896 and 1897, and the figures opposite each county for each year represent the Republican majorities in the respective counties, except in the six instances where the letter "D" is set before the figures to indicate a Democratic majority.

County.	1894, secretary of state, Taylor vs. Turner.	1895, governor, Bushnell vs. Campbell.	1896, President, McKinley vs. Bryan.	1897, governor, Bushnell vs. Chapman.	1898, secretary of state, Kinney vs. Guthrey.	1899, governor, Nash vs. McLean.
Athens	3,232	3,888	2,157	2,407	2,268	2,579
Hocking	332	184	D. 414	D. 236	D. 162	D. 156
Meigs	2,692	2,401	2,175	1,895	1,787	1,582
Perry	824	653	D. 103	D. 28	215	11
Ross	1,315	971	602	762	298	270
Vinton	586	719	223	177	445	448
Total	9,081	8,816	4,640	4,787	4,851	4,634

Mr. GROSVENOR'S majority in 1896 was 4,483 over William E. Finck, and in 1898 his majority was 3,372 over Charles E. Peoples. In other words, Mr. GROSVENOR'S majority in 1896 over Mr. Finck was about one-half the normal majority of the Republican head of the ticket over the Democratic head of the ticket in 1894 and 1895, and Mr. GROSVENOR'S popularity in his district did not stop with this decrease of one-half in the Republican majority of his district, but in 1898 he reduced his majority with great success to 3,372, leaving him, in round figures, but a little more than one-third of the normal Republican majority of his district for 1894 and 1895. Verily, verily, his people know their plain duty.

It will be seen by comparison that General GROSVENOR'S majority in his district is smaller than that ever received by any Republican at the head of the ticket from 1894 to 1899, inclusive; and while I did in the hurry of debate use the expression that Mr. Finck ran 5,500 ahead of his ticket in Mr. GROSVENOR'S district when it was only 4,500, yet I was not far wrong, because the normal majority of Mr. GROSVENOR'S district was 9,000 instead of 10,000, as I had often heard it stated, for 1894 and 1895. In 1896, the Presidential year, Mr. GROSVENOR, instead of increasing that majority, was able to hold together only half of the normal Republican majority for 1894 and 1895.

It is a well-known principle in politics that men who live in Republican districts should have increased majorities in Presidential years, because the majority usually increases in the same percentage as the total vote. The next time I state the figures I shall give the General credit for 1,000 votes and say that Mr. Finck only reduced the majority of the General's district from 9,000 to 4,500, running the General behind the normal majority only 4,500 instead of 5,500.

But to return to the subject of trusts. I do not believe I can do any greater service for the American people than to show them a letter which was written to me yesterday by Mr. Monnett; and in connection with this letter from Mr. Monnett I shall submit a letter from Mr. George Rice, of Marietta, Ohio, inclosing copies of letters passing between himself and the Attorney-General and the President of the United States, and without further comment I submit this correspondence, with the suggestion that if a Republican official in Ohio interferes with a trust his head goes off under the political guillotine; and I make the further suggestion that the correspondence between Mr. Rice and the Government at Washington demonstrates the absolute subserviency of the President and the Attorney-General to the Standard Oil trust, and this correspondence submitted by Mr. Rice throws additional light on the correspondence of the Standard Oil bank and Mr. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury. Think of the Rice correspondence ignored for nineteen months! What is the President's "plain duty" here?

Is there any monarch in Europe who would give such a deaf ear to the appeal of his humblest subject as was given by the President and the Attorney-General of the United States to the appeal for justice made by George Rice, one of the best Republicans and one of the ablest citizens of the State of Ohio? It occurs to me that in connection with this correspondence it is not amiss to suggest that the trust barons of America occupy the place of the feudal lords of mediæval Europe, and it also occurs to me that the contemptuous treatment given the appeal from George Rice by the President demonstrates that imperialism is well-nigh established in the land, and therefore I think it opportune and appropriate to incorporate in my speech in the following order the correspondence furnished by the Republican ex-attorney-general, Frank S. Monnett, of Ohio, and that of the lifelong Republican, George Rice; also the three speeches made by the three distinguished and lifelong Republicans of national fame, at a recent meeting held on the 24th of May, 1900, at Cooper Institute, New York City, I mean, and include herein the speeches of the Hon. Carl Schurz, of New York; ex-Governor Boutwell, of Massachusetts, and Captain O'Farrell, of Washington, D. C.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 21, 1900.

HON. JOHN J. LENTZ,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to receive your esteemed favor of the 19th instant, making inquiry as to the present status of the litigation instituted against the trusts in the State of Ohio; inquiry also whether they were prosecuted under statute or under the common law powers vested in the courts; you also inquire what has been the disposition made by the court of the charges of bribery of the State officials on the part of the Standard Oil Trust, and as to what delay or hindrance, if any, has been interposed; also as to what has caused the delay and prevented a speedy action thereon on the part of the courts; also what further legislation is necessary to empower the State courts or the Federal courts to right these economic abuses.

First. As to the status of the litigation in Ohio against trusts and monopolies:

The State of Ohio on the relation of the Attorney-General filed an original petition against the Standard Oil Company as early as May 8, 1890, charging the Standard Oil Company of Ohio, and nineteen other constituent companies, of having unlawfully or illegally entered into a combination for the purpose of controlling the prices of crude petroleum and arbitrarily fixing the consumption price of the refined product. In that decision you are familiar with the results, the Supreme Court decided March 2, 1892, in a proceeding in quo warranto, that the entering into such a trust contract, whether by individual stockholders, directors, partnerships, or as individuals, formed an illegal combination, and that the Standard Oil Company of Ohio, participating therein, was exercising franchises contrary to and against the public policy of the State of Ohio, and on said date adjudged and decreed that said corporation be ousted from the privilege of making or entering into such an agreement or performing the same directly or indirectly, and from the power, franchise, or privilege of permitting said Standard Oil trustees to control in any way the affairs of said corporation.

From said March 2, 1892, until November 9, 1897, the Standard Oil Company of Ohio unlawfully disobeyed the decree of this court, as well as the other nineteen constituent companies, as I charged in my information in contempt on that day.

The trust certificates rose from par upward of $500 per share, notwithstanding a heavy quarterly dividend was repeatedly declared.

In this charge of contempt the Standard Oil Company attempted to justify by answer in compliance with an order from the supreme court to answer on or before the 15th day of January, 1898; that is, they were required to show cause why it and its stockholders and officers should not be punished as for contempt as charged in said information; to this the State replied and attached under and by virtue of our statutes twenty-six interrogatories addressed to John D. Rockefeller; part of these he answered and part he did not; thereupon we took the deposition of said John D. Rockefeller in New York; some of which questions he refused to answer, such as to produce books to corroborate his verbal and written statements.

Thereafter a special master was appointed, the Hon. Allen T. Brinsmade, of Cuyahoga County, and we proceeded to take the testimony under Brinsmade at various places.

Among the witnesses other than Rockefeller was the secretary, F. B. Squire, of the Standard Oil Company; the record I inclosed to you under separate cover. The witnesses were certainly in harmony with the other trust witnesses, namely, short on memory in those particulars that were vital to the State and long on memory for everything that would make a defense. But the most remarkable feature of the whole proceeding was under the direction of the court and under the direction of a referee to produce the records and books of the company of Ohio to show the distributions of their companies and other sources of income and the relationship between the Standard Oil Company of Ohio, and the trust certificates were all peremptorily refused and the witnesses have been certified over to the supreme court by the master, as well as the notary public, for contempt.

Also a special information in contempt was filed against the said secretary, F. B. Squire, which was filed directly in the supreme court, charging him with open defiance of the court's order. This proceeding in contempt has been pending since April, 1899, against the secretary and is still pending, and neither said company, its officers, or agents have ever produced the testimony required by this court, nor have they yet been punished for their refusal to do so.

This branch of the case was submitted last June to the court on briefs and had precedence over the hearing and main contempt originally filed, charging them with violating the decree of 1892. I say it had precedence over this main contempt for the reason that the evidence required of them by the court to show their conduct in reference to the original decree was refused and should have been determined before the merits of the case were heard. However, the company triumphed and the State was forced into a hearing on May 23, 1900, a second time, with only such testimony as the Standard Oil Company's officers chose to furnish the court, and without furnishing the testimony, evidence, and books required by the court, and have thus submitted their cause to the court after openly defying the court to produce the evidence demanded by the court.

To reiterate, the Standard Oil Company of Ohio as a company is charged with contempt, and the stockholders and officers are charged with contempt in violating the original decree of the court of 1892.

The State undertook to prove its allegations from the company's own books, and did prove the existence of the trust certificates amounting to millions of dollars, being raised by quarterly dividends, and showing that there was monopoly in the production, transportation, and distribution of petroleum in Ohio, and further professed to show from the books of the defendant company itself the source of revenue that was distributed to pay these dividends on the illegal trust certificates; and thereupon the defendant company refused to produce its books, records, or evidence, and the secretary refused to answer the questions, but undertook to give favorable extracts from their own records without producing the records; and then, after defying the court and asking the court and compelling the court to take their verbal extracts from the records, refused to corroborate the same with the original or substantive evidence in contempt in the supreme court, that they go to trial and submit their cause on this ex parte statement; all of which they have done.

If they are not guilty, on what evidence is the court going to determine?

If they are guilty, on what evidence is the court going to determine the extent or magnitude of the violation of the court's decree?

But they say that the evidence, if offered, would criminate them, and for that reason they rely upon the State and Federal constitution to protect them.

But this humiliating defense was an afterthought, for, under the well-known rule, the company and its president and secretary, after waiving their right in this behalf by giving a part of the records, can not remain silent as to the remainder of the admissions against interest. That is, they have waived their constitutional right to rely upon the defense of the common felon, and so, up to date, the stockholders, officers, and agents go acquit.

But, on the other hand, the court may apply the old common-law rule of presumption against concealment, falsification, and destruction of evidence, and punish them on the presumption that the incriminating evidence is all that the State claims for it. Notwithstanding the close and hot pursuit made by the State against the Standard Oil Trust (self-confessed criminals), we traced home to their door the destruction of twenty-six boxes of books and papers at Cleveland, Ohio, including ledgers, daybooks, and other important records, according to the sworn testimony given by the laborers that performed the services at the request of the company, and received pay therefor, after the court ordered such books brought into court.

Following all these disclosures made by the examination of John D. Rockefeller, and the evidence showing that the trust still existed, additional suits were at once filed against the Buckeye Pipe Line Company of Ohio; the Solar Refining Company, of Ohio; the Ohio Oil Company, of Ohio, charging them with the same offense that we originally charged against the Standard Oil Company, of Ohio, under the common law, charging them also with violating the anti-trust statute of the State of Ohio, and charging them with aiding and abetting the Standard Ooil Company, of Ohio, in defying the original decree of the court; and in the case of the Buckeye Pipe Line Company, charging them with exercising other franchises than those granted by their charter, to wit, that of a telegraph company carrying messages for hire and reward, and also charging these said companies with violating the Ohio statutes in actually removing their principal place of office from the State of Ohio to No. 26 Broadway, New York. The testimony showed that no bona fide office of any of these companies was kept in Ohio, and merely dummy stockholders' meetings were held with proxies and under a pretense claiming to have annual elections in the State, while in truth and fact the twenty constituent companies were all operating at the main office at Broadway, New York, and the trust is as continued and flourishing in 1900 as in 1892.

To each of these petitions against the constituent companies, interrogatories addressed to the officers of such companies have been filed, and under our statutes are required to be answered or demurred to within thirty days, although upwards of one and one-half years have elapsed, not a single interrogatory has yet been answered in these proceedings, and the companies exact a 200 per cent price for their commodities in open defiance of the original decree and wholly in default and neglect in complying with the statute in the constituent company cases.

One hundred and ten newspapers were shown to have been subsidized in the State of Ohio; space on editorial pages and columns of matter were purchased abusing the State officials who were pushing these cases; we were threatened with dire results—in case they were pushed to conclusion—such as capital would be withdrawn—and one would imagine the State of Ohio would be left a howling wilderness unless these plutocrats continued to plunder us and rob the oil fields in the future as they have in the past of their millions.

A like proceeding was instituted against eleven insurance companies in Ohio, charging them with being members of the insurance trust, but the combine, and among the witnesses who refused to produce the correspondence between the local insurance board and the insurance company, showing their connection, and who are cited in contempt in the supreme court, was Mr. A. I. Truesdale, of Cleveland, Ohio, who was not punished for his refusal, as the cases were dismissed because there was no proof; that the companies were never directly connected with the trust composed of the local trustees or agents, but that the trust was purely the acts of the agent and not of the companies. In other words, the attorney-general's department was powerless in itself to compel the secretary of the Cleveland board (Truesdale) to produce for the court the correspondence and contract directly connecting the company with the local board at Cleveland, for the reason that it would criminate Truesdale; and thereupon Truesdale was certified over to the supreme court for his refusal to answer the questions or produce the books and correspondence, all of which has been ignored by the court, and Truesdale has never been compelled to produce the correspondence, and the cases were dismissed because there was no connection between the companies and the agents. The only punishment that Truesdale has so far met with is the appointment, according to the public press, that he has been selected by the State administration for a responsible place in the insurance department, with a salary and fees amounting to about $4,000, and he has since resigned from the secretaryship of the Cleveland Board of Underwriters, the place he has so faithfully and worthily fulfilled for the trust.

The other suits pending against trusts in the State of Ohio are the Continental Tobacco Company, the Argand Refining Company, and the United Salt Company, in addition to several cases pending in the circuit court through prosecuting attorneys, under order of the attorney-general.

Lastly, in reference to the attempted bribery of Attorney-General Watson and myself, on the part of the Standard Oil trust, I herewith send you my annual report, which sets forth officially the transaction connected therewith, beginning on page 30, showing the charges made against the company, giving date and names of parties, and the dismissal of the case by the court and their reason therefor.

I call your attention to the records I have sent you, having the dates and the original actions, copies of the decrees, and all the accurate data that you inquire about, and for that reason I did not reproduce here.

I beg pardon for so abbreviating this as to almost make it unintelligible, but time forbids me to go into more details.

Respectfully submitted.

F. S. MONNETT.

MARIETTA, OHIO, May 30, 1900.

Hon. JOHN J. LENTZ, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request I send you copies of the correspondence between myself and Attorney-General John W. Griggs, and with it I also include copies of the letters between myself and President McKinley on the same subject. You will observe that this correspondence began on November 5, 1898, and closed on the 20th of June, 1899, so far as the Attorney-General of the United States is concerned, and that all I have secured from the Department of Justice of the United States is summed up in three brief and indifferent letters from the Attorney-General and another equally brief and noncommittal from the President of the United States. You will observe that it is now more than a year and a half since I opened this correspondence, and in a few days it will be a year since I received any communication from the alleged Department of Justice.

I have been a Republican all my life, and supposed my party was faithful to its trust, but this correspondence with the Attorney-General and the President leads me to suspect that the Standard Oil trust and not the Republican party is running our National Government.

The execution of the Federal antitrust act devolves entirely upon the Attorney-General, and none of his seventy-six subordinates can prosecute a complaint without his sanction, so that he becomes wholly responsible. And I read in the New York Herald of March 22, 1899, what purported to be a copy of a letter from Attorney-General Griggs to Mr. J. C. Bowdaile, of 5010 Girard avenue, Philadelphia, in which the Attorney-General said:

"I have your letter of the 17th instant, and because it is evident that you are under serious misapprehensions as to the force and effect of the Federal law relating to trusts, called the Sherman Act, passed in 1890, I deem it proper to call your attention to some aspects of this matter, which you are obviously ignorant of.

"In the first place, the constitutionality of this matter was not affirmed last fall, but was affirmed almost immediately after the passage of the act, in the first case which arose, and has been regarded as settled, so far as the constitutionality is concerned, for many years.

"In the next place, the Sherman trust act does not give to the Federal courts jurisdiction over any combination constituting a restraint and monopoly of trade unless such trade is what is known as interstate or international trade and commerce. * * * This Department never hesitates to prosecute unlawful combinations which affect interstate commerce."

What Mr. Griggs has seen fit to say in his letter to Mr. Bowadaile hardly seems to be substantiated by his treatment of my appeal to him for relief. Is it possible for any sane human being, from President McKinley down to the humblest citizen in the land, to believe that either the Standard Oil trust or the Standard Oil Company is not engaged in interstate commerce?

Respectfully, yours,

GEORGE RICE.

MARIETTA, OHIO, November 5, 1898.

Attorney-General GRIGGS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a citizen of this State and of the United States, I appeal to you, the head of the Department of Justice of the United States, not only for individual relief, but also in behalf of thousands of my confrères in the oil producing and refining business, who are sorely oppressed by the most gigantic and unlawful combination the world has ever known, embodied in the name, Standard Oil Trust.

Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court, March 22, 1897, in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association case, it was decided that—recently more specifically confirmed by the decision in the Joint Traffic Association case. Therefore, this, the greatest of all trusts and combinations, should be suppressed. Being a great sufferer by this trust, which has destroyed my business, I herewith enter my complaint and appeal to you, as the proper official, to institute the necessary proceedings to enjoin or prohibit this trust from doing further business.

I can furnish you abundant proof to verify and sustain my charge, that to-day it is the greatest monopoly and industrial trust "in restraint of trade," that the world has known, and it seems clear to me that it is your imperative duty to proceed at once as the Federal antitrust law directs, to break up this unlawful combination.

Respectfully, yours,

GEORGE RICE.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., November 15, 1898.

Mr. GEORGE RICE,
Proprietor Ohio Oil Works, Marietta, Ohio.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 5th instant, I beg to say that the act of July 2, 1890, to whose provisions you appeal for protection, has reference only to that trade or commerce which exists, or may exist, among the several States or with foreign nations, and has no application whatever to any other trade or commerce.

It does not appear from your communication that either your own business or that of the alleged combination against which you complain is of an interstate character such as to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction under the statute mentioned.

JOHN K. RICHARDS,
Acting Attorney-General.

For abbreviation sake the following letter takes the place of my letter to Griggs of January 10, 1899, which he never acknowledged and which in substance was the same as the following:

MARIETTA, OHIO, February 16, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a citizen of the United States of America, I am of the firm conviction that I should be thoroughly protected by my Government in life, liberty, and business pursuits, against the machinations of the Standard Oil Trust. In other words:

"So use your own as not to injure another's property."

It may be said that "all men are by nature free and independent and have certain inalienable rights, among which are the enjoyment of and defending life and liberty, acquiring and possessing and seeking and obtaining happiness and safety."

I herewith renew and again enter my decided protest and complaint against said trust, to you as the proper representative official, appointed by the President to safeguard the public interests as against unlawful trusts and combinations, as outlined in the Federal Anti-Trust Act, which act has been twice confirmed, as well as decided to be constitutional, by our highest court.

My complaint is against the present and continued unlawful existence, for about nine years past, of this, the greatest of all trusts in the destruction of lawful private interests and business.

I herewith submit the following facts, which plainly show that this trust has grossly violated the wise provisions of said act, in "restraint of trade," and that its general business is of an interstate character, as well as international, and that it should be rigidly and summarily dealt with—suppressed, as the law directs.

I will preface my remarks by saying that this particular trust is the greatest monopoly and industrial trust in "restraint of trade" in this or any other age. It has unlawfully and criminally succeeded in amassing untold wealth within a very brief space of time, in getting property without creating it, in enjoying wealth without earning it, through the grossest of the gross freight discriminations. Except for this there would not have been a Standard Oil monopoly nor a Standard Oil Trust.

The petroleum industry of this country is first in manufacture and fourth in magnitude of our general exports. There was exported in 1897 998,862,204 gallons, valued at $58,057,547.

This trust controls 95 per cent of this great industry, now about 150,000 barrels daily. This monopoly dictates to the producers of petroleum what they must take for their crude products, while the consumer is obliged to pay high prices for the refined product compared with the low price of crude, and take whatever quality of oil the trust choose to give, which is in "restraint of trade."

This trust dictates to the railroads the high tariff rates their competitors must pay, while its own freight is carried at normal figures—proof, my own case, per law reports of Ohio.

The law of supply and demand cuts no figure with this trust, for the great difference between the low price of crude and the comparative high price of the refined is growing wider and wider day by day. For example, taking the price of crude oil and of refined, on May 1 and November 1 (1898), shows that refined oil has advanced 62 per cent more than that of crude. Their general tactics are to advance temporarily the price of crude oil, in order to raise the price of refined, and soon thereafter put the price of crude back to its original position or lower, and by the power of their monopoly maintain the price of refined at the advanced figures, which is in "restraint of trade and commerce."

The average price of petroleum, best grade (1897), was only 1¼ cents a gallon, and the second grade, 1½ cents. It only costs one-fourth of a cent a gallon to pipe it and three-eighths of a cent to refine it, or a total of 2¼ cents per gallon for the best refined grade, and 1¾ cents, second grade, of which latter more than one-third of total production is produced.

The general sale of the trusts' products throughout the United States is done through private firms and subagencies located in every town, which report to some particular division agency, circumscribed by certain defined limits of territory, and from the several division agencies go forward condensed subreports to the headquarters of one of the several constituent companies, which also has a certain defined limit of territory, and from the constituent companies there is sent general reports direct to the head center, the Standard Oil Trust, 26 Broadway, New York.

Here is a mammoth combination of properties, tied together by trust certificate issues of the Standard Oil Trust, which interests are protected and specially safeguarded from competitive intrusion by the combined power of the railways of the United States, through interested rail officials, by special secret rebates and other devices, thus enhancing the price of petroleum products, and of a poorer quality.

This is a conspiracy in "restraint of trade" in gross violation of the Federal anti-trust act, confirmed by decision of the Supreme Court, as follows:

"All combinations which are in restraint of trade or commerce are prohibited whether in the form of trusts or in any other form whatever."

This trust purchases 95 per cent of the crude petroleum produced in the United States and at the well of the producer, and delivers same, as common carriers, through its local pipe lines into its local iron storage tanks, and from thence it is distributed by its trunk lines of pipe, as common carriers, to interior manufacturing points, in different States, and to the seaboard, while the products thereof are redistributed into their own tank cars and other interstate cars, and carried over interstate railroads to consumers throughout the United States, as well by ocean steamers to foreign ports, and thence continued by European rail into foreign lands.

This trust now owns about one-half of the total production of petroleum in the United States, and transports same through its seven pipe-line corporations to the other manufacturing constituent companies in the trust in other States, and charges to them the full regular fixed transportation rates, thus making them common carriers of their own production.

The Standard Oil Trust recently reported the following twenty corporations as now in the trust (present Ohio proceedings).

Pipe lines.

National Transit Company, Pennsylvania	$25,455,200
The Buckeye Pipe Line Company, Ohio	10,000,000
New York Transit Company, New York	5,000,000
Southern Pipe Line Company, Pennsylvania	5,000,000
The Eureka Pipe Line Company, West Virginia	5,000,000
Northern Pipe Line Company, Pennsylvania	1,000,000
Indiana Pipe Line Company, Indiana	1,000,000
	52,455,200
Standard Oil Company, New Jersey	10,000,000
Standard Oil Company, New York	7,000,000
Standard Oil Company, Ohio	3,500,000
Standard Oil Company, Kentucky	1,000,000
Standard Oil Company, Indiana	1,000,000
The Atlantic Refining Company	5,000,000
The Solar Refining Company	500,000
Forest Oil Company	5,500,000
South Pennsylvania Oil Company	2,500,000
The Ohio Oil Company	2,500,000
Northwestern Ohio Natural Gas Company	3,278,500
Union Tank Line Company	8,500,000
The Anglo-American Oil Company	5,000,000
	102,233,700

The average market price of its trust certificates for the month of January, 1899, was $447 per share, on par of 100, which, based on their own reported capitalization of $102,233,700, amounts to a valuation of $456,984,639.

The nineteen home corporations of the Standard Oil Trust are organized in seven States of the Union, as follows, but its tentacles, through subagencies, reach out to every nook and hamlet in the land, which indirectly report to one of the several constituent companies:

Pennsylvania, 6 corporations, capitalized at	$44,455,200
Ohio, 5 corporations, capitalized at	19,278,500
New Jersey, 2 corporations, capitalized at	15,500,000
New York, 2 corporations, capitalized at	12,000,000
West Virginia, 1 corporation, capitalized at	5,000,000
Indiana, 2 corporations, capitalized at	2,000,000
Kentucky, 1 corporation, capitalized at	1,000,000
	97,233,700
The Anglo-American Oil Company of London	5,000,000
	102,233,700

These twenty corporations are intertwined and interlocked into a compact whole or body in one private association, tied together by trust certificate issues, which represent the appraised value of all the corporate stocks of these several corporations, which corporate stocks were transferred to the trustees of the trust, who hold them in trust as collateral security for trust certificate holders.

This trust owns 95 per cent of the petroleum pipe-line transportation of the United States, of which nine-tenths has been laid down in States that have enacted what are known as special "free-pipe bills," under rights of eminent domain for the condemnation of private lands, to lay down said pipes for public use, as common carriers. There are seven distinct pipe-line corporations in the trust, whose sole and only business is to pipe oil, with an aggregate capitalization of $52,455,200, or more than half the total capitalization of the trust, and at above average market price of trust certificates (447) represents a valuation in pipe lines of $234,474,744.

These seven pipe-line corporations, organized in different States, are jointly connected by trust certificate issues (as well to the other constituent members), and jointly or conjointly pipe the same oil through each other's connecting pipe lines the petroleum collected from producers' wells in different States, and transport same as common carriers, at certain fixed rates of transportation, to the manufacturing points in other States, and to the seaboard, and abroad, and thus do a business of "interstate character" as well as international, and therefore is—

COMMERCE AMONG THE SEVERAL STATES OR WITH THE FOREIGN NATIONS.

The following general points, more in detail, are submitted for your due consideration.

This trust collects, through its local pipe lines, from wells located in the oil-producing regions of Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and West Virginia, vast quantities of crude petroleum of the first class, or best grade, and delivers same into its local iron storage tanks, for which it makes a general transportation charge, and for years back, of 20 cents a barrel for such collecting and delivery. Besides, it retransports the same petroleum out of said tanks, through its trunk lines of pipe, to the manufacturing corporations in the trust, located at the ports of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, where the same is manufactured, said corporations being charged the regular fixed local and whatever the joint railroad tariff trunk-line pipeage rates may be.

Thereafter, a portion of the products thereof is distributed through the trust's tank cars, and the box cars of the railroads, to consumers in the several Eastern States, while its tank steamers distribute a part to ports on the New England and Southern coasts.

Another part or portion, two-thirds, is mainly sent in bulk to foreign ports in the trust's tank steamers (and by barrel in other steamers and sailing vessels), at fixed transportation rates charged to its European corporations, and there delivered into its iron storage tanks at these several ports, and from thence continued and distributed in bulk by the trust's tank cars, and its tank wagons, and also by barrel, in the box cars of foreign railways, to its many agencies and consumers in European countries, for the sale and benefit of the trust's corporations abroad.

"The Anglo-American Oil Company," of London, capital $5,000,000, is one of the constituent members of the trust, while high authorities say this trust own, or are largely interested in and control, the Germany-American Petroleum Company, the Belgian-American Petroleum Company, the Danish-American Petroleum Company, French Refiners' Syndicate of Paris, 45 per cent of the stock of Nobel Brothers, Russian oil kings, and the oil industry of Canada.

Crude petroleum in its natural state is also sent by the trust, direct from the wells, by its own local and trunk lines of pipe, to its bulk ocean steamers and thence across the seas, and by foreign rail, to trust refineries located in France, Spain, Brazil, Mexico, etc.

A small part of the best grade crude is collected by local pipe from Pennsylvania producing fields at the regular fixed pipeage rates made by the trust—20 cents a barrel—and transported through the trust's connecting trunk lines of pipe at certain other fixed rates to one of the constituent members of the trust, "The Standard Oil Company" of Cleveland, Ohio, and there manufactured and its products distributed through the trust's tank cars, tank wagons, and the box cars of the railroads, to its many agencies and consumers in the several States of the Union.

This trust also collects petroleum, through its local pipes, from wells located in the oil-producing regions of northwestern Ohio and Indiana, and delivers same into its local iron storage tanks at the same general fixed transportation charge of 20 cents a barrel; a second class or inferior grade of crude petroleum, known as sulphur oil, and retransports same out of said local tanks, by trunk lines of pipe, at certain other fixed joint rail and trunk line pipeage rates to Chicago, and to Whiting, Ind., a suburb of Chicago on the lake shore, where it has the largest single oil refining plant in the world, from which the products thereof are distributed by its vessels to lake ports at certain fixed transportation rates, and by its tank cars and tank wagons and the box cars of the railroads to its many agencies located in the different States of the Union. The market price of this inferior grade crude is two-thirds that of the best grade crude, but owing to the monopolistic powers of this trust consumers are forced to pay the same price for its products as those from best grade, which is in "restraint of trade."

The independent refiner, except in a few extreme cases, purchases his crude petroleum on the oil exchanges through the trust's certificate storage issues (which are a joint part and parcel of the original association trust certificate issues), and in which is inserted a regular and general fixed transportation rate of 20 cents a barrel, which must be paid to the trust before removal of the oil, which pipeage rate does not cost to exceed 5 cents a barrel to collect, but the monopolistic powers of the trust enforce a transportation rate four times its cost, which is in "restraint of trade." When crude oil sells at 50 cents a barrel the trust exacts the same transportation rate, or 40 per cent on the cost of the crude; to-day it is about 20 per cent.

The Standard Oil trust and the railroads conspire and maintain the same trunk-line pipeage and rail rates from the oil-producing regions to the seaboard and elsewhere, and in proof thereof, there was a contract between a corporation of this trust, the National Transit Company, and the railroads, by which the railroads were guaranteed a certain fixed revenue, 26 per cent of the total pipe and rail shipments, if the railroads would maintain certain high tariff rates. This is in "restraint of trade," for it thus enhances the price of oil to consumers, much beyond its normal condition.

The railroads refuse to furnish tank cars to the independent shipper whereby he could save 25 per cent in freight on the weight of the barrel, while the roads make no charge to the trust for the return of its empty tank cylinders, to offset the extra weight of the barrel, while such cylinders are not adapted to bring back general freight, like a box car. This is a conspiracy in "restraint of trade."

Moreover, the rail lines allow railcage rates, and excessive at that, for return of the trust's empty tank cars. The mileage rates, both ways, on the trust's tank cars pay for themselves in a period of three years, and thus are paid for several times over.

The early innovation of the tank car for the transportation of petroleum in bulk is where the Standard Oil monopoly has made its vast sums of money through freight discriminations, which has been the sole cause of the creation of this monopoly and of the Standard Oil trust. That is to say, these full-loaded tank cars were carried by the lump sum at inconceivably low rates of freight, regardless of their weight or capacity, exclusively for this monopoly and trust, without knowledge to the other shippers until exposed through public investigation, when the most astounding revelations came forth of 1600 per cent discrimination in favor of this monopoly over the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company.

This need not seem incredible, when the Hepburn State investigation committee of New York developed these facts, that through certain written contracts made by the trunk lines of road with the "South Improvement Company" (Standard Oil Company), the roads agreed to give to the Standard the same rebates on their competitors' shipments that they did on their own, which ranged from 40 cents to $1.06 per barrel on crude petroleum and 50 cents to $1.32 per barrel on refined. At the date of these contracts the Standard Oil Company only had 10 per cent (now 95) of the petroleum industry of this country, while its competitors had 90 per cent. Thus the Standard Oil Company received nine times as much for rebates on the shipment of its competitors as it did on its own. The resulting effects were to carry Standard Oil free and rob the treasuries of the roads out of other freight moneys in order to pay over the deficiencies.

To-day the same men are still at the helm of the petroleum industry, but with different, slicker, and more secret methods of procedure, and with many more kinds and devious ways to discriminate against their competitors which their combined ingenuity has concocted and devised, which the railroads readily accept and adopt; and thus it is this trust has become the greatest monopoly of the age and has extended its power and control over foreign countries, and the Russian oil fields, whose extent is greater than our own.

It was not long since that an expert accountant discovered that $7,000,000 in rebates has been paid by one road, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Company, which would have paid 5 per cent interest on $140,000,000 of its securities. This sum was diverted from the lawful security holders into the unlawful hands of the trust shipper, and was an important factor in the bankruptcy of the road.

Railway receiverships are largely due to trust freight discrimination, which rob the people for the benefit of the few.

Recently (1897, authority, Interstate Commerce Commission), accidentally comes to light 110 per cent discriminations in favor of the Standard Oil trust, by the New York, New Haven and Hartford River Railroad Company, under the control at that time of the "Joint Traffic Association," which was the greatest combination and railway pool this country has known, and which had the power to enforce equal rates for all, but in the case of the Standard Oil trust made special exceptions of above character, conclusively establishing the fact what a legalized pool would mean controlled by such arch conspirators, rail and trust officials, who have here conspired to rob the public by the enforcement and payment of 110 per cent more for petroleum products than it should, because of this foul conspiracy. This is a criterion and vivid example of continued existing secret rebates, especially given to this trust, showing the immensity of its power over railways, regardless of the interstate-commerce act or any other act or law, moral or divine, by which it exacts and compels the railways to enforce high tariff rates on petroleum against its competitors, that it may the sooner destroy and ruin them and also get a higher price for its products, and of a poorer quality. This is simply an example and vivid portrayal of the power of this monopoly and trust in "restraint of trade."

Less than two months ago the receivers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, under the jurisdiction and direct orders of a United States court, wrote the Interstate Commerce Commission a most unique acknowledgment of their criminal acts, as follows:

"The receivers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company will maintain on and after January 1, 1899, upon the lines operated by them, the rates, fares, and charges shown on the tariffs published and filed with the Commission as required by law."

And further said:

"We see no reason why the Commission should refuse its aid to the carriers in an effort to prevent competition from taking the form of illegal concessions through secret rates, drawbacks, rebates, and other devices."

That is to say, we admit doing these gross criminal acts and under an appointment as receivers of a railroad, but on a set day ahead we now give notice we propose to be honest and not further criminate ourselves by these atrocious acts, and if our neighboring lines continue to give further "illegal concessions through secret rates, drawbacks, rebates, and other devices" we will turn state's evidence, and "invoke the aid of the Commission to stop it." This is one of the prominent trunk lines of railway of our country, over which the Standard Oil trust ships large quantities of its manufactured products, and there can be no doubt whatever but that this trust still continues to receive from this road large rebates from its shipments regardless of this announcement. It is only a few years ago I proved that this line had discriminated against my shipments in favor of this trust, ranging from 50 to 162 per cent, which previously had been denied by the officials of this line over and over again.

This self-confessed, most bold, and extraordinary evidence from so high a source, and so recent, fully and completely convinces without any detailed evidence that railroads in general, through their officials, are daily committing the grossest of the gross unlawful criminal acts by giving large secret rebates to favored shippers, of which the Standard Oil trust is the most prominent, and which is in "restraint of trade," because of the enforced higher prices for this trust's product, in gross violation of the Federal anti-trust act.

These statements are officially confirmed by the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as follows:

"There is probably no one thing to-day which does so much to force out the small operator, and to build up those trusts and monopolies against which law and public opinion alike beat in vain, as discrimination in freight rates."

The Union Tank Line Company, a New Jersey corporation, and one of the constituent corporations in the trust, with its several thousand tank cars and box cars, transports and distributes for the manufacturing companies in the trust their manufactured products, for the dealing members of the trust, direct to thousands of their local agencies located in all parts of the United States, which products emanate from a half dozen principal manufacturing points in that number of States.

Petroleum is only produced in special localities, and 95 per cent thereof in four States of the Union—Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, and New York; therefore it necessarily becomes a business of "interstate character," because of the natural enforced distribution of the products thereof to consumers throughout the other forty States and Territories.

Thus it seems plain to me that the general business of the Standard Oil trust is of such "interstate character" as to warrant your department to commence at once immediate proceedings to suppress this the greatest of all trusts in "restraint of trade or commerce among the several States and with foreign nations."

For years no new competitive refineries have been built; no new additions of consequence added to existing ones; no net earnings and no dividends for present competing refineries. They have become practically worthless, because this trust has and does conspire with the railroads to do these gross, unlawful acts.

But this trust pays annually over $30,000,000 in dividends, and has for many years.

The Standard Oil trust, from the enactment of the anti-trust act, almost nine years ago, has boldly and defiantly disregarded its wise provisions and has ridden roughshod over the rights and liberties of the people, and to such an extent as to destroy its competitors and virtually all competition, and is thus able to dictate to consumers the price of its products, and is thus in "restraint of trade."

In consequence of the existence of this great and unlawful combination and trust my business, which was of interstate character, has been ruined, my refinery is in a hopeless condition, shut down for almost three years, because I can not operate and do business against the unlawful acts of this trust, as herein narrated and complained of.

Therefore, to my Government I appeal and enter a decided and most emphatic protest and complaint against the existence of the Standard Oil trust, because of the ruination of my business through its conspiracy with the railroads. Therefore I appeal to you, as the proper official of the Government, to take such summary and decisive action as will the soonest and most effectually "prohibit" this trust from further doing business in any of the States of the United States.

For humanity's sake this Government went to war with Spain, with the loss of several hundred men by the bullet and disease, to relieve from bondage and oppression less than a million of foreign subjects, insurgents, who no doubt were unduly oppressed.

But this Government, false to the Declaration of Independence, and thus false to its people, purposely ignores and overlooks what should be the greater interest the greater welfare of its own 70,000,000 subjects at home, who are much more sorely and grievously oppressed by the great unlawful power exercised by the trusts, in conspiracy with the railroads, to obtain and receive from them, through underhanded means and criminal secrecy, the grossest of the gross freight discriminations in "restraint of trade and commerce" that the world has known.

Thus, within a few years nine-tenths of the commerce of this country has been lodged in the hands of the trusts—to the extent of $2,702,768,900; which can easily be accounted for by the conspiracy existing between trust and rail officials to divide a larger swag or revenues through higher freight rates, that greater discriminations may accrue, while high-salaried presidents of our leading lines of railways are trust-certificate holders, and thus directly participate in trusts' net earnings and larger dividends to accrue, besides the consequent increased valuation of their trust certificates. As proof thereof, Hugh J. Jewett, late president of the Erie Railway Company, who died in March last, left to his sons and daughters, in equal shares, his holdings in the trust certificates of the Standard Oil trust.

It might be well to state as a side issue and special favoritism that the railroads allow the Standard Oil trust the exclusive privilege to lay down its oil pipes in the roads' right of way and over passenger bridges, and also to cross under their tracks wherever they choose to go, and as often as they please, without remuneration, with infinitesimal cost of pipe distribution, robbing the roads of this immense and heavy tonnage, showing a most extraordinary state of affairs in modern railroading.

But, on the other hand, if a competing pipe line, which has secured fee-simple rights, as against railroad surface rights, makes an attempt to cross or lay their pipes under the tracks or roadbed of a railroad, then the road proceeds at once to drive them off their legal rights by force, and if not successful, then they get out injunctions, resort to all possible quibbles, technicalities, and delays to harass and annoy, to make it as expensive as possible to the competing line. This is in "restraint of trade."

I refer to the United States Pipe Line Company, who now and for years back have been trying to pipe oil from wells in the oil-producing regions to the seaboard—New York—as does the Standard Oil trust, so as to reap the same corresponding advantages of the trust—cheap pipeage rates, one-tenth the cost of present rail rates; but they are to-day blocked on New Jersey soil by the railroads working wholly in the interest of the Standard Oil trust to deprive them of similar rights already given to the trust, and without cost. Moreover, the combined power of the railroads and this trust have defeated all attempts of competing pipe lines from getting through the New Jersey legislature a free-pipe bill, as enacted by other States. This is in "restraint of trade."

In consequence of these fabulous railway freight discriminations and extra special privileges, the trustees and officials of the Standard Oil trust since 1872 have amassed one billion in wealth, and its results are that to-day they are presidents and directors in one-fifth of the total railway mileage of this country; proof, Poor's Manual.

The interstate-commerce act provides a penalty of $5,000 fine and two years in the penitentiary for each and every offense, and yet with about twelve years' trial of the act, with thousands upon thousands of daily aggressions and offenses committed by both rail and trust officials, both equally guilty under the act, not one of them has yet been landed in the penitentiary to atone for their gross criminal acts, and this is the sole cause and the reason why that the act is a dead letter, because of its nonobservance and enforcement.

Trust and rail officials are joint owners, copartners in each others' properties, bonds and stocks, and are devising, scheming, and conspiring with each other to what extent and how slick it may be done, through criminal secrecy under cover of the law, to rob the producer of the soil and mine out of his honest labor and toil through higher freight rates, that greater discriminations, unlawful gains and steals may flow like a river into the plethoric purses of these arch conspirators who are robbing the owners of the field, the forest, and the mine out of hundreds of millions of dollars through lessened prices of their products to the extent of these discriminations, while at the same time their personal and realty holdings are materially depreciated in value; and this is the cause of the great unrest, universal complaint, and discontent. The railroads are wholly responsible for this state of affairs of throwing the absolute control of production and distribution into the hands of the trusts.

These arch conspirators, trust and rail officials, because of the magnitude of their robberies and steals, the enormity and grossness of their crimes, through high-handed piratical assaults upon the internal commerce of the country through criminal secret rebates, have ruined individual industrial interests, the homes and firesides of a nation, and thus have become greater criminals than the pirates of the seas or the robbers of the Rhine.

Respectfully, yours,

GEORGE RICE.

SUPPLEMENTAL.

MARIETTA, OHIO, February 16, 1900.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On November 5 last I addressed you and entered a general complaint against the Standard Oil trust to prohibit it from further doing business in violation of the Federal anti-trust act, on which the Supreme Court, March 22, 1897, decided and confirmed, in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association case, that "All combinations which are in restraint of trade or commerce are prohibited, whether in the form of trusts or in any other form whatever."

I also said that "I can furnish you abundant proof to verify and sustain my charge that to day it is the greatest monopoly and industrial trust in restraint of trade that the world has known."

On November 15 you replied, in part, as follows:

"It does not appear from your communication that either your own business or that of the alleged combination against which you complain is of an interstate character such as to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction under the statute mentioned."

Upon receipt of this letter I went to work to establish the proof, and on January 10 I again wrote you submitting fully in detail most important and conclusive facts to sustain the general charge made, covering sixteen pages of typewritten matter, and up to the present time no acknowledgment of its receipt has come to hand—ignored, as it were.

I inclose a revision of my former complaint, and not only ask, but politely demand from you as a representative American citizen, whom you represent in your official capacity as an officer of the Government, of which I am an integral part, backed by many millions more, that it is your solemn and imperative duty, under section 4 of the Federal antitrust act, to institute the necessary proceedings against said trust, as there provided as follows:

"The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations."

Said section also provides:

"And pending such petition and before final decree the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises."

Section 6 of the act provides:

"Any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law."

Under the array of facts presented it seems to be incumbent upon you, for and on behalf of the Government and for the benefit of its subjects, of which you are the sworn servant, that you should at once direct your subordinates to go ahead and use such drastic measures as the act provides, that will the soonest and most effectually wind up this trust, not only through the imprisonment of the violators thereof, but also to enjoin, forfeit, and condemn to the United States its several thousand tank cars and other cars, the seizure and condemnation of all oil in its passage through interstate trunk lines of pipe to interior points and to the seaboard, inclusive of all property in course of transportation to a foreign country, belonging to the Standard Oil trust, that it may be estopped and precluded from further doing business in the United States.

Recent Ohio proceedings have fully and clearly established the fact of the continued and present existence of the Standard Oil trust.

Some nine years ago, on the universal demand of the people, the Congress of the United States passed an enabling act, known as the Federal antitrust act, to relieve its subjects from then existing and constant formation of gigantic trusts and combinations by greedy and lawless freebooters, trust and rail officials, who lay their tribute on the internal commerce of a great nation and sequestrate it for their own private use and gains by reducing the price of production and increasing the price of consumption at their own sweet will, because not summarily dealt with as the act provides, and the resulting effects are that trusts have rapidly increased in numbers and capitalization, while to-day we are confronted by an epidemic of such formations, the result of nonenforcement of the act by our trusted lieutenants, Government officials, who have neglected their sworn duty to enforce the wise and stringent provisions of said act as specially and particularly delegated and required to do, and by such dereliction of duty the act becomes a nullity and practically void.

If it had been enforced with rigor at its incipiency the then existing trusts and combinations would long since have disappeared, others would not have been formed, the present epidemic of trusts unknown, and the great unrest and discontent that has long pervaded the land would long ere this have died out and passed away, peace and contentment would encompass the land, for private industrial interests would have had equality of rights, the independence and status of mankind raised to a higher level, with more respect for the flag.

There was a time when to be a Roman citizen was to be a king, but not so for Americans in these degenerate times.

The absolute power to quickly and most effectually wind up the Standard Oil Trust rests in your hands, except by command of the President, and the question of the hour is, Will you or will you not observe the mandate of Congress and of the Supreme Court?

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1899.

GEORGE RICE, Esq.,
Marietta, Ohio.

SIR: In your communication of November 5, 1898, after stating that you were engaged in the oil producing and refining business in Ohio, you requested the institution of proceedings by the United States against what you termed the Standard Oil Trust, to restrain further violations of the act of July 2, 1890, known as the anti-trust law.

On November 15, 1898, replying to your letter, I called your attention to the fact that the act of July 2, 1890, to whose provisions you appealed for protection, has reference only to that trade or commerce which exists, or may exist, among the several States or with foreign nations; and that it did not appear from your communication that either your own business or that of the alleged combination against which you complained, is of an interstate character such as to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction under the statute mentioned.

Your communications of January 10 and February 16, 1899, which assume to state the facts warranting a compliance with your original request, were duly received and are having proper consideration.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General.

MARIETTA, OHIO, April 17, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of March 14 has come to hand, after two months of a delay, in answer to my communication of January 10, while another month has elapsed, making three months, while a total of five months' time has already been consumed since November 5, when I first entered complaint to your department against the Standard Oil Trust for gross violations of the Federal antitrust act of July, 1890, which violations have been continuous, unwarranted, and unchecked by your department for a period of almost nine years, through the extreme neglect of its chief officials to prosecute the violators thereof, as particularly and specifically set forth and required to do under section 4 of said act.

It seems to be that the Congress of the United States has delegated to you, and to you alone, its supreme power in the execution of said act, in its fullness and entirety, without fear or favor. There is nothing intricate in this case; it is about as plain and transparent as daylight, because of the briefness, simplicity, and directness of the statute. An ordinary layman can easily understand and digest it, and with the abundant proof in your hands further delay in the consideration of so plain a case is inexcusable and entirely unnecessary, and you can rest assured that the people will hold you and the Administration responsible for nonaction thereon.

Time is fast slipping by to take advantage of the usual meeting of courts and grand juries in the winter and early spring months, while summer vacation is near by, with additional unnecessary delay which should not be incurred and ought to be avoided so far as may be, and the offenders soon brought to book and summarily dealt with as the law directs.

I am ready to appear at any time before grand juries to substantiate the charges I have made.

My several communications have been treated lightly and with indifference, after I have taken great pains to formulate and transmit to you a plain and voluminous statement of facts, unquestioned and unanswered as to their accuracy and truthfulness, and which can not successfully be gainsaid, and yet no valid reason or excuse is given why general prosecution and summary measures should not ere this have been meted out to these offenders, and thus check this gigantic monster and unlawful trust in its mad career to levy its tribute exactions on an unwilling, persecuted, and exasperated people.

The Parliament of Great Britain undertook to put a tax of a penny a box on friction matches, which would have increased the revenue about half a million. The people of England revolted to such an extent that the Government dare not press it. The match was needed to light the petroleum lamp. What would be said in Great Britain if their Government would allow an unlawful trust and combination like the Standard Oil trust, through railroad conspiracy to dictate the tariff rate on petroleum, whereby they are enabled to lay a tribute of 333 per cent on the means of lighting both the poor man's house and the rich man's palace in England, and this I proved before the Interstate Commerce Commission as against my own shipments, and recently 110 per cent rebate or freight discrimination was accidently discovered in favor of this trust on the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, which, of course, increases the price of petroleum consumption to this extent, and is manifestly in "restraint of trade."

Under the Government of Great Britain such exposures would not be borne, not an hour after it was known, and shall it be said that under the Government of the United States similar protection can not be had for its own citizens?

Shall it have to be said that the Standard Oil trust is stronger than the Government, in defiance of all laws; that under a republican form of government, where the people are represented in making the laws, such a monopoly shall obtain by which these men are allowed to continue their gross and criminal depredations upon the internal and foreign commerce of a great nation, wrecking and destroying millions upon millions of private industrial interests, making such fortunes as were never dreamed of since the days of the plundering of the world by the proconsuls of Rome?

The question of the hour is how soon will this most important matter for the public welfare reach a focus, and when will you direct your subordinates, the several district attorneys, 76 in number, to proceed to use the most drastic and extreme measures, as especially provided for in the act, to rid this country of the greatest monopoly and criminal trust that the world knows of in "restraint of trade?" Its agencies, both public and private, extend to, and reach every town and city in the land.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

MARIETTA, OHIO, April 24, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I again call your attention to the fact that five and a half months have elapsed since I entered complaint to your department against the unlawful monopoly of the Standard Oil trust, for the grossest of the gross violations of the Federal antitrust act, and yet I am not aware or advised that action has been taken thereon. I then stated that "I can furnish you abundant proof to verify and sustain my charge that to-day it is the greatest monopoly and industrial trust, in restraint of trade, that the world has known."

I have duly furnished you that abundant proof, on which you have not seen fit to take action, and in the expectation that further delay will occur I will transmit to you from time to time additional facts that may arise in my mind, showing more in detail the unlawfulness of this giant trust and monopoly.

In February, 1898, a high Standard official swore that this trust was composed of twenty corporations, with an aggregate capitalization of $102,233,700, which at the market price this day of 490 on par of 100 represents a valuation of $500,945,130, of which its pipe-line companies, seven in number, represent a capitalization of $52,455,200, more than half, and at 490 amounts to a valuation of $257,030,480, which does an interstate and international business of great magnitude by gathering up vast quantities of crude petroleum in the several oil-producing States of the Union and transporting same through trunk lines of pipe to the seaboard, where it is manufactured, two-thirds going abroad in the bulk tank steamers of the trust, while a small portion is consumed in the East.

In February last (Ohio investigation) I testified that the total expense to this trust of gathering up crude petroleum by local pipes in the oil-producing regions, inclusive of interest on the investment, did not cost to exceed five cents a barrel, and admitted by the trust because not cross-examined thereon, while the regular established charge is twenty cents a barrel, or four times as much, which charge could not be exacted and enforced, except through the extraordinary power of this monopoly to compel obedience to its dictation.

The average annual production of petroleum for the past two years, 1897-98, was 51,312,183 barrels, and at 10 cents a barrel the trust would make 100 per cent profit, which even at this figure is 50 per cent too much, but based on 10 cents a barrel, and 10 cents a barrel overcharge, the producers of petroleum are robbed out of their just dues to the extent of more than $5,000,000 per annum, and the consumer pays that much more for his oil, which is a monopoly "in restraint of trade."

At the same hearing, I testified that the total cost to pipe oil from the oil regions to the seaboard, through trunk lines of pipe, did not cost to exceed five cents a barrel, because of larger pumps and larger pipes, and much greater quantities transported through single pipes, with virtually same manual help, and my testimony, under cross-examination, was unshaken upon this point by the trust's counsel.

The present tariff rail rates on petroleum and its products from general points in the oil producing and manufacturing centers of the oil regions to the seaboard, New York, is 16½ cents per 100 pounds, and present pipeage rates are exactly the same, through a most foul, concerted conspiracy agreement between the railroads and the Standard Oil trust to maintain an equality of rates, 450 per cent greater than they should be, as subsequently shown.

To-day it costs the independent refiner 66 cents a barrel to transport a barrel of oil, 50 gallons in wooden packages of 400 pounds, no other means provided for him, from the oil regions to the seaboard, and a pro rata rate on a barrel of crude 42 gallons would cost 55 cents a barrel or eleven times more than it costs to pipe it. The pipe line charge should not be to exceed 10 cents a barrel, which would be a hundred per cent. profit, and with 45 cents a barrel overcharge is an excess of 450 per cent. unlawful pipe and rail freight discrimination, because of this unlawful, conspired monopoly. Two-thirds of total production is sent to the seaboard, or 34,208,122 barrels, average past two years, and at 45 cents a barrel overcharge amounts to the sum of $15,393,654 annually, interstate public highway robbery and steal, in the transportation of petroleum through the connivance and conspiracy of rail and trust officials, who are in command of our railways, and of this trust, who have acquired their great monopoly power by unlawful means, and exercise it to the extreme to capture and sequestrate unto themselves this great industry, which evidently is in gross violation of the Federal antitrust act and a huge monopoly "in restraint of trade."

The average annual production past two years of Lima oil, second-grade crude, and which sells at about one-third less than best grade, was 18,399,661 barrels, and it is supposed that at least one-half of this amount, or 9,199,830 barrels, is piped from the Lima oil fields to the trust's refineries located at Whiting, Ind., suburb of Chicago, on the lake. The rail rate is 10 cents per 100 pounds, or 40 cents a barrel, on 400 pounds, or at the rate of 33⅓ cents per barrel of 42 gallons of crude, and allowing 5 cents a barrel for pipage leaves 28⅓ cents per barrel overcharge, amounting to the sum of $2,631,151, and which is also a monopoly "in restraint of trade."

The Standard Oil trust, because of their unlawful monopoly, exacts and robs the producer out of 2 barrels of oil on each hundred, from actual measured quantity in the producers' tank, on the flimsy plea and pretext that at some future time said oil will shrink that much. The average annual production of petroleum for past two years, 1897-98, being 51,312,183 barrels, this deduction amounts to 1,026,243 barrels of oil on white sand and Trenton rock production, and at the average market price for both kinds of crude past two years, 73¾ cents per barrel of 42 gallons, or 1¾ cents per gallon, amounts to the sum of $756,845 that is annually robbed from the producer because unable to prevent it, and which is "in restraint of trade."

This makes a total sum of $23,781,650 that is filched from an unwilling people in higher-priced oils, because our Government officials are supine, do not execute the act as required, are responsible therefor, and yet let these marauders continue and extend their scope of action, to exact their unlawful gains from off an oppressed and downtrodden race; and oh, ye gods and goddesses, how much longer will the people stand such dereliction of official duty!

In this connection it might be well to state as an eye opener and for a sample, the enormous unlawful profits and the acquisition of untold wealth as represented by the trust's business of last two years, 1897-98. As shown above, the average cost of the crude was 1¼ cents per gallon, pipage from wells to refineries one-fourth of a cent, and the trust can refine it for one-fourth of a cent a gallon, making a total of 2½ cents per gallon total cost in its manufactured state for all grades of refined, including those sold at extreme prices under fancy-brand names, so that the consumer can easily figure what the enormous percentage of profit this trust makes.

In continuation of the monopolistic powers exercised by this trust, it is common report in the oil regions, and is true, that they absolutely regulate the production of petroleum by the price they set on the crude through ownership of 95 per cent of the pipe lines and purchase of 95 per cent of all the crude oil produced. When they need more production, they commence gradually to raise the price, until their necessary wants are supplied, which is evidenced by the stability of net stocks of petroleum on hand, there being only 752,101 barrels of an increase, January 1, 1899, over January 1, 1898, and 1,239,069 barrels of an increase, January 1, 1898, over January 1, 1897. When their wants are oversupplied, then they commence to reduce the price of crude, but not on refined for home consumption, unless some radical emergency should arise, thus widening the differences between crude and refined, and thus largely increasing their unlawful profits through the power and force of monopoly, which is "in restraint of trade."

This trust has already entered into the monopoly and subsidization of the editorial columns of the newspapers of the country, and pay high prices for leading laudatory articles, written by trust agents, as recently exposed in the Ohio State investigations. This is quite praiseworthy for an association of such wealth and power to resort to such despicable means to influence public opinion in their favor.

I am anxiously awaiting your action upon the complaints produced, and hope same will not further be delayed on so grave and important a matter as this is.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

MARIETTA, OHIO, May 1, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I again call your attention to the fact that six months, less five days, have elapsed since I entered complaint to your Department for enforcement of the law against the unlawful existence of the Standard Oil trust, as a trust monopoly of the first magnitude "in restraint of trade," for the grossest of the gross and criminal violations of the Federal antitrust act, a continuation thereof for almost nine years, and yet I am not aware or advised that action has been taken thereon.

The question of the hour is how much longer the public will stand this oppression and these tyrannical exactions under a supposed free and enlightened government, which does not use its force and power to summarily stop these lawless freebooters from overriding the law and the land, but condescends to allow them to go on, continue in their mad career to dictate prices at their own sweet will to both producer and consumer, crush and destroy all competitive interests that may stand in their pathway, in the acquisition of sordid wealth, mainly acquired through collusion and conspiracy with the railroads, of which the officials of this trust have become copartners, large owners in their stock and bonds, through unlawful rebates, freight discriminations, and to-day are presidents and directors in one-fifth of the total railway mileage of this country, and last month came into the absolute possession of that great system of rail lines, the Baltimore and Ohio, all acquired and obtained in the brief space of twenty-seven years, Rothchilds eclipsed, a sad commentary on the decay and fall of Republican institutions.

There is no better illustration of recent date as to this collusion and conspiracy, and the monopoly power exercised by this trust over railroads is in the greatest combination and railway pool ever organized in the United States, the "Joint Traffic Association," by which this association excepted petroleum from the rate-making control of the board of managers, "to be subject to special contract," which undoubtedly means rebate or freight discriminations, which was subsequently carried out to the extent of 110 per cent, and which are as prevalent and potent to-day as ever, if not more so, and no doubt present organization of trust combinations are engineered and largely based upon this, the all-absorbing element and safety to investors, by which competitors and competition will be shut out and have no show. William H. Vanderbilt was a natural-born prophet when he prophesied in his testimony before the Hepburn committee August 27, 1879, regarding Standard officials:

Q. "You were disgusted with them a long while ago?

A. "I was, because I said if the thing kept on the oil people would own the roads instead of the roads owning them."

Apropos to this, in the first three years' operation of the interstate commerce act, the railroads criminally allowed to the Standard Oil trust, and to no one else, a new and specious kind of a rebate, the deduction from actual measured quantity and weight, 62 gallons of oil from off each tank car, or the carriage of 1¼ per cent of their by-products free. The officials of the rail lines never reported these villainous acts to the commission, as the law required, and only were they accidentally revealed through other investigations.

After paying enormous dividends of more than $30,000,000 per annum, its surplus, to a partial extent, many millions per annum, is used in the purchase and control of petroleum production of this country, about one-half now acquired, while press reports show them to be back of and behind many of the recent industrial trust combinations now being floated, iron, steel, copper, zinc, smelters, etc., for their money means seem to be unlimited.

This trust monopoly combination power of the Standard Oil trust is "in restraint of trade" for the reason that "it suppresses competition and arbitrarily fixes prices," as following show:

It enforces upon consumers of petroleum the inferior products, a poor quality of oil, made from low-grade crude, which are sold separately and mixed at the same price as products from best-grade crude, also in the sale of undertest oils, and in short measure.

There is no competition in the sale of vast quantities of lubricating oils used by the railroads; the trust gets it all at "arbitrarily fixed prices" most extraordinary, of which noncompetition bars quality.

In present contest before the English Parliament to increase the flash test of petroleum to a safety point, the London Star has this to say:

"The feast is illuminated by the lurid glare of the deadly low-flash oil of the Standard Oil trust. When the lamp hursts and death presides at the table, there is the coffin trust to bury its victims."

Justice Harlan, in his dissent from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the sugar trust case, which case differs widely from the facts presented by me in the matter of the Standard Oil trust, presents the matter forcibly when he says:

"We have before us the case of a combination which absolutely controls, or may, at its discretion, control, the price of all the refined sugar in this country. Suppose another combination, organized for private gain and to control prices, should obtain possession of all the large flour mills in the United States; another of all the grain elevators; another of all the oil territory; another of all the salt-producing regions; another of all the cotton mills, and another of all the great establishments for slaughtering animals and the preparation of meats. What power is competent to protect the people of the United States against such dangers except a national power—one that is capable of exerting its sovereign authority throughout every part of the territory and over all the people of the nation."

What his imagination pictured as possible in the line of monopoly has been more than surpassed during the brief period which has elapsed since he penned his vigorous protest.

The query is, what avail is a national power with its sovereign authority, if its officials fail to execute the law, allow such unlawful combinations to exist and continue, while many more are daily formed. The greatest commercial evil of the day is in the monopoly power of present formation of trust combinations through quantity carried that enables trust officials to criminally conspire and collude with rail officials to control absolutely and most effectually the arteries of commerce through high tariff and compulsory dictatorial freight rates that greater rebates may follow, of which the consumer pays the additional burden. A prominent promoter of trust combinations has just informed me that they only want to secure about three-fourths of an industry, which is significant, because it allows the plausible assertion of free and open competition, while the covert design by these cormorants is to gradually absorb and confiscate the balance of the competitive interests who would not go into the combination or could not sell their properties at actual worth, and subsequently ascertained their fatal mistake and now are obliged to succumb to the inevitable and freeze-out process, take what they can get under this modern and piratical method of unlawful warfare, of which conspiracy, bribery, and corruption are the dominant features.

As an American citizen whose business has been ruined by the trust monopoly power of the Standard Oil trust "in restraint of trade," and who has produced to you voluminous and incontrovertible facts to sustain the charge, I desire to know when summary proceedings will be commenced to oust this trust from further doing business in the United States of America. You have the full and exclusive power of the Government at your command to easily and quickly carry this ouster into effect, the act makes it imperative on you so to do, and the vital question of the hour is, How soon will this be carried into effect; and if not, why not? I await your reply.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

ASTOR HOUSE, NEW YORK, May 5, 1899.

President WM. MCKINLEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Being the Chief Executive of the nation, the President of the United States of America, elected by the people to safeguard the public interests, I appeal to you as one of its native born for justice and equality of rights to which I am entitled to as a freeborn American citizen. I enter my protest, and this a secondary complaint, to whom it should not have been necessary for me to have appealed, but force of circumstances compel me to do it, and so I call your attention to certain complaints and facts that warrant me in so doing. Six months ago I made general complaint to the Department of Justice, followed by several more detailed complaints of the unlawful existence of that well-known trust monopoly combination, the Standard Oil trust, that I was an acute sufferer thereby, my business being ruined, my refinery shut down for the past three years owing to the machinations of this unlawful trust monopoly and its collusive conspiracy with the rail lines to destroy my business, which it has done.

I refer you to the voluminous and incontrovertible facts that I have presented to the Attorney-General, fully and completely substantiating my charges that this unlawful trust combination is the greatest monopoly "in restraint of trade" that the world has known, which restraint has been continuous for almost nine years, in gross violation of the Federal antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and yet at this late day of my complaint I am not aware or advised that action has been taken thereon, and this is the reason that I appeal to you, and call your attention thereto, that further delay or leniency should not be allowed, that summary action long ere this should have been taken by the Government to rid this country of the baneful effects of this trust. I can not possibly conceive how the acquisition of such fabulous unlawful wealth should stand as a bar to the equality of rights and justice for one and all, without fear or favor, but if so, our Republican institutions are a failure.

In your inaugural address you uttered these memorable words:

"The declaration of the party now restored to power has been in the past that of opposition to all combinations of capital organized in trusts, or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the conditions of trade among our citizens."

I await your answer.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, May 6, 1899.

DEAR SIR: The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of recent date, and to inform you that it has been referred for the consideration of the Attorney-General.

Very truly, yours,

J. A. PORTER,
Secretary to the President.

Mr. GEO. RICE,
Marietta, Ohio.

MARIETTA, OHIO, May 15, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I again remind you of the fact that more than six months have passed since I entered general complaint to your Department, including several subsequent additional detailed complaints for the enforcement of the law against the unlawful existence of the well-known and well-defined trust monopoly combination—the Standard Oil trust—and yet at this late date I am not aware or advised that action has yet been taken to rid this country of its baneful effects, which can easily and quickly be done if summary measures are used, as specially provided for in the Federal anti-trust act. Shall it have to be said that the act has become nugatory simply because of its nonenforcement after these nine long years of gross evasions? Is the Government going to allow these offenders to continue their lawlessness indefinitely without check or limit? Are the people to suffer, deprived of relief, because their delegated Government official refuses to execute the law and relieve the country of this incubus? I ask from you the prompt enforcement of the act because my complaints to you are based on solid facts, unquestioned and unanswered, incontrovertible, and the question of the hour is, Will you enforce the law in this particular case as well as others; and if not, why not?

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. RICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 31, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General.

SIR: Mr. George Rice, of Marietta, Ohio, has sent to me the correspondence which he has had with the Department of Justice in regard to the requested enforcement against the Standard Oil trust of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

The correspondence submitted to me consists of his letter of November 5, 1898, and the reply thereto under date of November 15, 1898, by Acting Attorney-

General Richards, No. 8247, 1898, S. G., also his letter of January 10, 1899; also his letter and supplemental letter of February 16, 1899; your reply of March 14, 1899; also his letters of April 17, April 24, May 1, and May 15, 1899, to which no reply has as yet been received, and also his letter to the President under date of May 5 instant, and the letter of the President to him under date of May 6, to the effect that that letter had been referred to your office for consideration.

In the letter of the Solicitor-General, under date of November 15, it was stated that it does not appear from the communication of Mr. Rice under date of November 5, 1898, that either his own business or that of the alleged combination against which he complained, was of an interstate character; in your communication of March 14 you repeat his suggestion, and so far as I can gather from the correspondence, no other objection seems to be raised by the Department to the prosecution of the complaint of Mr. Rice against what is generally known and universally believed to be an illegal combination engaged in open and audacious violations of the antitrust law in every district in the United States and in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States. This, as I say, is a matter of common knowledge, and so universally iterated and reiterated in the public press, that it has become a "matter of astonishment and concern" that the law officers of the Government have not already, of their own motion, made persistent inquiry into the facts and already demonstrated that the law would reach the injuries to trade and commerce perpetrated by this combination, which has been formed under a mutual contract organizing a successful conspiracy, or that the law is unable to reach and apply the remedy which was intended by the legislature.

I call your attention to the reports of the debates in Congress and the reports of Congressional committees, from which it appears that the aim of the legislation was to suppress such monopolies and the consequent injuries to trade, which had theretofore been practiced by the Standard Oil trust, and which had been practiced with an increased vigor since the law went into effect by that trust.

I may be permitted to suggest that even assuming that the law in question has not sufficient vitality to reach the injury here complained of, it would seem to be the duty of the law officers of the Government to show by judicial decision that Congress had failed in its attempt to legislate properly upon this subject, because so long as this statute remains upon the books, without adverse adjudication, another and plenary statute can not be passed.

But in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court, particularly in the cases of the Trans-Missouri and Joint Traffic associations, it can hardly be claimed that the law lacks the necessary vitality.

Heretofore I have discussed this question solely with reference to what I have esteemed to be the duty of the law officers of the Government to do of their own motion, but if I am wrong in this, with a view to secure prompt action, my client is prepared to prove:

1. That the Standard Oil trust exists under a contract, combining a very large percentage of all the oil producers and refiners in the United States; this contract has become a part of court record and is easily obtainable by the Department; it is all that it has so often been stated to be, a contract to control prices, annihilate rivals, and a mutual division of profits.

2. Said trust has been formed and is engaged in an injurious restraint of interstate trade; and proof can readily be obtained in regard to the control of the transportation of oil from the oil-producing regions to the seaboard, and I specify this one situation, although it is but one instance and by no means the most important one, showing the participation of this trust in interstate commerce; one of the contracting parties in the combination is the corporation known as "The Tide Water Pipe and Oil Company," another is "The Crescent Pipe Line and Oil Company" (which merged into the trust about four years since); another is "The Standard Pipe Line Company," also in the trust, and these three corporations are engaged in the interstate transportation of oil from Ohio, West Virginia, and other States, through the intervening States to the Eastern seaboard.

3. The Standard Oil trust, by its successful conspiracy, controls in the public market not only the prices of the crude oil, but also the prices of petroleum products. Under this charge I specify a fact which has come within my own personal knowledge—that recently the said trust has arbitrarily and successfully doubled the price of naphtha in the public market. To-day the price of naphtha is more than 100 per cent greater than it was on the 1st of January last, and this increase of price is due entirely to the manipulation of the Standard Oil trust. Under the recent letting in the city of Washington for the lighting of about 1,300 naphtha street lamps the increased cost to the city, on account of the raising of price, as above stated, amounts to more than $5,000 per annum, and I am credibly informed that under a recent letting in Chicago the increased cost in that line of business exceeds $15,000.

4. It is demonstrable from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission that this gigantic monopoly has such a far-reaching power that it is able to effect discriminatory freight rates upon its interstate shipments.

I do not wish to be understood in making these specific charges, and offering proof thereof, that there are not other and more flagrant violations of the law, or other and more pertinent facts as to the matters and things necessary to bring this monopoly within the purview of the statute.

It is now several months since my client called the attention of the Department to his just cause of complaint, which you state, on March 14 last, was "having proper consideration." I assume, therefore, that it will not be long before a definitive answer will be returned, and I may be pardoned to suggest that the President considered the matter of the enforcement of the antitrust law to be of such paramount importance as to induce him to make a pledge for his Administration in regard to that enforcement at the time of his inauguration. This trust is the most harmful of all. I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

A. G. SAFFORD,
Attorney for Geo. Rice.

1416 F STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General.

DEAR SIR: On the 31st of May last, I addressed you a letter with reference to the complaint of George Rice against the Standard Oil trust, to which I have received no reply. I will be pleased to know whether the letter was received and whether an answer, with reference to the contents of the letter, may be expected in the near future.

Yours, very truly,

A. G. SAFFORD, Attorney.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1899.

A. G. SAFFORD, Esq.,
1416 F street NW., Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of May 31 was duly received. The matter referred to has been heretofore in the charge of Solicitor-General Richards, who has had general charge of violations of the Sherman Act for this Department. Mr. Richards is at the present time out of the country, and I have not been able either to refer the matter to him or to confer with him relative to the subject, which, as you must be aware, is one requiring careful investigation and consideration.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. GRIGGS, Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 20, 1899.

Hon. JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your favor of the 20th of June last, I have to say that the complaint of Mr. Rice has been before the Solicitor-General, Mr. Richards, since November 5, 1898.

I concede the importance of the questions involved and their demand for a careful investigation, but insist that the fact of their importance demands a prompt as well as a thorough investigation, and a proper consideration requires something other than an indefinite postponement.

I am constantly being requested by Mr. Rice to urge your office to take appropriate action, and I desire to know when I can assure him that its consideration will be entered upon and whether you desire any data from him.

Yours, very truly,

A. G. SAFFORD, Attorney.

I AM FIRMLY CONVINCED THAT IF THE QUESTION WERE SUBMITTED TO THEM ON A REASONABLY CLEAR ISSUE AN OVERWHELMING MAJORITY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE WOULD SHOW THEMSELVES EAGER TO DEMONSTRATE THEIR MORAL SOUNDNESS BY WASHING THEIR HANDS OF THIS BLOODY INIQUITY, AND BY THUS MAKING IT MANIFEST TO ALL THE WORLD THAT THEY ARE AN HONEST AND A JUST PEOPLE, AND THAT THE REPUBLIC OF WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN STILL LIVES.

[Speech of Hon. Carl Schurz in Cooper Institute, May 24, 1900, as reported in New York Evening Post.]

I have long been, and am now, firmly convinced that if the facts and tendencies of the imperialistic policy carried on by our Government were well inquired into and fully understood by the American people, and then submitted to a popular vote on their own merits for approval, that policy would be indignantly spurned by the intelligence as well as the moral sense of an overwhelming majority of our citizenship. Its defenders, well aware of this, therefore make a special effort to mislead that intelligence and moral sense by the pretense that their opponents, the anti-imperialists, pusillanimously refuse to meet the responsibilities devolved upon us by the late Spanish war, and that those responsibilities can be discharged only by a virtual continuance of the present policy.

This I emphatically deny. Let us see what our true responsibilities are, and how they should be met. To this end we must first remember what has happened. In April, 1898, we went to war with Spain for the sole purpose, as Congress proclaimed to the world by a solemn resolution, of rescuing from oppressive misrule a population struggling for freedom and independence. Congress not only positively disclaimed any intention to annex to this Republic the territory inhabited by that population, but declared that the people of Cuba "are, and of right ought to be, free and independent"—in other words, that Spain, by her oppressive misrule, had not only morally but actually forfeited her sovereignty over that country. This was the affirmation of a principle.

Then came Dewey's victory in Manila Bay. The case of the Philippine Islands was in all essential respects identical with that of Cuba. Their people had also been struggling against Spanish oppression, like the Cubans, and if the Cubans, according to the declaration of Congress, "were, and of right ought to be, free and independent," so surely were the Philippine Islanders; and if Spain had, according to our proclaimed doctrine, morally and actually forfeited her sovereignty over Cuba, so she had forfeited her sovereignty over the Philippines.

But the claim of the Philippine Islanders as to their independence was in fact even much stronger than that of the Cubans. Dewey invited and brought the chief leader of the Philippine insurgents to the scene of action. With Dewey's aid and under his eyes that chief organized a Filipino army of 30,000 men; he proclaimed the Philippine republic, hoisted the flag of that republic on his armed vessels, and set up a civil government which, according to the imperialist Barrett's testimony, compared in some of its important parts favorably with that of Japan.

The Filipino army then, while our land forces were gradually arriving, quickly cleared the interior of the country of the Spaniards, taking many thousands of them prisoners, and so hemmed in on the land side the Spanish garrison of Manila that it could neither receive reenforcements nor escape into the interior. In other words, the Filipinos acted most efficiently as our allies, crippling the Spanish power as we could not have crippled it with our force then at hand; and they were practically recognized as our allies, even to the extent of having turned over to them Spanish prisoners taken in a common enterprise.

And while so profiting from their action as our allies, we—I do not say officially promised them their independence—but we did what morally amounted to the same thing; we permitted them to believe that in fighting on the same side with us they were fighting for their own independence; we permitted them to believe this until we had troops enough on the field to make us masters of the situation.

What happened then? We took Manila, summoning the Spanish commander to surrender on the very ground, among others, that he was hemmed in on the land side by the Filipinos. And then we proceeded to conclude a peace treaty with Spain. That treaty was to decide the fate of the Philippine Islanders. The Filipinos, our allies, whom we had permitted to believe that they were fighting for their independence, asked to be heard.

We slammed the door in their faces. And behind their backs we extorted or bought, as you like, from Spain, the common enemy, the sovereignty over our allies—the same sovereignty which, in the Cuba precedent, we had affirmed to have been forfeited by Spain and rightfully to belong to the people of the country. And now we recognize that sovereignty, as still possessed by Spain, the common enemy, although we knew that Spain could not deliver any part of it, having not only morally but actually lost it; and we performed this amazing act of treacherous self-stultification in order to make our late allies our subjects because we coveted their land.

Thus we deliberately turned our loudly vaunted war of liberation and humanity into a shameless war of conquest, which, to adopt President McKinley's own phrase, was in the extreme sense an act of "criminal aggression"—for there was no element of criminality lacking. We did not stop with the diplomatic betrayal. Weeks before that treaty with Spain acquired any color of legal force by the assent of the Senate President McKinley issued an order to our Army—the notorious "benevolent-assimilation order"—assuming that our sovereignty over the Philippines did actually exist, and directing the Army to enforce it all over the archipelago—as flagrant a usurpation of power as was ever committed.

That order was of so inflammatory a character, so clear a declaration of war against the Filipinos demanding freedom and independence, that General Otis, foreseeing with alarm the consequences it would bring on, tried to suppress it. But through a subordinate it became known to the Filipinos, and they understood it as it was—a declaration of war against them. Then the conflict wantonly provoked by the President's order came. We destroyed by force the government the Filipinos had set up—a very respectable government, as all competent witnesses testify—a far better government than the insurgent Cubans ever had.

We carried death and desolation into the towns and villages of our late allies. We killed many, many thousands of them, and still go on killing them at the rate of 1,000 to 1,500 a month for no other reason than that, as we call it, they refuse to submit to our sovereignty; but as it may in truth be called, for no other reason than that our former allies object to being sold and bought like a herd of cattle, and that they still demand that liberty and independence to which, by the principle we ourselves had affirmed in the case of Cuba, they are rightfully entitled.

Some time ago in a public speech I challenged the defenders of our Administration to point out in the whole history of the world a single act of perfidy ever committed by any republican government more infamous than that which has thus been committed by our Government against our Filipino allies. That challenge has remained unanswered to this day. I now renew it. I call upon them all—from the highest to the lowest—members of the Cabinet, and Senators and Representatives who tell us that the honor and best interests of the country demand us to approve and sustain such things; and the bishops to whom the moral aspects of the case should be of some consequence; and the laymen who listen to them—I call upon them all to show me in all the annals of mankind a similar instance of more knavish treachery. Let them answer me if they can. And then let them tell me what the responsibilities are growing from such conduct.

Is there any doubt about the facts? They are history. There has indeed been some quibbling as to whether the Filipinos were really our allies. That the Government did not give them the title of allies is true enough. But did we not use their services as those of allies so long as their services were of any advantage to us? Did we not practically treat them as allies during that time, even to the extent of recognizing them as entitled to the charge of prisoners taken from the common enemy by the aid of our arms? And did not our using them as our allies, and our profiting by their services as our allies, impose upon us the moral obligation to respect them as our allies? An unscrupulous pettifogger may dispute that, but a man of honor will not. Let the imperialists answer.

There has also been some quibbling as to our having promised them independence. That we did not in formal official declaration promise them independence is true enough. But did we not, while we were using them as allies, and profiting from their service as allies, know that they believed they were fighting for their own independence, and that they would not have fought on the same side with us against the common enemy if they had believed otherwise? And did we ever during that period honestly tell them that they were mistaken? And as we did not tell them this while using them as allies, was not that morally as good and binding a promise as if it had been written down, signed, sealed, and delivered? Again, an unscrupulous pettifogger may quibble about this, but an honest man, a gentleman, will not. Let the imperialists answer.

What, then, is our responsibility growing out of this state of facts? I may be told that this is an extreme and unpractical view of the case; that we must deal with things as they are; that we have got the Philippines now; that the only thing to be considered now is what to do with them; and that all that preceded our getting them is a mere "academic question," useless to discuss. An academic question, indeed! It may be a very inconvenient question to the imperialists, but that does not make it merely academic. It must be discussed to exhibit the moral aspect of the case. Let us look at it. In the first place, we have not got the Philippines yet. We are still fighting and killing people, our late allies, to get control of them. All we have got is, as I have shown, not a moral and rightful, but merely a technical title—such a title as an unscrupulous corporation wrecker may, by legal quirks and technicalities and treachery and force get to the property of the stockholders.

But suppose we had won actual possession of the Philippines. Would that alter the moral nature of the question? If we have them we are, in view of the way we got them, in possession of stolen goods—goods obtained by fraud, treachery, and brutal force. We know the goods are stolen goods, for we have stolen them ourselves. When we remind the imperialists of that fact, the answer is substantially this: "Spare us the useless discussion of that academic question. Suppose the goods are stolen. Then the possession of those goods devolves upon us new responsibilities which in the first place require us to keep the stolen goods."

Is this really the first demand of the new responsibility of the great American Republic? I have always believed that the Republic of Washington and Lincoln should and would always recognize it as the first and highest responsibility to give to the world an example of good faith and perfect justice in the recognition of the rights of others, be they ever so humble.

Unless I am altogether wrong in this belief, our true responsibilities in the case of the Philippines demands not that we regard it as a mere academic question how we got them, or that we should keep the stolen goods under the sanctimonious pretense of benevolent purposes, but that, as an honest and righteous people, we should restore them to their rightful owners, and to secure, so far as it is in our power, those owners in the possession of them.

A most startling attempt to justify the retention of the Philippines and the subjugation of their inhabitants has recently been made by Bishop Potter, when he said in a public speech on this matter: "If my son should come to me and say he proposed to marry a young Creole woman with seven children, I would call him a great ass. But if he had come to me and said he had already contracted such a marriage, I should still try to maintain intimate relations with him. What we have done in the Philippines has established just such a relation as that, and it would be a source of national mortification if we gave up our responsibilities because we find them difficult."

With due respect, be it said, no illustration would be more unhappy. It might fit if the creole woman with her seven children had run after our son entreating him to marry her, or if she had at least willingly consented to his proposal of marriage. But what is the truth? The poor woman is desperately struggling against our son's treacherous embrace, and our son is busy discharging his "responsibility" to the children by killing them at a rapid rate because they resist the shameful subjugation of their mother.

Not very long ago the bishop, keenly appreciating the moral and political tendencies of our imperialistic policy, told his flock that the main question was not what we would do with the "fruits of our victories," but rather what they would do with us. One of the first things they have already done with us, it seems, is so to benumb our moral sense and to confuse our moral principles as to make us capable of cheating our own consciences by putting aside the question of right or wrong in what we have done as a mere "academic question" no longer to be discussed, because it is done, and of readily accepting that which exists, however wrongful, degrading, and dangerous, simply because it exists.

I would humbly suggest that this is a rather serious thing for teachers of religion and morality to contemplate. They might earnestly consider whether, when we have done wrong, it is not our Christian duty to right the wrong to the utmost of our power; that this is inexorably demanded by our first responsibility as a nation, and that it would, in the bishop's words, indeed, be a "source of national mortification if we gave up that responsibility because we find it difficult." And this responsibility the imperialists have either not the will or not the courage to meet face to face.

How is that responsibility to be met? No sensible man can doubt that we should have had no war with the Filipinos, just as we have had no war with the Cubans, if we had, after defeating the Spaniards, simply applied to the Philippine Islands the same principles which we have applied to Cuba—that is, if we had frankly and sincerely at the start recognized the Philippine Islanders as entitled to their freedom and independence, and then gone about in good faith to aid them in setting up an independent government, and let the world know that we would not permit any other power to interfere with them, which would have been quite sufficient for their protection.

Nor will any sensible person doubt that if we, even to-day, after all that has happened, proclaimed it to be our sincere and fixed intention with regard to them to treat the Philippine Islanders on the same basis of right as that on which we have promised to treat the Cubans, the abominable slaughter would cease at once, and although much natural distrust would have to be overcome, friendly relations with the islanders could be established with substantially the same desirable results as we might have had more cheaply by honorable and statesmanlike conduct at the beginning. Who has the audacity to deny this? Is there any sound reason why this most righteous and rational policy should not be adopted?

By some it is said that the establishment of an independent government in the Philippines would at once be followed by bloody anarchy; that those people would forthwith begin to cut one another's throats, and that to prevent this we had to destroy the native government, which at the time was in a considerable portion of the country in peaceful operation, and that incidentally we had therefore to cut their throats ourselves. A more ghastly mockery than this objection can hardly be imagined. In the first place, this prediction of bloody anarchy is a mere guess, without any proof.

But even if it were well founded, will any imperialist have the hardihood to pretend that those people would in their internal broils have killed half as many, or one-tenth as many, as we have killed and are killing to subjugate them? Can we, who have been and are slaughtering them by the thousands with no end in prospect, can we presume to refuse to them independence on the ground that there may be disorders that may cost some of them their lives? Can hypocrisy be more impudent and disgusting?

It is also said that there are great difficulties in the way of their having an independent government, differences of tribes and the like, and that therefore they can not be left to govern themselves. Admiral Dewey, emphatically and repeatedly, from his knowledge of them, pronounced them far more capable of self-government than the Cubans. But if the Cubans are less capable than the Philippine Islanders, must we therefore give up our efforts to secure independent government to that island?

No doubt there are difficulties in the way; but I venture to say that at present the greatest of those difficulties is in ourselves. There are two ways to approach the solution of such a problem. One is to take the problem in hand with a sincere desire that it be solved. Then many of the difficulties which at first sight appeared most formidable will be found not to be insurmountable at all to an honest, intelligent, and persevering effort to overcome them. The other way to approach the problem is with no sincere desire to solve it, or even with the desire that it be not solved. Then difficulties are diligently looked for and magnified until they appear so great that the task of overcoming them seems hopeless.

Here is the trouble with our imperialists. Determined to make the Philippine Islanders our subjects, they find no end of reasons to show that those people can not be their own masters. Nothing would be easier than to convince anyone desiring to be so convinced that the Cubans, or the Mexicans, or the Chileans are incapable of maintaining decent independent governments, and that therefore we must rule them. Why, it might even be shown that the people of New York City, or of Philadelphia, or of Chicago, have proved themselves unable to govern themselves, and that the conduct of their municipal governments must therefore be intrusted to somebody else better fitted.

But let us once resolve with perfect good faith to aid the Philippine Islanders in constructing an independent government suitable to their conditions, and let us have men in power who are honestly determined to accomplish that end, and the difficulties will rapidly diminish. Of course, the Philippines will not have an ideal republican government. We have not, for that matter. But let us honestly try together, and they can get an independent government as good as that of Mexico, and better than those of most of the South American Republics. They would probably have such a government now had we not perfidiously drowned it in blood.

The fine pretense that we must subjugate them in order to teach and secure to them honest government is perhaps not as proudly insisted upon to-day as it was a month ago. It is not too much to say that the recent disclosures in Cuba have advertised our disgrace in that respect to the whole world more glaringly than it had ever been advertised before. Nor can we flatter ourselves with the belief that the Cuban instance is an isolated one. Some time ago General Otis issued an order against evil practices in our administration of things in the Philippines which clearly indicated that our service there was honeycombed with corruption.

Neither is this surprising. My official experience in the conduct of Indian affairs, as Secretary of the Interior, taught me some pertinent lessons. Why is it so especially difficult to prevent corrupt practices in the Indian agencies? For two reasons: First, because these officers are comparatively far removed from the observation of the Government and of the public; and secondly, because a good many of our people have very little regard for the rights and interests of so-called inferior races, and consider cheating and robbing such races as a privilege of the superior being.

To such men the Philippine Islander is only a "nigger," and the Cuban and Porto Rican but little better; and finding themselves in the transmarine dependencies, much farther away from governmental and public observation than even an Indian agent is, they will always be apt to regard these dependencies as fair fields for plundering operations. The idea that our colonial service will become a seminary of political virtue is, therefore, a highly grotesque one. Most of the rascalities practiced there we shall, on account of the distance, never know. But in all probability enough will become known to produce an incalculably mischievous effect upon the natives, and to expose this Republic to the ridicule and contempt of mankind.

It would require the strictest kind of civil-service system, covering all positions, and a most rigorous enforcement of it, to counteract such tendencies and temptations. How much of such a system we may expect from an Administration which, in spite of the solemn pledges and protestations of its party and of the President himself, has so much demoralized the system which already exists by opening all sorts of facilities in it to the invasion of spoils politics I leave you to judge.

On the whole, that pharisaical cant which was used to envelop this wicked and wanton war of "criminal aggression" against the Filipinos in the guise of humanitarian purpose has very much subsided. It could not stand against the facts in the case. The declaration of the Administration leader in the House of Representatives that we want to make all the money we can out of the Philippines, and the equally brutal appeals of greed put forth by the Denbys and Beveridges, are by this time generally taken to reveal the true spirit of the enterprise.

Now, I am myself very much in favor of the largest possible expansion of our commerce by legitimate means. But must we to that end repudiate the high principles, ideals, and traditions of the great American Republic, and commit the villainy of betraying our allies, and slaughter untold thousands of innocent people who only stand up for the principles to which we ourselves owe our national existence?

I have time and again publicly challenged the imperialists to deny the fact that we might have had in the Philippines for the mere asking all the coaling stations and commercial facilities, and all the civilizing agencies, and all the so-called "footholds" for our Asiatic trade we may reasonably desire, if we had treated the Philippine Islanders justly as to their right to independence. No imperialist, to my knowledge, has ever denied this.

I ask them now whether there can be any doubt that we can have all these accommodations and facilities and privileges to-day without striking a further blow, if we stop the present iniquitous slaughter by honestly and effectually recognizing their right to independence. Who doubts this? Who, then, will deny that even from the legitimate commercial point of view our treatment of the Philippines is as uncalled for and wanton as it is cruel, treacherous, and disgraceful, and that we can still correct the colossal blunder we have made by doing justice as an honest nation if we only resolve to do so?

Indeed, there may be some persons expecting to make more money out of the Philippines if we subjugate them at the cost of ever so much blood and devastation, and then rule them by a substantially despotic sway. But who are they? Not the people at large, especially not the laboring masses, but a favored few. And here I invite the especial attention of our conservative fellow-citizens who are so much alarmed at the possibility that the political struggles in this democracy—a democracy working through universal suffrage—may develop into a struggle of the poor against the rich.

Have they considered how apt this kind of imperialistic policy will be to incite and hasten such a development? What was it that so powerfully aroused the masses of the American people about the law denying the Porto Ricans free trade with the United States? It was the sudden revelation of what imperialism really is—the arbitrary rule of one people over another; it was the breach of promise of freedom and prosperity we had given the Porto Ricans, who from the depth of their misery and despair vainly appealed to our sense of justice; it was the spectacle of the President and the Secretary of War abandoning for some reason their emphatic declarations of "plain duty."

It was, indeed, all this, but it was something more. It was the fact that this Porto Rican business appeared like the lifting of a curtain behind which the people saw the figures of a group of men trying to control, and to a large extent actually controlling, our Government to enrich themselves by manipulating our colonial policy. What impression do you think that such a scene must produce upon the popular mind at a time when "plutocracy" is a word in everybody's mouth?

Far more than any other kind of government does a democracy working through universal suffrage need the conservative influence of high principles and ideals of right and justice and of popular beliefs founded upon such principles and ideals; for when they disappear the evil passions of covetousness and of selfish ambition take their place and become the only motive power of action, there remaining nothing higher to appeal to. And that is the direction in which the imperialistic policy is driving us.

Nothing can be more dangerous in a democracy like ours than the prevalence of the notion that might is right—a notion involving the worst kind of anarchy, above and below. And that principle is preached and proclaimed every day by this imperialistic policy. Is it not high time that the American people, sobered from the debauching intoxication of victory, should rise up again to a just appreciation of the true responsibility of this great Republic? That true responsibility is its responsibility for the maintenance of the great principles upon which it was founded.

It is its responsibility for the great lesson it is to administer to mankind, that true Democracy means not only the assertion of one's own rights, but also a just respect for the rights of others, and that this Democracy of ours is able to resist the temptations which might seduce it from its fidelity to that high obligation. It is its responsibility for the fulfillment of the great promise expressed by Abraham Lincoln on the battlefield of Gettysburg, that "government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Who will deny that this responsibility—our true, our paramount responsibility—imperatively demands the abandonment of a policy to subjugate as subjects to our arbitrary rule another people aspiring to liberty and independence? That there are difficulties in the way of that abandonment is true. But those difficulties, as I have shown, do not consist in their setting up an independent government with our aid and assistance and in our protecting them against foreign interference.

The main difficulty—the only real difficulty—is in ourselves. It is the difficulty of baffling the greed of some persons who want to rule that country for exploitation; it is the difficulty of curbing our own vanity and false pride, which would persevere in an ambitious course, however wicked, because we have once entered upon it. These difficulties of meeting our true responsibility is great; but, to quote Bishop Potter's words again, it would indeed "be a source of national mortification if we gave up our responsibility because we find it difficult."

But if we do overcome those difficulties and fulfill the duty imposed upon us by our true responsibility, the American people will stand before the world in an attitude of moral greatness never surpassed in the annals of mankind; for we shall have shown that we can not only take cities and conquer hostile armies, but that, which is infinitely more glorious, we can, when we have done wrong, conquer ourselves.

I have been told on very good authority that many of the leading Republicans are heartily sick of the whole Philippine business, and that they sincerely wish we had never taken a foot of ground on the Philippines and were now rid of the whole concern. I have good reason for believing it. But why have they not the moral courage frankly and publicly to say so? Why do they not in the open light of day appeal to the President, and to Congress, and to their party to give up that accursed "criminal aggression," and to do that which is just and right and would be most honorable to the American people? Is their moral sense so enslaved by a wretched party spirit that it must humbly cower under a dictation which they can not but detest and be ashamed of? Surely they could do no better service to themselves and to their country than by emancipating their consciences like men.

You will have observed that in reciting the acts of our Government I said, "We have done this," and "We have done that." I used that form of expression for the sake of brevity. In justice to the American people it should be corrected. No; it was not the American people that instigated or even sanctioned by their assent the betrayal of American principles in the attempt to subjugate a foreign population and in ruthlessly destroying them. Those things have indeed been done in the name of the American people; but it may justly be said that the history of Machiavelian politics shows few instances of a more unscrupulous "confidence game" than that of which the American people have in this case been made the victim by means of an artful censorship of news, of sanctimonious cant disguising evil deeds, and of other equally unscrupulous contrivances.

What the American people really think, what understanding and appreciation they really have of their responsibilities, they will soon have the first opportunity for declaring; and, as I began by saying and now repeat, I am firmly convinced that if the question were submitted to them on a reasonably clear issue an overwhelming majority of the American people would show themselves eager to demonstrate their moral soundness by washing their hands of this bloody iniquity, and by thus making it manifest to all the world that they are an honest and a just people and that the Republic of Washington and Lincoln still lives.

SEES NO HOPE IN REPUBLICAN PARTY—WE ARE WRITING THE MOST DISGRACEFUL CHAPTER OF ALL MODERN HISTORY.

[Speech of Ex-Governor Boutwell in Cooper Institute, May 24, as reported in the National Watchman.]

I have set before myself the task of specifying some of the errors in which President McKinley and his administration have indulged in regard to the Constitution of the United States, and I shall then mention some of the pretexts that have been resorted to as apologies or excuses or shields for what has been done. There are indications that attempts are making to so construe the Constitution as to justify the policy of seizing, through war, foreign lands and alien peoples, and governing them as they might be governed if the Constitution of the United States did not exist. It is the manifest purpose of the Administration to seize and to hold countries and to govern races and communities outside of the jurisdiction of the Constitution. Thus is the Administration creating a power in the President and Congress independent of the Constitution, and over which the people can have no control. It is with that usurpation that I am now to deal. The question before the country is this: Republic or empire?

Of many propositions that may be laid down concerning the Constitution of the United States, no one can be more worthy of universal acceptance than this, namely: The Constitution can not, of its own force, apply to territory that is not of the United States.

A second proposition, which seems to justify itself without argument, is this: The Constitution by its own force applies equally and everywhere and always to every part of the United States.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

In elucidation and support of the first proposition, if that proposition is open to debate, it may be said that it was not in the power of the men who made the Constitution, nor of the people and States that ratified it, to have it applicable to Great Britain, to the Philippines, or to the island of Porto Rico, that was then under the dominion of Spain.

If, then, the first proposition must be accepted as an indisputable truth, it follows, inevitably, that the Constitution does not give power, and, in fine, that the Constitution could not have given power to Congress to legislate for territories and peoples that then were or that thereafter might be outside of the jurisdiction of the Constitution itself. The power of legislation which subsists in the Congress of the United States is a derived power, and it is subject to one inherent limitation—its powers can not exceed the powers possessed by the body of authority—in this case the Constitution—from which its own powers are derived. If upon argument this proposition might be open to debate, it remains to be said that the Constitution has fixed the limit of legislative power. As a declaration of a limitation of legislative power in Congress, the provision is superfluous, but its value is now to be appreciated in the enforcement of a manifest truth which otherwise, in these times, might be resisted stubbornly.

CONGRESS CAN NOT GO BEYOND CONSTITUTION.

Following the preamble to the Constitution, and standing at the head of all things and of all declarations else, are these words: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Hence it follows that Congress must find authority in the Constitution for each and every of its legislative acts.

In vain will be the search for authority to legislate beyond the jurisdiction of the Constitution. No attempt has been made in the Constitution to give such authority, and such authority could not have been given. The limits of legislative powers in Congress have been fixed, by the Constitution, and they are fixed, irrevocably fixed, in the nature of things.

As a nation we are to obey the Constitution and to apply these truths. If Porto Rico is of the United States, then its ports are ports of the United States, and its inhabitants are citizens of the United States, and they are endowed already with all the rights and privileges of citizenship. If Porto Rico is not of the United States, then the attempt to exercise jurisdiction over the island through the law-making power is a gross usurpation abroad and a violation of duty at home, which can not be defended and which ought not to be tolerated.

President McKinley and his imperialistic supporters, through two steps in an argument, have deduced an erroneous conclusion from an admitted truth: (1) Our Government, in common with other sovereignties, has a right to acquire territory. (2) That right carries with it the right to govern territory so acquired. From these propositions they deduce the false conclusion that Congress may indulge in a full and free discretion in the government of territories so acquired Herein is the error, and herein is the usurpation. By their acquisition the territories have become a part of the United States. As a part of the United States the Constitution extends to them, and the privileges and guarantees of the Constitution are their possession, as they are the possession of the preexisting States and Territories. In these features of our system of government is the security that this nation can not at the same time play the part of Empire and of Republic.

We have the right to acquire territory, and we have the right to govern all territory acquired; but we must govern it under the Constitution, and in the exercise of those powers, and those only, which have been conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Any attempt further is a criminal usurpation.

I do not now enter upon the inquiry whether, within the constitutional limits, as I have laid them down, Congress may or may not, in some particulars, make distinctions between States and Territories; but beyond question there can be no gradations, no exemptions in the matter of taxation, and the sin of a departure from this constitutional obligation can not be qualified by any conditions that may be found in the legislation of Congress. Whatever is within or is of the United States is entitled to the benefit of this provision: "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." Whatever territory is not of the United States is not subject to taxation by us, and if, through the forms of legislation in Congress, we take money from any people who are not within the jurisdiction of our Constitution, the taking is an act of robbery for which neither justification nor excuse can be found. The act is not different in morals from piracy on the high seas.

And if, as is the admitted fact in the case of Porto Rico, upon the theory of the President as set forth in his message, we have taken moneys wrongfully from citizens of the United States who have imported products from that island, it is an odd form of recompense that an equivalent sum of money is now to be given to others who are destitute and starving, and who have been brought into poverty and misery by our wrong doing.

The claim that Congress may extend the Constitution to the new Territories is only a restatement of the claim that the Constitution does not apply of its own force to our newly acquired possessions, and that the power of Congress over such possessions is an unlimited power.

Congress is to obey the Constitution. It has no power to increase or diminish the scope of that instrument.

Whenever a Territory is acquired, either by purchase or conquest, the Constitution becomes immediately and by its own force the fundamental law of such acquired Territory, or it must remain forever outside the Constitution, and consequently outside of the jurisdiction of Congress, inasmuch as Congress can not legislate beyond the jurisdiction of the Constitution, the source, and the sole source, of its legislative authority. The inquiry thus made leads to these conclusions, namely:

1. Whenever territory is acquired, whether by conquest or purchase, such Territory becomes subject to the Constitution, and that without the aid or agency of any branch or department of the Government of the United States.

2. The power of legislation by Congress over such Territory is fixed and limited by the Constitution.

3. That power is so limited that the "duties, imposts, and excises" must be the same in the newly acquired possessions as they may then be in preexisting States and Territories at the same periods of time.

4. The claim that Congress may govern territories and provinces that are not within the jurisdiction of the Constitution, or that Congress may extend the Constitution over Porto Rico, or the Philippines, or Japan, is an assumption of arbitrary power that must prove fatal to our Republican system. These conclusions are in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the opinion of Chancellor Kent, with the decision after argument of an international tribunal in which the United States was a party, and in harmony with the opinion given recently by Judge Lochren. A dissenting opinion has been given by Whitelaw Reid. It may be inferred, however, from the accompanying remarks which he has submitted to the public, that if he were to be convinced of the error of his opinion, he would become an antiimperialist, as he can not accept Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines as equal States in the American Union.

THE PERIL OF THE NATION.

I am now to consider some of the pretexts that are tendered in justification of the President's policy and doings in the Philippine Islands. If we pass by Shakespeare, Milton, and Pope, our own poet, Oliver Wendell Holmes, may be classed among the leading philosophical writers of the modern era in whatever relates to the passions and weaknesses of mankind. Holmes has named sin among the diseases that are catching. America has caught from England the disease of land grabbing, of thirst for the subjugation of inferior races, all tributary to empire building, the crowning sin of dead nations, and the peril of struggling nations that yet exist.

As criminals pass on to the prison, they pass through three or more stages. First, the crime; then falsehood as a means of concealment; and, at last, upon discovery, they resort to pretexts in which they seek to find and to furnish to others excuses for what they have done. It is the office of a pretext to accomplish by indirection what is accomplished directly by a falsehood. Its purpose is to mislead, and therefore its sphere of action is not limited to crimes and the protection of criminals. There is a resort to pretext whenever a private person falls into error, and it is the first and most inviting defense of public and official personages when they become responsible for a pernicious public policy, or whenever they mislead a country into an unjust or criminal war.

This last statement embodies the offense of which President McKinley is guilty. Whenever a public officer is called to meet a charge which asserts or assumes wrongdoing on the part of such officer, he should be able to present himself in one or two aspects. He should be able truthfully to deny the charge, or, accepting the truthfulness of the facts alleged, he should be ready to defend what has been done and upon the ground of right and justice.

PRETEXTS AND THE FACTS.

I am not disposed to think better of my countrymen even than I ought to think, but I venture to express this opinion: In every election the people of all parties have given their votes for measures and for policies which they then believed to be right and just, both upon ethical and legal grounds, and the advocates of measures and policies have so presented the issues when engaged in an attempt to mold and guide public opinion. The position taken by the President and the speeches made in Congress by his supporters portend a change in this time-honored policy, and indicate that the people are to be urged to sanction and support a war for whoose righteousness nobody has ventured to become responsible. Hence it is that we are called to encounter a long array of pretexts.

It was announced in the mouth of January that the war in the Philippines was ended, and that civil rule was to be established. In the closing days of February or the opening days of March an officer of our army was decoyed from his quarters and then murdered. In retaliation 24 Filipinos, not known to be guilty, were killed, and a town was burned. Such was the report, and to this date it remains uncontradicted. In a dispatch from Manila, dated April 16, the country is informed that Captain Dodd, of the Third Cavalry, surprised 200 Filipinos, of whom 58 were slain, 44 were captured, and the village was then burned. Of Captain Dodd's force 1 man was wounded. This was a massacre rather than a battle or a skirmish. We have official knowledge that in the first three months of the year there were 124 skirmishes in the islands, in which 2,800 Filipinos were slain, wounded, or captured. On the 1st day of January the President informed the country that the war in the Philippines was ended, and in April the War Department reestablished the recruiting system for the reenforcement of the army in the Philippines.

In the month of April the country was informed that an American force in the island of Samar had been besieged for five days, with a loss of 19 men killed and 2 wounded. This reversal of all former experience indicates the presence of sharpshooters in the ranks of the Filipinos. A new aspect of the war is thus presented.

Was not the statement that the war was ended and that civil rule was to be established a pretext designed to mislead this country? Under a civil government every person accused of crime is accorded an open trial.

Nothing more brutal could have occurred on the theater of war than the assassination of four and twenty men. Nothing more brutal has ever been charged upon the savage tribes on our Indian frontier. And was it not known in January that a detachment of 10 men could not march 10 miles in any part of the island of Luzon, and was it not then known that our stations of 300 men or less were in fact only besieged garrisons? And was it not known in January that the only peace in the archipelago was the peace that President McKinley had purchased of the Mohammedan slaveholder in the Sulu isles? And is it not known to us that this purchase was a violation of the statute laws and Constitution of the United States?

PRESIDENTIAL BUNCO.

I am now to consider a pretext for which, through many and various forms of statement, the President is responsible, namely: That we did not seek the possession of the Philippine Islands, but that the responsibility of taking and governing the archipelago has been thrust upon the country. Secretary Long, in his speech delivered before the Middlesex Club, on the day of the vernal equinox, attempts to shield the Administration by placing the responsibility upon the Supreme Being.

Whitelaw Reid says that an inquiry as to the way or means by which the responsibility was thrust upon the country is not now in order. As Mr. Reid is in a degree responsible for the calamities in which the country is involved, and as I dissent from his theory of responsibility in rulers, I shall proceed to set forth the views that I entertain.

While I may not be able to make a statement of the policy on which President McKinley has entered, there can be no hazard in saying that it is a new policy. Its friends make that claim when they assert that the United States is now a "world power," a rank that has come with or as a consequence of the President's policy. The President is a candidate for reelection, and with the avowed purpose of continuing that policy. The country is urged to sanction the President's policy, to authorize its continuance, and its enlargement possibly, and all without any inquiry, any investigation, any judgment as to the wisdom, the justice—in fine, the criminality—of this war, which is an incident of his policy.

The people from whose households have gone forth the young men who have fought and who have fallen in this war, the people who bear the burden of a system of taxation such as the country has known only when the nation's existence was in peril, are to accept in silence all that has been done.

A DEGRADING DEMAND UPON THE PEOPLE.

In the history of despotisms there is not a record of a more degrading subserviency than this which the people of America are asked to accept. Thus is brought home to us Americans the infamy of the doctrine that a people may be governed without their consent.

This is the demand now made upon the American people. Let the demand be made. I answer, as one citizen, the country is not thus to be silenced into abject submission. There will be inquiry, investigation, scrutiny, as the only process by which a judgment can be reached upon the all-important question of the fitness of President McKinley to be again intrusted with the fortunes of the country.

The demand for silence and for the suppression of discussion and of opinion is an admission that that which has been done can not be defended. Such a policy was hazarded recently in the trial of a criminal cause in this city of New York, and with disastrous results. Every incident or event in human affairs that is assailed by anybody is defended by somebody if it is open to any defense.

Whenever in former times the Republican party was assailed, it accepted the issue without delay, and without delay or hesitation it entered upon its defense. Whenever its officers were charged with misconduct or malfeasance in office it entered at once upon an investigation, and pursued the investigation to the end, and that without regard to consequences to the party or to the accused.

PRESIDENTIAL ACTS NOT SACRED THEN.

The plea that what had been done had been made sacred by the lapse of time, was never tendered by the Republican party, nor was it accepted by the Republican party when made by others. Nor did the party accept as accomplished facts proceedings on the part of a President that were unlawful, or unjust, or injurious to the country.

When the Congress assembled in December, 1865, it appeared that the State of North Carolina and six other States that had been engaged in the rebellion had been re-organized under proclamations issued by President Johnson, and it was claimed that they had been restored to their former places in the Union and that they were then entitled to representation in the House and in the Senate, without action on the part of Congress. The acts of the President were disregarded and Congress proceeded to reconstruct the Government according to its ideas of justice and wisdom. In those days the doings of a President, that had not been authorized specifically, were not treated as binding upon the country, and inquiries without reserve were instituted. An appeal to the country was made, and by a two-thirds majority the action of the President was condemned.

At this point I turn aside that I may indulge in an observation which may appear pertinent or otherwise, according to the opinions of those who may hear or may read. If President Johnson's plan of reconstruction had been accepted, the evil to the country would have been light compared with the evil of accepting the Philippines, either as colonies or as States, and either as States or as colonies they are to be attached to the union if the lead of President McKinley shall be followed by the country.

And further, I express the opinion that the fair-minded historian will be able to frame a better defense for President Johnson than the historian, or the casuist even, will be able to offer in behalf of President McKinley.

I am not disturbed by the admission, which I make for the purposes of this address, that the United States is in the lawful possession, under the Spanish treaty and the law of nations, of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. However we may designate them, they are territorial possessions, and as such they fall within the scope of this provision of the Constitution: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." In view of what has been said recently, I add the remark that the Constitution speaks always in the present tense.

HAVE SURRENDERED TERRITORY BEFORE.

The United States is not embarrassed by the fact that our title to Porto Rico and the Philippines is impregnable as against Spain and all other countries. Indeed, the absolute defensibility of our title is proportionately the strength of our evidence that our power to "dispose of" and to transfer our title to another is free from doubt or lawful challenge. In the Oregon controversy we surrendered territory that we claimed as the territory of the United States.

In John Tyler's administration, and under Mr. Webster's lead, we transferred to Great Britain a territory that was of the State of Maine. This was done by the consent of the State of Maine and of the State of Massachusetts, that were then joint owners of the lands that were thus transferred. Upon these precedents and upon the power granted in the Constitution, I assume that the United States may transfer its title to Porto Rico and the Philippines without "let or hindrance" from anybody. Thus should disappear the pretexts that these islands have come to us by some unseen agency, divine or malevolent, and that it is a duty from which we can not shrink to keep them and to train their millions of inhabitants up to our idea of self-government. It is the theory of the Administration that responsibilities have come to us without our agency, and that we can not avoid those responsibilities. Upon this theory Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands are with us, and of us, as Territories and States, or as colonies, and for all periods of time. Hence it is that Mr. Reid claims that discussions are out of place, and that there is no power in the American people to reverse what has been done.

For my purposes and for this occasion I shall assume that there is power in the American people to relieve themselves of all responsibility for Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and thus we may escape from the danger of holding them either as colonies or as territories on their way to statehood. If the islands should be held as colonies for the moment, it will be found, and without much delay, that they are on their way to statehood.

THE PRESIDENT AND NOT DESTINY RESPONSIBLE.

I come now to a more careful examination of the claim that these islands, with many evils, actual and present, and with forebodings of evils that are at once probable and immeasurable, have been thrust upon us by processes which were inevitable and which could not have been foreseen. If any part of this exculpatory excuse is true as regards the country, none of it is true as regards the President and those who may have advised and supported his policy since the war with Spain was ended.

The remark has been so often made that it is now a vain repetition to say that the war of the 19th of April, 1898, was undertaken for the sole purpose of relieving Cuba from the dominion of Spain. Even as to that war, it has been claimed that the President was forced by Congressional action to accept and indorse it. If, then, the President had conformed to the act of the 19th of April, or if he had obeyed an impulse of opinion such as has been attributed to him, he would have ended the war when the authority of Spain over the island of Cuba had been extinguished.

The President had no authority for further action, either by war or by aggressive demands through the treaty-making power. Incidentally, two pretexts have been offered. First, the destruction of the ship Maine; and, second, the destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila. The destruction of the Maine was an historical event when war was declared, and the liberation of Cuba was undertaken, in part, at least, in retaliation for the destruction of the battle ship. The contest in the bay of Manila was a part of the war for the freedom of Cuba, and when the freedom of Cuba had been secured the war in the East should have been ended. It is often asserted that Dewey should have left Manila when the Spanish fleet had been destroyed. The President is responsible for the course that was pursued. Dewey could only obey orders.

There are those who admit the badness of the President's policy and who yet exonerate the President. If the President is a man of ability, as I think he is, then he alone is responsible for his policy. If, as some assume, the President is a weak man, and under the influence of bad advisers, then, manifestly, his rule in office ought not to be extended. If the President's policy is a bad policy, it is immaterial whether the policy originated with the President or with advisers by whom he has been misled. In either case he is thereby unfitted for the office of President.

Has anyone from the President along the line of imperialists taken upon himself the responsibility of the assertion that the condition of the United States, or its fortunes, present or prospective, have been improved by the acquisition of a paper title to the Philippine Islands?

The fatal error was made the 10th day of August, 1898, when the President, upon his sole responsibility, passed beyond the requirements of the war declaration of April 19, and exacted a cession of islands to the United States and a footing in the Philippines, which was made the basis for a demand for a cession of the entire archipelago, which demand was consummated by the treaty of Paris. In the presence of these facts, what ground remains for the statement that our situation in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico has been thrust upon us, and that we are under a burden which we ought to accept and to carry as mankind are forced to bear a visitation of a pestilence or to endure a year of famine.

It may with truth be said that the possession of the Philippines and the Philippinean war as a consequence have been thrust upon the country, but not by an unseen hand. As to the President, this only can be said: He demanded the surrender of the Philippines, and he was enabled to enforce his demand from a prostrated enemy through fear that delay would lead to yet further demands upon the Kingdom of Spain. Upon these facts of history I stand committed to the charge I now make, namely: That the claim that the Philippine Islands, with the consequent horrors of war, have been thrust upon us is only a pretext that was designed to mislead the people away from the truth.

NO HOPE NOW FROM THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

One conclusion is deducible from the facts of history. Our occupation of the Philippine Islands and the war and blood incident to that occupation are due, and due solely, to the policy and doings of President McKinley, and for which he first and chiefly is responsible. That policy he will pursue until it is reversed by the people, irrespective of party alliances. It is a vain hope that the Republican party as an organization can reverse the policy of the President. The hope is as vain as was the hope in 1861–1865 that the Democratic party as an organization would aid in the abolition of slavery.

Again, it is claimed that trade follows the flag. This is true when the flag is the herald of peace, but the saying is false, false utterly, when the flag is transformed into a menace of war.

If, in 1898, we had acted in good faith, if we had encouraged the inhabitants of the Philippines in their efforts to establish an independent government, our increase in exports to the islands would not have been limited to the pernicious trade in alcoholic liquors. Nor, on the other hand, would the users of hemp and of the products of hemp in the United States been taxed 100 per cent for the benefit of importers, and to the injury alike of the people of the United States and of the Philippine Islands. War is the enemy of commercial trade, and trade does not follow the flag when the flag is the emblem of war.

Peace and friendship are the certain and constant promoters of trade and of every other business pursuit.

WHEN TRADE FOLLOWS THE FLAG.

There are supporters of the Administration who are not content with the possession of the Philippines and the war in the Philippines, but they advocate a warlike undertaking ostensibly for the extension of our trade with China.

China and Russia are combined, and nothing of trade facilities with China can be secured by force or by threats of force. The authorities of China have given notice that further territorial concessions will not be made. The recent speeches of the Chinese minister should be accepted as a declaration that trade with China is to depend upon friendships, agreements, reciprocal relations, and that nothing will be conceded to force. England and the United States, acting separately or combined, have not the power to dictate a commercial policy to China. Russia has gained more in the last five years by peaceful means and agencies than England has gained by war in the closing quarter of this century. Russia has connected its vast Siberian empire with the great Pacific sea on the east and with the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean on the south.

The British Empire in India is now embraced in the arms of Russia. That country has allied itself with China on one side and with Persia on the other, and with openings to the sea through each country. Thus Russia is to control a third of the population of the globe, and, if we are to enjoy the benefits of trade with the millions of the East, we are to secure that trade by the profession and the practice of the principles and the arts of peace. Thus, again, it may appear that the maxim or saying that trade follows the flag is true only when the flag is the emblem and herald of peace. Legitimate and systematic trade shuns the flag in the times of war.

Of the import trade with the Philippine Islands in the year 1899, not less than 44 per cent was in English hands, and not more than 8 per cent was from the United States. The noncombatants enjoyed more than nine-tenths of the trade of the islands.

SOME DIFFICULTIES IN THE WAY OF EMPIRE.

I may be asked this question: Can the tendency to autocratic, despotic rule in America be arrested? Something of an answer may be found in the record of passing events. There are inherent difficulties in the transformation of our Government, and those difficulties the Administration is now called to meet.

We have a legal title to Porto Rico and the Philippines, but the President does not yet venture to say whether they are Territories on the way to Statehood or dependencies to be held as colonies. He is called to choose between English policy and American policy. That question inheres in the nature of things, and an answer must be given.

When the President exacted the protocol of August, 1898, that question was involved, and that question the President must answer. Out of what has been done the nation may learn as much as this, namely, that with every acquisition of territory comes this question: Are the people inhabiting this territory to be received as citizens and as our equals or are they to be treated as vassals or as persons not yet fully emancipated from slavery? This question inheres in our system of government, and there it must remain. The question has appeared already in the case of Porto Rico, and it will appear in the Philippine Islands. It vexes Congress in the attempt to frame a government for Hawaii.

The anti-imperialists offer a solution, and the only solution of this grave difficulty. We say to the country: Let us keep the pledge which we have made to Cuba and to ourselves, and let us at once accord to the inhabitants of Porto Rico and to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands the opportunity to set up governments for themselves.

Our policy is in harmony with our system of government, and it is in harmony with the great truths on which our system of government has been made to rest.

The issue is a plain issue. It is to be submitted to the people, and, for one, I rest in full confidence that the people will deliver the nation from the evil policy which President McKinley is pursuing.

At a cost of not less than $500,000,000 and the sacrifice of as many thousand young lives a great lesson will have been taught, namely, that this Government can not be perverted, either through the follies or the crimes of its rulers. As the fruit of the sacrifices that have been made, the Declaration of Independence and the preamble to the Constitution will be again accepted by us as cardinal truths worthy of acceptance in all free governments. Thus do we vindicate the character and example and teachings of Washington and of Jefferson and the line of patriots and statesmen to Lincoln and Grant and the rest, who believed in the equality of men and recognized in all peoples and communities the right of self-government.

EXPANSION AND IMPERIALISM.

The imperialists are active in promoting the notion that the antiimperialists are opposed to the expansion of American territory, and that their opposition to the Philippine war and to the attempt to occupy the islands by force is due entirely to that opinion.

Professor Hart, of Cambridge, has given himself, through many serious pages of Harper's Monthly, to the task of proving that the founders of the Republic were expansionists, and his logic leads him to the conclusion that we are opposing the fathers of the Republic when we protest against the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands to the United States.

The founders of the Republic never committed themselves to expansion beyond the oceans nor to the forcible seizure of territory for the purpose of enlarging the limits of the Union, nor to the subjugation of communities either to slavery or to American citizenship. The founders of the Government favored peaceful expansion within the oceans, and some there were who favored the acquisition of the West India Islands. Beyond these possibilities there is no evidence of a public policy or of a public opinion.

In the eleventh article of the articles of confederation provision was made for the admission of Canada into the confederation upon the condition that Canada should accede "to this confederation" and join "in the measures of the United States." The fathers did not favor forcible annexation, nor annexation "beyond seas," nor the annexation of peoples of other races, other languages, and who had been trained under institutions and laws of which we have no knowledge.

The logic born of necessity knows no other law than the law of necessity.

The imperialists say our fathers favored the annexation of Canada by conference and friendly agreement; therefore we are bound to sustain a war for the annexation of the Philippines.

Some persons opposed the annexation of Louisiana, and time has demonstrated their error; therefore the antiimperialists are in error in opposing the annexation of the Philippines. Again they say if some persons were in error in opposing the annexation of contiguous territory, it follows that they who oppose the acquisition of territory 10,000 miles away are also in error. The antiimperialists are not committed upon the question of public policy either for or against the expansion of American territory. We are opposed, unalterably opposed, to the subjugation by war of 10,000,000 human beings into the American Union as citizens and equals, and we are opposed, unalterably opposed, to the subjugation of one man, even, as a vassal.

THE MOST DISGRACEFUL CHAPTER OF ALL MODERN HISTORY.

Of all modern history, the most disgraceful chapter is that which the American nation is now writing. At the opening of the last third of this century we abolished slavery in America, and at the end of this century we are making war for the establishment of a system of slavery in Asia. The crimes of England in the Sepoy war, on the Upper Nile, in South Africa, are trivial offenses against justice and humanity when compared with the crime of subjugating and enslaving 10,000,000 people.

It was a long step downward from Lincoln's proclamation of January 1, 1863, to McKinley's proclamation of December 21, 1898. Lincoln raised 4,000,000 slaves to full and free American citizenship, and invited them to prepare themselves for the work of self-government. McKinley announced to 10,000,000 human beings who had already secured freedom by their own efforts, his purpose to subject them to his authority by the armies of the United States, unless they would submit themselves to his will without resistance. "My terms," said he "are, first, submission and vassalage, and I will then consider further as to your fortunes." It is the reproach of the age and an omen of evil to America that there is one citizen to approve of this departure from the true doctrines of the Republic.

Senator HOAR, in his lofty, eloquent, and unanswerable speech against President McKinley's Philippine policy, has made Aaron Burr appear as the supporter of McKinley, and upon the ground that his buccaneering expedition to Mexico has been vindicated by McKinley's buccaneering expedition in the Philippine Islands. Burr's crime has been so minimized by comparison that it may not receive a place in history; but what of the country? Burr was pursued, arraigned, tried, driven from public employments, and ostracized by society. He had been Vice-President of the United States and a formidable aspirant to the Presidency against Mr. Jefferson. When his trial was ended and the facts were known he had not a supporter, and his aspirations had come to an end. Such was the fate of Aaron Burr. Has the country changed? There has been a change, but the country has not changed.

If, however, the city of Washington were the Government of the United States, as the city of Rome ruled the Roman Republic, and, under corresponding conditions, the art of printing unknown, the rapid communication of thought not yet even imagined as a possibility, and the Republic not welded into harmony, the words of the historian De Vertot might soon be applied to America: "Luxury and the love of riches came into Rome with the treasures of the conquered provinces, and poverty and temperance, which had formed so many great captains, fell into contempt. And what is most surprising is that it was not by degrees, but all at once, that this vast alteration happened, and the Romans ran headlong into luxury and effeminacy." Is this to be our fate?

THE FAMILIAR PRETEXT OF CONQUERORS.

The policy of the conqueror has always been gilded by one pretext: The conquered are to be well governed. Such was President McKinley's promise to the Filipinos. We begin civil government in Porto Rico by treating the inhabitants as alien subjects, and the trade regulations proceed upon the theory that we are to enjoy the markets of Porto Rico, and that a duty is to be levied upon the products of Porto Rico when brought into the United States. We are setting up a civil government which is as absolute as could be devised. Thus do we violate our promises, and prove the iniquity of the pretexts that we have tendered to the country and to our victims in the island.

In the days of reconstruction, "carpetbaggery" was an unprecedented condition of affairs. It was abolished at an early day, and by a general concurrence of opinion. We have established a carpetbag system for Porto Rico and upon the basis of perpetuity. The first fruits of this system have been gathered already in the island of Cuba.

In four years the doctrine of the right of self-government has been repudiated in Washington, and an avowal of the doctrine is a hazardous experiment for a member of the Republican party. The downfall of Rome, as described by De

Vertot, was not more rapid than the change that has taken place in the capital city of America.

THE GENIUS OF THE PRESENT REPUBLICAN PARTY—IT MUST BE OVERTHROWN.

In the year 1895 or 1896 a man emerged from the obscurity of unrecognized citizenship, and in the intervening time he has advanced himself to the head of the Republican party, and without delay he became the apparent director of its policy. He contributed most largely to the nomination and election of President McKinley.

Following the inauguration, he secured a seat in the Senate by the enforced retirement of a statesman who, in an experience of forty years, had never before yielded to the menaces of those in power, nor been misled by vain promises. During the three years now ended this man, so recently unknown, has stood before the country as the author of our public policy. This may be error, but in the month of April, 1900, he announced the renomination of President McKinley, and predicted his reelection. At the same time the Republican party waited in submissive silence for his utterance in regard to a candidate for the Vice-Presidency. All this appears to have been the outcome of immense energy in one man, combined with unlimited resources in money. For the moment the combination is supreme in the Republican party.

And thus a party that became historically great for its victories in war, and for its achievements in peace, bows in subserviency to a self-created dictator. What is the remedy? The party must be overthrown, and in its downfall the dictatorship will disappear, and in a quadrennial period, or in a decade, the party, regenerated, may come again to the head of affairs in the Republic.

HANNA, M'KINLEY & CO., WHOLESALE DEALERS IN FILIPINO SLAVES.

[Speech of Capt. Patrick O'Farrel, in Cooper Institute, May 24, 1900.]

The chairman introduced the next speaker, Capt. Patrick O'Farrel, a lifelong Republican and a brave soldier, who served in the gallant Sixty-ninth New York, under Corcoran.

The captain spoke in part as follows:

While we have not an ideal Government of our own, yet I contend that we have the best system so far devised by man to regulate our own affairs, while we have the worst system to regulate the affairs of others. You can not govern foreign colonies or run imperialism with Republican machinery. It requires a king or an emperor—like the Empress of India—whose rule will be continuous, to do that. We elect our Executive every four years, and we change policies and officials with every change of party.

We appoint a postal agent or tax collector at Mindanao or Manila. He can't bring his wife or children there on account of the climate. He has a four years' job. He will try and feather his nest before the other party comes in; and when it does, he will be succeeded by another, who will also go into the nest-feathering business. [Great applause and cries of "That's so! You're right!"]

I now boldly state that this acquiring and keeping of foreign colonies will bring disgrace on our flag and discredit on our republican institutions.

When it comes to looting, swindling, and crookedness, the Spaniards were not "in it" with our fellows. I said this to a United States Senator (General Hawley) a few months ago, and he exclaimed, "Oh, Pat! don't say that about your own countrymen." I say it advisedly, on good proof. Didn't we rob and plunder our own countrymen in the South during the "carpet-bag" régime, and after we had robbed and beggared the whites we then plundered our wards, the negroes, and looted the Freedman's Bank.

This is no reflection on the honesty of the American people in general. It only illustrates the fact that we can not govern honestly, even at home, by military rule; and how can we expect to do it abroad in our foreign colonies and over a people whom we despise as a subject race? If we continue in the colonial imperial business, I suggest that we amend our Constitution so that the title of our President shall read as follows: "William McKinley, President of the United States and Emperor of the Philippines." [Cheers and laughter.]

Abraham Lincoln said, "We can not last long half slave and half free," and now, at the beginning of a new century, we are going to be half subject, half citizen.

I remember when I first saw the sacred soil of Virginia during the great civil war—yes, the great war for liberty—I read a sign on a large brick building in Alexandria—"Price, Birch & Co., dealers in slaves." I remained South long enough to shoot that slavery business to death. Oh, I am awfully proud that I was an abolitionist and a Republican in those days! [Tremendous applause.] Those were the days of Lincoln and liberty. Now, when I walk up Pennsylvania avenue, I look up at the White House and I am carried back to the days of "Price, Birch & Co., dealers in slaves," and I read on that White House in imaginary lines, "Hanna, McKinley & Co., wholesale dealers in Filipino slaves." [Great applause.]

There is another feature of this colonial business that the country has not noticed so far. That is the matter of church and state. McKinley is trying to work the church—I mean the Catholic Church—but he "wobbles" on that as well as on other matters.

What he said last week he contradicts this week. A weak man is a dangerous man when placed in high position. Nero was one of the weakest of Roman emperors, but at the same time the most dangerous.

Just look at President McKinley making tracks on both sides of the stream. We find him last summer at the Catholic Summer School at Plattsburg, N. Y., holding forth and telling the people there about the flag, and you would actually think he was born next door to the Blarney Stone. Next week we find him at Asbury Park, N. J., preaching to the Methodists about piety and patriotism. And the next week we find him executing a treaty, offensive and defensive, with the Sultan of Sulu, whereby he recognizes slavery, polygamy, and the religion of Mahomet.

To crown all, we next find the President of the United States going on his knees to the Pope of Rome, and asking him to help him out of the difficulties which neither his generals nor his peace commission could do. He holds several secret sessions at the White House with Archbishop Chapelle, the Papal delegate, and commissions Father McKinnon, ostensibly as a chaplain in the United States Army, but actually as the secretary of the Papal delegate, and sends both in princely style to Manila to negotiate with the Spanish archbishop there as to the confirming of the Spanish friars and monks in their possession of some twenty or thirty million acres of the best land in Luzon and the other islands. This is the first time in the history of the United States when the President dared to interfere in a matter of church and state. What right has our Government to summon or invite the Papal delegate to aid or assist us in settling our political affairs?

I feel keenly on this subject, knowing that there are many gentlemen on this platform who, if they should speak as I do, would run the risk of being called A. P. A's. But I, as a Catholic, lest there should be any mistake, a Roman Catholic, who lived in Ireland until I was man big, and understand all about landlords, the glebe lands, and the Established Church, I don't want to see my church going into the landlord business in the Philippines or anywhere else under the protection of the American flag. [Tremendous applause, which broke out again and again.]

The student of history knows well that it was this ownership of land by the church that was one of the causes of the bloody revolution in France, and it enabled King Henry VIII to succeed in his so-called reformation in England. Daniel O'Connell, my illustrious countryman, used to say: "We take our religion from Rome, but not our politics. Keep the priests poor and they will be always the friends of the people." Landed property has always been the curse of the church.

In conclusion I appeal to my old-time Republican friends—yes, and to men of my own blood and race; yes, and to the Germans, and to all others who came here to seek that liberty which was denied us in our own native lands; yes, and I appeal to my old comrade soldiers, who marched with me to Appomattox; yes, and the general whom I served under, I am proud to see on this platform to-night. [The speaker here seized General McIvor by the hand. The great audience seemed to catch the inspiration of the speaker and fairly jumped to their feet, cheering, and hurrahing for several minutes.]

Yes, I appeal to my old comrades who did the fighting, not to the "carpet-baggers" who did the robbing. [Cheers.]

Again I appeal to my old-time Republican friends to not bother about dollars or tariffs. In this campaign the battle cry is "Republic versus Empire." That should be the thought uppermost in the mind of every citizen from now until next November.

The trusts and a few millionaires have the grand old party by the throat. These corrupt, unscrupulous politicians have shunted it from the constitutional track. Let the plain people, the common people, the sovereign people—Republicans and Democrats—rally to the standard of William J. Bryan, who is a brave and courageous man of the Lincoln type—an American who believes in American principles. Who is the same to-day as he was four or six years ago. You and I may differ with him about dollars and tariffs, but we admire his courage and his honesty, and we will stand by him and make him our next President. [Tremendous applause.]

Code for the District of Columbia.

HON. HENRY D. CLAYTON,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 28, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 9835) to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia—

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that this amendment to the bill is entirely proper. The code, as I understand it, as originally reported in this bill deprived parties litigant of the right of supersedeas in cases of judgment rendered by justices of the peace. I understand the amendment now under consideration restores the law in the District to what it is now, or rather preserves it in the new code, when adopted, as it is to-day. I think that amendment as well as the other amendments I have had the opportunity of examining are entirely proper.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to further discuss this bill. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain documents and papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Without objection, permission will be given.

There was no objection.

APPENDIX I.

WHAT NEXT?

[By William J. Bryan.]

Imperialists seek to create the impression that the ratification of the treaty has terminated the controversy in regard to the future of the Philippines, but there is no ground whatever for such a conclusion. The President has not as yet outlined a policy and Congress has so far failed to make any declaration upon the subject. Several Administration Senators have expressly denied that ratification commits the United States to the permanent annexation of the Philippine Islands.

The treaty extinguishes Spanish sovereignty, but it does not determine our nation's course in dealing with the Filipinos. In the opinion of many (and I am among the number) the ratification of the treaty, instead of closing the door to independence, really makes easier the establishment of such a government in the Philippine Islands.

The matter is now entirely within the control of Congress, and there is no legal obstacle to prevent the immediate passage of a resolution promising self-government to the Filipinos and pledging the United States to protect their government from outside interference. If we have a right to acquire land, we have a right to part with it; if we have a right to secure, by purchase or conquest, a disputed title from Spain, we certainly have a right to give a quitclaim deed to the party in possession.

If the power to part with the islands is admitted, the only question remaining for discussion is whether the United States should permanently hold the Asiatic territory acquired from Spain. For two months the sentiment against imperialism has been constantly growing, and there is nothing in the ratification of the treaty to make such a policy more desirable.

Until Dewey's victory no one thought us under obligations to extend our sovereignty over the Filipinos. If subsequent events have imposed such an obligation upon the United States, it is worth while to inquire as to its nature and extent. Is it political in its character? Must we make subjects of the Filipinos now because we made allies of them in the war with Spain? France did not recognize any such obligation when she helped us to throw off British supremacy. Are we compelled to civilize the Filipinos by force because we interfered with Spain's efforts to accomplish the same end by the same means? Are we in duty bound to conquer and to govern, when we can find a pretext for doing so, every nation which is weaker than ours or whose civilization is below our standard? Does history justify us in believing that we can improve the condition of the Filipinos and advance them in civilization by governing them without their consent and taxing them without representation? England has tried that plan in India for a hundred and fifty years, and yet Japan has made more progress in the last thirty years than India has made in the hundred and fifty. And it may be added that the idea of self-government has developed more rapidly among the Japanese during the same period than it has among the people of India.

Government is an evolution, and its administration is always susceptible of improvement. The capacity for self-government is developed by responsibility. As exercise strengthens the muscles of the athlete and as education improves the mental faculties of the student, even so participation in government instructs the citizen in the science of government and perfects him in the art of administering it.

We must not expect the Filipinos to establish and maintain as good a government as ours, and it is vain for us to expect that we would maintain there, at long range, as good a government as we have here. The government is, as it were, a composite photograph of the people, a reflection of their average virtue and intelligence.

Some defend annexation upon the ground that the business interests of the islands demand it. The business interests will probably be able to take care of themselves under an independent form of government, unless they are very different from the business interests of the United States. The so-called business men constitute a very small fraction of the total population of the islands. Who will say that their pecuniary interests are superior in importance to the right of all the rest of the people to enjoy a government of their own choosing?

Some say that our duty to the foreign residents in the Philippines requires us to annex the islands. If we admit this argument, we not only exalt the interests of foreigners above the interests of natives, but place a higher estimate upon the wishes of foreigners residing in Manila than upon the welfare of our own people.

The fact that the subject of imperialism is being discussed through the newspapers and magazines, as well as in Congress, is evidence that the work of education is still going on. The advocates of a colonial policy must convince the conservative element of the country by clear and satisfactory proof. They can not rely upon catchwords. The "Who will haul down the flag?" argument has already been discarded, "destiny" is not as "manifest" as it was a few weeks ago, and the argument of "duty" is being analyzed. The people are face to face with a grave public problem. They have not acted upon it yet, and they will not be frightened away from the calm consideration of it by the repetition of unsupported prophecies.

The battle of Manila, which brought loss to us and disaster to the Filipinos, has not rendered "forcible annexation" less repugnant to our nation's "code of morality." If it has any effect at all it ought to emphasize the dangers attendant upon (if I may be permitted to quote from the President again) "criminal aggression." The Filipinos were guilty of inexcusable ignorance if they thought that they could prevent the ratification of the treaty by an attack upon the American lines, but no act of theirs can determine the permanent policy of the United States. Whether imperialism is desirable is too large a question to be settled by a battle. Battles are to be expected under such a policy. England had been the dominant power in India for a century when the Sepoy mutiny took place, and she rules even now by fear rather than by love.

Force and reason rest upon different foundations and employ different forms of logic. Reason, recognizing that only that is enduring which is just, asks whether the thing proposed ought to be done; force says, "I desire, I can, I will." When the desire proves to be greater than the ability to accomplish, the force argument reads (in the past tense) "I desired, I tried, I failed." But even force, if accompanied by intelligence, calculates the cost. No one doubts that the United States Army and Navy are able to whip into subjection all the Filipinos who are not exterminated in the process, but is it worth the cost?

Militarism is only one item of the cost, but it alone will far outweigh all the advantages which are expected to flow from a colonial policy. John Morley, the English statesman, in a recent speech to his constituents, uttered a warning which may well be considered by our people. He said:

"Imperialism brings with it militarism, and must bring with it militarism. Militarism means a gigantic expenditure, daily growing. It means an increase in government of the power of aristocratic and privileged classes. Militarism means the profusion of the taxpayer's money everywhere except in the taxpayer's own home, and militarism must mean war.

"And you must be much less well read in history than I take the liberals of Scotland to be if you do not know that it is not war, that hateful demon of war, but white-winged peace that has been the nurse and guardian of freedom and justice and well-being over that great army of toilers upon whose labor, upon whose privations, upon whose hardships, after all, the greatness and the strength of empires and of states are founded and are built up."

Militarism is so necessary a companion of imperialism that the President asks for a 200 per cent increase in the standing Army, even before the people at large have passed upon the question of annexation.

Morley says that imperialism gives to the aristocracy and to the privileged classes an increased influence in government. Do we need to increase their influence in our Government? Surely they are potent enough already.

He calls attention to the fact that the toiler finds his hope in peaceful progress rather than in war's uncertainties. Is it strange that the laboring classes are protesting against both imperialism and militarism? Is it possible that their protest will be in vain?

Imperialism has been described as "the white man's burden;" but since it crushes the wealth producer beneath an increasing weight of taxes, it might with more propriety be called the poor man's load.

If the peace commissioners had demanded a harbor and coaling station in the Philippines and had required Spain to surrender the rest of the land to the Filipinos, as she surrendered Cuba to the Cubans, we would not now be considering how to let go of the islands. If the sum of twenty millions had been necessary to secure Spain's release, the payment of the amount by the Filipinos might have been guaranteed by the United States.

But the failure of the peace commissioners to secure for the Filipinos the same rights that were obtained for the Cubans could have been easily remedied by a resolution declaring the nation's purpose to establish a stable and independent government.

It is still possible for the Senate alone, or for the Senate and House together, to adopt such a resolution.

The purpose of annexationists, so far as that purpose can be discovered, is to apply to the government of the Filipinos methods familiar to the people of Europe and Asia, but new in the United States.

This departure from traditions was not authorized by the people; whether it will be ratified by them remains to be seen. The responsibility rests first upon Congress and afterwards upon that power which makes Congresses.

Whatever may be the wish of individuals or the interest of parties, we may rest assured that the final disposition of the Philippine question will conform to the deliberate judgment of the voters; they constitute the court of last resort; from their decision there is no appeal.

What next? Investigation, discussion, action.

APPENDIX II.

SEES NO HOPE IN REPUBLICAN PARTY—WE ARE WRITING THE MOST DISGRACEFUL CHAPTER OF ALL MODERN HISTORY.

[Speech of ex-Governor Boutwell in Cooper Institute, May 24.]

I have set before myself the task of specifying some of the errors in which President McKinley and his Administration have indulged in regard to the Constitution of the United States, and I shall then mention some of the pretexts that have been resorted to as apologies or excuses or shields for what has been done. There are indications that attempts are making to so construe the Constitution as to justify the policy of seizing, through war, foreign lands and alien peoples, and governing them as they might be governed if the Constitution of the United States did not exist. It is the manifest purpose of the Administration to seize and to hold countries and to govern races and communities outside of the jurisdiction of the Constitution. Thus is the Administration creating a power in the President and Congress independent of the Constitution, and over which the people can have no control. It is with that usurpation that I am now to deal. The question before the country is this: Republic or empire?

Of many propositions that may be laid down concerning the Constitution of the United States, no one can be more worthy of universal acceptance than this, namely: The Constitution can not of its own force apply to territory that is not of the United States.

A second proposition, which seems to justify itself without argument, is this: The Constitution by its own force applies equally and everywhere and always to every part of the United States.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

In elucidation and support of the first proposition, if that proposition is open to debate, it may be said that it was not in the power of the men who made the Constitution, nor of the people and States that ratified it, to have it applicable to Great Britain, to the Philippines, or to the island of Porto Rico, that was then under the dominion of Spain.

If, then, the first proposition must be accepted as an indisputable truth, it follows inevitably that the Constitution does not give power, and, in fine, that the Constitution could not have given power, to Congress to legislate for territories and peoples that then were or that thereafter might be outside of the jurisdiction of the Constitution itself. The power of legislation, which subsists in the Congress of the United States, is a derived power, and it is subject to one inherent limitation; its powers can not exceed the powers possessed by the body of authority—in this case the Constitution—from which its own powers are derived. If upon argument this proposition might be open to debate, it remains to be said that the Constitution has fixed the limit of legislative power. As a declaration of a limitation of legislative power in Congress the provision is superfluous; but its value is now to be appreciated in the enforcement of a manifest truth which otherwise in these times might be resisted stubbornly.

CONGRESS CAN NOT GO BEYOND CONSTITUTION.

Following the preamble to the Constitution and standing at the head of all things and of all declarations else are these words: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Hence it follows that Congress must find authority in the Constitution for each and every of its legislative acts.

In vain will be the search for authority to legislate beyond the jurisdiction of the Constitution. No attempt has been made in the Constitution to give such authority, and such authority could not have been given. The limits of legislative powers in Congress have been fixed by the Constitution, and they are fixed, irrevocably fixed, in the nature of things.

As a nation we are to obey the Constitution and to apply these truths. If Porto Rico is of the United States, then its ports are ports of the United States, and its inhabitants are citizens of the United States, and they are endowed already with all the rights and privileges of citizenship. If Porto Rico is not of the United States, then the attempt to exercise jurisdiction over the island through the lawmaking power is a gross usurpation abroad and a violation of duty at home which can not be defended and which ought not to be tolerated.

President McKinley and his imperialistic supporters, through two steps in an argument, have deduced an erroneous conclusion from an admitted truth: (1) Our Government, in common with other sovereignties, has a right to acquire territory. (2) That right carries with it the right to govern territory so acquired. From these propositions they deduce the false conclusion that Congress may indulge in a full and free discretion in the government of territories so acquired. Herein is the error, and herein is the usurpation. By their acquisition the territories have become a part of the United States. As a part of the United States the Constitution extends to them, and the privileges and guaranties of the Constitution are their possession, as they are the possession of the preexisting States and Territories. In these features of our system of government is the security that this nation can not at the same time play the part of empire and of republic.

We have the right to acquire territory, and we have the right to govern all territory acquired; but we must govern it under the Constitution, and in the exercise of those powers, and those only, which have been conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Any attempt further is a criminal usurpation.

I do not now enter upon the inquiry whether, within the constitutional limits, as I have laid them down, Congress may or may not, in some particulars, make distinctions between States and Territories; but beyond question there can be no gradations, no exemptions in the matter of taxation, and the sin of a departure from this constitutional obligation can not be qualified by any conditions that may be found in the legislation of Congress. Whatever is within or is of the United States is entitled to the benefit of this provision: "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." Whatever territory is not of the United States is not subject to taxation by us, and if, through the forms of legislation in Congress, we take money from any people who are not within the jurisdiction of our Constitution, the taking is an act of robbery for which neither justification nor excuse can be found. The act is not different in morals from piracy on the high seas.

And if, as is the admitted fact in the case of Porto Rico, upon the theory of the President as set forth in his message, we have taken moneys wrongfully from citizens of the United States who have imported products from that island, it is an odd form of recompense that an equivalent sum of money is now to be given to others who are destitute and starving and who have been brought into poverty and misery by our wrongdoing.

The claim that Congress may extend the Constitution to the new Territories is only a restatement of the claim that the Constitution does not apply of its own force to our newly acquired possessions and that the power of Congress over such possessions is an unlimited power.

Congress is to obey the Constitution. It has no power to increase or diminish the scope of that instrument.

Whenever a territory is acquired, either by purchase or conquest, the Constitution becomes immediately and by its own force the fundamental law of such acquired territory, or it must remain forever outside the Constitution, and consequently outside of the jurisdiction of Congress, inasmuch as Congress can not legislate beyond the jurisdiction of the Constitution, the source, and the sole source, of its legislative authority. The inquiry thus made leads to these conclusions, namely:

1. Whenever territory is acquired, whether by conquest or purchase, such territory becomes subject to the Constitution, and that without the aid or agency of any branch or department of the Government of the United States.

2. The power of legislation by Congress over such territory is fixed and limited by the Constitution.

3. That power is so limited that the "duties, imposts, and excises" must be the same in the newly acquired possessions as they may then be in preexisting States and Territories at the same periods of time.

4. The claim that Congress may govern territories and provinces that are not within the jurisdiction of the Constitution, or that Congress may extend the Constitution over Porto Rico, or the Philippines, or Japan, is an assumption of arbitrary power that must prove fatal to our republican system. These conclusions are in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the opinion of Chancellor Kent, with the decision, after argument, of an international tribunal, in which the United States was a party, and in harmony with the opinion given recently by Judge Lochren. A dissenting opinion has been given by Whitelaw Reid. It may be inferred, however, from the accompanying remarks which he has submitted to the public, that if he were to be convinced of the error of his opinion, he would become an anti-imperialist, as he can not accept Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines as equal States in the American Union.

THE PERIL OF THE NATION.

I am now to consider some of the pretexts that are tendered in justification of the President's policy and doings in the Philippine Islands. If we pass by Shakespeare, Milton, and Pope, our own poet, Oliver Wendell Holmes, may be classed among the leading philosophical writers of the modern era, in whatever relates to the passions and weaknesses of mankind. Holmes has named sin among the diseases that are catching. America has caught from England the diseases of land grabbing, of thirst for the subjugation of inferior races, all tributary to empire building, the crowning sin of dead nations and the peril of struggling nations that yet exist.

As criminals pass on to the prison they pass through three or more stages. First, the crime; then falsehood as a means of concealment, and, at last, upon discovery, they resort to pretexts in which they seek to find and to furnish to others excuses for what they have done. It is the office of a pretext to accomplish by indirection what is accomplished directly by a falsehood. Its purpose is to mislead, and therefore its sphere of action is not limited to crimes and the protection of criminals. There is a resort to pretexts whenever a private person falls into error, and it is the first and most inviting defense of public and offical personages when they become responsible for a pernicious public policy, or whenever they mislead a country into an unjust or criminal war.

This last statement embodies the offense of which President McKinley is guilty. Whenever a public officer is called to meet a charge which asserts or assumes wrongdoing on the part of such officer, he should be able to present himself in one of two aspects. He should be able truthfully to deny the charge, or, accepting the truthfulness of the facts alleged, he should be ready to defend what has been done and upon the ground of right and justice.

PRETEXTS AND THE FACTS.

I am not disposed to think better of my countrymen even than I ought to think, but I venture to express this opinion: In every election the people of all parties have given their votes for measures and for policies which they then believed to be right and just, both upon ethical and legal grounds, and the advocates of measures and policies have so presented the issues when engaged in an attempt to mold and guide public opinion. The position taken by the President and the speeches made in Congress by his supporters portend a change in this time-honored policy, and indicate that the people are to be urged to sanction and support a war for whose righteousness nobody has ventured to become responsible. Hence it is that we are called to encounter a long array of pretexts.

It was announced in the month of January that the war in the Philippines was ended and that civil rule was to be established. In the closing days of February or the opening days of March an officer of our Army was decoyed from his quarters and then murdered. In retaliation 24 Filipinos, not known to be guilty, were killed and a town was burned. Such was the report, and to this date it remains uncontradicted. In a dispatch from Manila, dated April 16, the country is informed that Captain Dodd, of the Third Cavalry, surprised 200 Filipinos, of whom 53 were slain, 44 were captured, and the village was then burned. Of Captain Dodd's force 1 man was wounded. This was a massacre rather than a battle or a skirmish. We have official knowledge that in the first three months of the year there were 124 skirmishes in the islands, in which 2,800 Filipinos were slain, wounded, or captured. On the 1st day of January the President informed the country that the war in the Philippines was ended, and in April the War Department reestablished the recruiting system for the reenforcement of the Army in the Philippines.

In the month of April the country was informed that an American force in the island of Samar had been besieged for five days, with a loss of 19 men killed and 2 wounded. This reversal of all former experience indicates the presence of sharpshooters in the ranks of the Filipinos. A new aspect of the war is thus presented.

Was not the statement that the war was ended and that civil rule was to be established a pretext designed to mislead this country? Under a civil government every person accused of crime is accorded an open trial.

Nothing more brutal could have occurred on the theater of war than the assassination of four and twenty men. Nothing more brutal has ever been charged upon the savage tribes on our Indian frontier. And was it not known in January that a detachment of 10 men could not march 10 miles in any part of the island of Luzon? And was it not then known that our stations of 100 men or less were in fact only besieged garrisons? And was it not known in January that the only peace in the archipelago was the peace that President McKinley had purchased of the Mohammedan slaveholder in the Sulu Isles? And is it not known to us that this purchase was a violation of the statute laws and Constitution of the United States?

PRESIDENTIAL BUNCO.

I am now to consider a pretext for which, through many and various forms of statement, the President is responsible, namely, that we did not seek the possession of the Philippine Islands, but that the responsibility of taking and governing the archipelago has been thrust upon the country. Secretary Long, in his speech delivered before the Middlesex Club on the day of the vernal equinox, attempts to shield the Administration by placing the responsibility upon the Supreme Being.

Whitelaw Reid says that an inquiry as to the way or means by which the responsibility was thrust upon the country is not now in order. As Mr. Reid is in a degree responsible for the calamities in which the country is involved, and as I dissent from his theory of responsibility in rulers, I shall proceed to set forth the views that I entertain.

While I may not be able to make a statement of the policy on which President McKinley has entered, there can be no hazard in saying that it is a new policy. Its friends make that claim when they assert that the United States is now a "world power," a rank that has come with or as a consequence of the President's policy. The President is a candidate for reelection, and with the avowed purpose of continuing that policy. The country is urged to sanction the President's policy, to authorize its continuance and its enlargement, possibly, and all without any inquiry, any investigation, any judgment, as to the wisdom, the justice—in fine, the criminality—of this war, which is an incident of his policy.

The people from whose households have gone forth the young men who have fought and who have fallen in this war, the people who bear the burden of a system of taxation such as the country has known only when the nation's existence was in peril, are to accept in silence all that has been done.

A DEGRADING DEMAND UPON THE PEOPLE.

In the history of despotisms there is not a record of a more degrading subserviency than this which the people of America are asked to accept. Thus is brought home to us Americans the infamy of the doctrine that a people may be governed without their consent.

This is the demand now made upon the American people. Let the demand be made. I answer, as one citizen, the country is not thus to be silenced into abject submission. There will be inquiry, investigation, scrutiny, as the only process by which a judgment can be reached upon the all-important question of the fitness of President McKinley to be again intrusted with the fortunes of the country.

The demand for silence and for the suppression of discussion and of opinion is an admission that that which has been done can not be defended. Such a policy was hazarded recently in the trial of a criminal cause in this city of New York, and with disastrous results. Every incident or event in human affairs that is assailed by anybody is defended by somebody, if it is open to any defense.

Whenever, in former times, the Republican party was assailed, it accepted the issue without delay, and without delay or hesitation it entered upon its defense. Whenever its officers were charged with misconduct or malfeasance in office, it entered at once upon an investigation and pursued the investigation to the end, and that without regard to consequences to the party or to the accused.

PRESIDENTIAL ACTS NOT SACRED THEN.

The plea that what had been done had been made sacred by the lapse of time was never tendered by the Republican party, nor was it accepted by the Republican party when made by others. Nor did the party accept as accomplished facts proceedings on the part of a President that were unlawful or unjust or injurious to the country.

When the Congress assembled in December, 1865, it appeared that the State of North Carolina and six other States that had been engaged in the rebellion had been reorganized under proclamations issued by President Johnson, and it was claimed that they had been restored to their former places in the Union, and that they were then entitled to representation in the House and in the Senate, without action on the part of Congress. The acts of the President were disregarded, and Congress proceeded to reconstruct the Government according to its ideas of justice and wisdom. In those days the doings of a President, that had not been authorized specifically, were not treated as binding upon the country, and inquiries without reserve were instituted. An appeal to the country was made and, by a two-thirds majority, the action of the President was condemned.

At this point I turn aside that I may indulge in an observation which may appear pertinent or otherwise, according to the opinions of those who may hear or may read. If President Johnson's plan of reconstruction had been accepted, the evil to the country would have been light compared with the evil of accepting the Philippines, either as colonies or as States, and either as States or as colonies they are to be attached to the Union if the lead of President McKinley shall be followed by the country.

And, further, I express the opinion that the fair-minded historian will be able to frame a better defense for President Johnson than the historian, or the casuist, even, will be able to offer in behalf of President McKinley.

I am not disturbed by the admission, which I make for the purposes of this address, that the United States is in the lawful possession, under the Spanish treaty and the law of nations, of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. However we may designate them, they are Territorial possessions, and as such they fall within the scope of this provision of the Constitution: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." In view of what has been said recently, I add the remark that the Constitution speaks always in the present tense.

HAVE SURRENDERED TERRITORY BEFORE.

The United States is not embarrassed by the fact that our title to Porto Rico and the Philippines is impregnable as against Spain and all other countries. Indeed, the absolute defensibility of our title is proportionately the strength of our evidence that our power to "dispose of" and to transfer our title to another is free from doubt or lawful challenge. In the Oregon controversy we surrendered territory that we claimed as the territory of the United States.

In John Tyler's Administration, and under Mr. Webster's lead, we transferred to Great Britain a territory that was part of the State of Maine. This was done by the consent of the State of Maine and of the State of Massachusetts, that were then joint owners of the lands that were thus transferred. Upon these precedents and upon the power granted in the Constitution I assume that the United States may transfer its title to Porto Rico and the Philippines without "let or hindrance" from anybody. Thus should disappear the pretexts that these islands have come to us by some unseen agency, divine or malevolent, and that it is a duty from which we can not shrink to keep them and to train their millions of inhabitants up to our ideas of self-government. It is the theory of the Administration that responsibilities have come to us without our agency and that we can not avoid those responsibilities. Upon this theory Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands are with us and of us as Territories and States, or as colonies, and for all periods of time. Hence it is that Mr. Reid claims that discussions are out of place and that there is no power in the American people to reverse what has been done.

For my purposes and for this occasion I shall assume that there is power in the American people to relieve themselves of all responsibility for Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and thus we may escape from the danger of holding them either as colonies or as Territories on their way to statehood.

If the islands should be held as colonies for the moment, it will be found, and without much delay, that they are on their way to statehood.

THE PRESIDENT AND NOT DESTINY RESPONSIBLE.

I come now to a more careful examination of the claim that these islands, with many evils, actual and present, and with forebodings of evils that are at once probable and immeasurable, have been thrust upon us by processes which were inevitable and which could not have been foreseen. If any part of this exculpatory excuse is true as regards the country, none of it is true as regards the President and those who may have advised and supported his policy since the war with Spain was ended.

The remark has been so often made that it is now a vain repetition to say that the war of the 19th of April, 1898, was undertaken for the sole purpose of relieving Cuba from the dominion of Spain. Even as to that war, it has been claimed that the President was forced by Congressional action to accept and indorse it. If, then, the President had conformed to the act of the 19th of April, or if he had obeyed an impulse of opinion such as has been attributed to him, he would have ended the war when the authority of Spain over the island of Cuba had been extinguished.

The President had no authority for further action, either by war or by aggressive demands through the treaty-making power. Incidentally two pretexts have been offered. First, the destruction of the ship Maine, and, second, the destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila. The destruction of the Maine was an historical event when war was declared, and the liberation of Cuba was undertaken, in part at least, in retaliation for the destruction of the battle ship. The contest in the bay of Manila was a part of the war for the freedom of Cuba, and when the freedom of Cuba had been secured the war in the East should have been ended. It is often asserted that Dewey should have left Manila when the Spanish fleet had been destroyed. The President is responsible for the course that was pursued. Dewey could only obey orders.

There are those who admit the badness of the President's policy and who yet exonerate the President. If the President is a man of ability, as I think he is, then he alone is responsible for his policy. If, as some assume, the President is a weak man, and under the influence of bad advisers, then, manifestly, his rule in office ought not to be extended. If the President's policy is a bad policy, it is immaterial whether the policy originated with the President or with advisers by whom he has been misled. In either case he is thereby unfitted for the office of President.

Has anyone from the President along the line of imperialists taken upon himself the responsibility of the assertion that the condition of the United States, or its fortunes, present or prospective, have been improved by the acquisition of a paper title to the Philippine Islands?

The fatal error was made the 10th day of August, 1898, when the President, upon his sole responsibility, passed beyond the requirements of the war declaration of April 19, and exacted a cession of islands to the United States and a footing in the Philippines, which was made the basis for a demand for a cession of the entire archipelago, which demand was consummated by the treaty of Paris. In the presence of these facts, what ground remains for the statement that our situation in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico has been thrust upon us, and that we are under a burden which we ought to accept and to carry as mankind are forced to bear a visitation of a pestilence, or to endure a year of famine?

It may with truth be said that the possession of the Philippines and the Philippine war, as a consequence, have been thrust upon the country, but not by an unseen hand. As to the President, this only can be said: He demanded the surrender of the Philippines, and he was enabled to enforce his demand from a prostrated enemy through fear that delay would lead to yet further demands upon the Kingdom of Spain. Upon these facts of history I stand committed to the charge I now make, namely: That the claim that the Philippine Islands, with the consequent horrors of war, have been thrust upon us is only a pretext that was designed to mislead the people away from the truth.

NO HOPE NOW FROM THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

One conclusion is deducible from the facts of history. Our occupation of the Philippine Islands and the war and blood incident to that occupation are due and due solely to the policy and doings of President McKinley, and for which he first and chiefly is responsible. That policy he will pursue until it is reversed by the people, irrespective of party alliances. It is a vain hope that the Republican party as an organization can reverse the policy of the President. The hope is as vain as was the hope in 1861–1865 that the Democratic party as an organization would aid in the abolition of slavery.

Again, it is claimed that trade follows the flag. This is true when the flag is the herald of peace, but the saying is false, false utterly, when the flag is transformed into a menace of war.

If in 1898 we had acted in good faith, if we had encouraged the inhabitants of the Philippines in their efforts to establish an independent government, our increase in exports to the islands would not have been limited to the pernicious trade in alcoholic liquors. Nor, on the other hand, would the users of hemp and of the products of hemp in the United States have been taxed 100 per cent for the benefit of importers, and to the injury alike of the people of the United States and of the Philippine Islands. War is the enemy of commercial trade, and trade does not follow the flag when the flag is the emblem of war.

Peace and friendship are the certain and constant promoters of trade and of every other business pursuit.

WHEN TRADE FOLLOWS THE FLAG.

There are supporters of the Administration who are not content with the possession of the Philippines and the war in the Philippines, but they advocate a warlike undertaking ostensibly for the extension of our trade with China.

China and Russia are combined, and nothing of trade facilities with China can be secured by force or by threats of force. The authorities of China have given notice that further territorial concessions will not be made. The recent speeches of the Chinese minister should be accepted as a declaration that trade with China is to depend upon friendships, agreements, reciprocal relations, and that nothing will be conceded to force. England and the United States, acting separately or combined, have not the power to dictate a commercial policy to China. Russia has gained more in the last five years by peaceful means and agencies than England has gained by war in the closing quarter of this century. Russia has connected its vast Siberian empire with the great Pacific Sea on the east and with the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean on the south.

The British Empire in India is now embraced in the arms of Russia. That country has allied itself with China on one side and with Persia on the other, and with openings to the sea through each country. Thus Russia is to control a third of the population of the globe, and if we are to enjoy the benefits of trade with the millions of the East, we are to secure that trade by the profession and the practice of the principles and the arts of peace. Thus, again, it may appear that the maxim or saying that trade follows the flag is true only when the flag is the emblem and herald of peace. Legitimate and systematic trade shuns the flag in times of war.

Of the import trade with the Philippine Islands in the year 1899, not less than 44 per cent was in English hands, and not more than 8 per cent was from the United States. The noncombatants enjoyed more than nine-tenths of the trade of the islands.

SOME DIFFICULTIES IN THE WAY OF EMPIRE.

I may be asked this question: Can the tendency to autocratic despotic rule in America be arrested? Something of an answer may be found in the record of passing events. There are inherent difficulties in the transformation of our Government, and those difficulties the Administration is now called to meet.

We have a legal title to Porto Rico and the Philippines, but the President does not yet venture to say whether they are Territories on the way to statehood or dependencies to be held as colonies. He is called to choose between English policy and American policy. That question inheres in the nature of things, and an answer must be given.

When the President exacted the protocol of August, 1898, that question was involved, and that question the President must answer. Out of what has been done the nation may learn as much as this, namely, that with every acquisition of territory comes this question: Are the people inhabiting this territory to be received as citizens and as our equals, or are they to be treated as vassals or as persons not yet fully emancipated from slavery? This question inheres in our system of government, and there it must remain. This question has appeared already in the case of Porto Rico, and it will appear in the Philippine Islands. It vexes Congress in the attempt to frame a government for Hawaii.

The anti-imperialists offer a solution and the only solution of this grave difficulty. We say to the country: Let us keep the pledge which we have made to Cuba and to ourselves, and let us at once accord to the inhabitants of Porto Rico and to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands the opportunity to set up governments for themselves.

Our policy is in harmony with our system of government, and it is in harmony with the great truths on which our system of government has been made to rest.

The issue is a plain issue. It is to be submitted to the people, and for one I rest in full confidence that the people will deliver the nation from the evil policy which President McKinley is pursuing.

At a cost of not less than $500,000,000, and the sacrifice of many t[illegible]nd young lives, a great lesson will have been taught, namely, that this [illegible]ern-ment can not be perverted, through either the follies or the crimes of its rulers. As the fruit of the sacrifices that have been made, the Declaration of Independence and the preamble to the Constitution will be again accepted by us as cardinal truths worthy of acceptance in all free governments. Thus do we vindicate the character and example and teachings of Washington and of Jefferson, and the line of patriots and statesmen to Lincoln and Grant and the rest, who believed in the equality of men and recognized in all peoples and communities the right of self-government.

EXPANSION AND IMPERIALISM.

The imperialists are active in promoting the notion that the anti-imperialists are opposed to the expansion of American territory, and that their opposition to the Philippine war and to the attempt to occupy the islands by force is due entirely to that opinion.

Professor Hart, of Cambridge, has given himself, through many serious pages of Harper's Monthly, to the task of proving that the founders of the Republic were expansionists, and his logic leads him to the conclusion that we are opposing the fathers of the Republic when we protest against the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands to the United States.

The founders of the Republic never committed themselves to expansion beyond the oceans, nor to the forcible seizure of territory for the purpose of enlarging the limits of the Union, nor to the subjugation of communities either to slavery or to American citizenship. The founders of the Government favored peaceful expansion within the oceans, and some there were who favored the acquisition of the West India Islands. Beyond these possibilities there is no evidence of a public policy or of a public opinion.

In the 11th article of the articles of confederation provision was made for the admission of Canada into the confederation upon the condition that Canada should accede "to this confederation" and join "in the measures of the United States." The fathers did not favor forcible annexation, nor annexation "beyond seas," nor the annexation of peoples of other races, other languages, and who had been trained under institutions and laws of which we have no knowledge.

The logic born of necessity knows no other law than the law of necessity.

The imperialists say our fathers favored the annexation of Canada by conference and friendly agreement, wherefore we are bound to sustain a war for the annexation of the Philippines.

Some persons opposed the annexation of Louisiana, and time has demonstrated their error, therefore the anti-imperialists are in error in opposing the annexation of the Philippines. Again, they say if some persons were in error in opposing the annexation of contiguous territory, it follows that they who oppose the acquisition of territory 10,000 miles away are also in error. The anti-imperialists are not committed upon the question of public policy either for or against the expansion of American territory. We are opposed, unalterably opposed, to the subjugation by war of 10,000,000 human beings into the American Union as citizens and equals, and we are opposed, unalterably opposed, to the subjugation of one man, even, as a vassal.

THE MOST DISGRACEFUL CHAPTER OF ALL MODERN HISTORY.

Of all modern history, the most disgraceful chapter is that which the American nation is now writing. At the opening of the last third of this century we abolished slavery in America, and at the end of this century we are making war for the establishment of a system of slavery in Asia. The crimes of England in the Sepoy war, on the Upper Nile, in South Africa, are trivial offenses against justice and humanity when compared with the crime of subjugating and enslaving 10,000,000 people.

It was a long step downward from Lincoln's proclamation of January 1, 1863, to McKinley's proclamation of December 21, 1898. Lincoln raised 4,000,000 slaves to full and free American citizenship, and invited them to prepare themselves for the work of self-government. McKinley announced to 10,000,000 human beings, who had already secured freedom by their own efforts, his purpose to subject them to his authority by the armies of the United States, unless they would submit themselves to his will without resistance. "My terms," said he, "are, first, submission and vassalage, and I will then consider further as to your fortunes." It is the reproach of the age and an omen of evil to America that there is one citizen to approve of this departure from the true doctrines of the Republic.

Senator HOAR, in his lofty, eloquent, and unanswerable speech against President McKinley's Philippine policy, has made Aaron Burr appear as the supporter of McKinley, and upon the ground that his buccaneering expedition to Mexico has been vindicated by McKinley's buccaneering expedition in the Philippine Islands. Burr's crime has been so minimized by comparison that it may not receive a place in history. But what of the country? Burr was pursued, arraigned, tried, driven from public employments, and ostracized by society. He had been Vice-President of the United States and a formidable aspirant to the Presidency against Mr. Jefferson. When his trial was ended and the facts were known he had not a supporter, and his aspirations had come to an end. Such was the fate of Aaron Burr. Has the country changed? There has been a change, but the country has not changed.

If, however, the city of Washington were the Government of the United States, as the city of Rome ruled the Roman Republic, and under corresponding conditions, the art of printing unknown, the rapid communication of thought not yet even imagined as a possibility, and the Republic not welded into harmony, the words of the historian De Vertot might soon be applied to America: "Luxury and the love of riches came into Rome with the treasures of the conquered provinces, and poverty and temperance, which had formed so many great captains, fell into contempt. And what is most surprising is that it was not by degrees, but all at once, that this vast alteration happened, and the Romans ran headlong into luxury and effeminacy." Is this to be our fate?

THE FAMILIAR PRETEXT OF CONQUERORS.

The policy of the conqueror has always been gilded by one pretext: The conquered are to be well governed. Such was President McKinley's promise to the Filipinos. We begin civil government in Porto Rico by treating the inhabitants as alien subjects, and the trade regulations proceed upon the theory that we are to enjoy the markets of Porto Rico, and that a duty is to be levied upon the products of Porto Rico when brought into the United States. We are setting up a civil government which is as absolute as could be devised. Thus do we violate our promises and prove the iniquity of the pretexts that we have tendered to the country and to our victims in the island.

In the days of reconstruction "carpetbaggery" was an unprecedented condition of affairs. It was abolished at an early day and by a general concurrence of opinion. We have established a carpetbag system for Porto Rico, and upon the basis of perpetuity. The first fruits of this system have been gathered already in the island of Cuba.

In four years the doctrine of the right of self-government has been repudiated in Washington, and an avowal of the doctrine is a hazardous experiment for a member of the Republican party. The downfall of Rome, as described by De Vertot, was not more rapid than the change that has taken place in the capital city of America.

THE GENIUS OF THE PRESENT REPUBLICAN PARTY—IT MUST BE OVERTHROWN.

In the year 1895 or 1896 a man emerged from the obscurity of unrecognized citizenship, and in the intervening time he has advanced himself to the head of the Republican party, and without delay he became the apparent director of its policy. He contributed most largely to the nomination and election of President McKinley.

Following the inauguration he secured a seat in the Senate by the enforced retirement of a statesman who, in an experience of forty years, had never before yielded to the menaces of those in power nor been misled by vain promises. During the three years now ended this man, so recently unknown, has stood before the country as the author of our public policy. This may be error, but in the month of April, 1900, he announced the renomination of President McKinley, and predicted his reelection. At the same time the Republican party waited in submissive silence for his utterance in regard to a candidate for the Vice-Presidency. All this appears to have been the outcome of immense energy in one man, combined with unlimited resources in money. For the moment the combination is supreme in the Republican party.

And thus a party that became historically great for its victories in war and for its achievements in peace bows in subserviency to a self-created dictator. What is the remedy? The party must be overthrown, and in its downfall the dictatorship will disappear, and in a quadrennial period, or in a decade, the party, regenerated, may come again to the head of affairs in the Republic.

THE SHAME OF IT.

[From the Washington Post.]

It will not be wise in the Administration to overlook the fact that this is a sentimental people. We laugh at Frenchmen and Italians and the Latin races generally. It is our caprice to speak of them as being hysterical and effervescent. It is the caprice of ignorance. The Teutonic temperament is the most maudlin of all, and the Anglo-Saxons come next, because of their inheritance. The Latins are demonstrative, perhaps, but we furnish for the world the permanent supply of sentimentality. And the Administration will find its welfare in considering this fact.

Perhaps it is difficult here in Washington to keep one's touch upon the nation's pulse. Perhaps the high official, in this atmosphere of luxury, and diplomatic calculation, and unwonted and novel environment, finds it hard to maintain intact his simple patriotism and his pure ideals. But the great American people west of New York—the yeomanry upon whose loyalty and brawn and courage the honor of this Republic rests—these must be taken into account by any government or party that hopes to stand. We advise the powers that be that this hideous scandal in Cuba can not safely be treated as a case of mere vulgar embezzlement and breach of trust. We tell them—and we know whereof we speak—that every American who loves his country and holds its honor sacred regards this frightful business in Havana as a personal sorrow and humiliation. It strikes him as a treason committed against the nation—as a betrayal and degradation of the flag. He is not to be cajoled with the proposition that this is a mere official delinquency. He knows that we took up the cause of Cuba as altruists and missionaries. He knows that we went there in the guise of unselfish and heaven-sent redeemers. He knows that we prated to Christendom of our holy mission, and he remembers how we qualified the declaration of war with the unctuous pledge of piety. And we all know, now that our professions have been put to shame—that, after taking possession of Cuba in the name of God, we have plundered and despoiled it as the most ruthless buccaneers of the last century could scarce have done.

He who tells himself that this infamy can be hushed and set aside and hidden from the public gaze by a pretense of vigor and an alluring travesty of indignation must be drunk with eminence and power. He must have forgotten his own thoughts and sentiments and lost his hold upon the feelings of his fellow-citizens. We declare that is the most ghastly and abhorrent stain that has ever been put upon the escutcheon of the nation. If there be any man within our boundaries who does not feel that he has been betrayed and stabbed in his own person, then he is no true patriot, no genuine American.

APPENDIX IV.

[From the Washington Post, supporter of McKinley's Administration.]

WHAT M'KINLEY MUST FACE.

There is a pestiferous muddle in Cuba—a humiliating contradiction of policies and attitudes. We say in one breath that Cuba is a foreign country, merely held in tutelage; yet we are legislating for her in the matter of taxation and social observance; we are rearranging her laws and her judicial machinery; we are disbursing her revenues for our own purposes, and we are treating directly with the consular and diplomatic representatives of European nations in the island. The Cubans complain, and seemingly with justice, that our attitude is inconsistent, and they are beginning to assert that our protestations are not sincere. Thoughtful men in this country fear that we are preparing sorrow for ourselves and new calamities for Cuba by taking up with the professional brigands and disturbers and neglecting the responsible, property-holding, and taxpaying classes, who alone can be trusted to establish and conduct a civilized government after our forces shall have been withdrawn. The outlook in Cuba is far from reassuring.

In Porto Rico our attitude is even more embarrassing. We have annexed the island outright, under the treaty of Paris, and made Porto Rico a part of our territory. When we annexed Hawaii we gave it free trade with the United States, but against Porto Rico we set up a tariff tax upon her industries. The pretext for this is that Porto Rico is destitute and that the money thus raised by taxing her products will be used to maintain a machinery of government in the island. In other words, we put a burden upon the industrious and producing classes in order to pay the salaries of our office-holders. We could find $3,000,000 to send to Cuba and distribute among the worthless marauders who followed Gomez in his predatory insurrection, but we have nothing to help Porto Rico to its feet and restore a prosperity which we destroyed by our occupation. Porto Rico is ours and we do nothing for it, but we send millions to Cuba to placate the drones and agitators of a foreign state. We say that Porto Rico is not in the United States, that our flag does not make it a Territory like Hawaii and Alaska, yet the governor we send there to preside over the island makes oath to uphold, in that capacity, the Constitution of the United States. If the Constitution is there, why is not Porto Rico an integral part of the Union? If the Constitution is not there, how can Governor Allen defend it?

Then we have the Philippines. The country is far from satisfied as to the situation. Three or four times, perhaps oftener, within the past eighteen months we have been assured that the trouble was over, the insurrection finally and forever crushed, yet the next day American soldiers are trapped and killed within sight of Manila. The roll of the dead grows hourly; the hospitals add steadily to their hapless populations, and cemeteries fatten without ceasing as the weeks roll by. The Administration insists that there is no war in the Philippines, but Otis says there is war every time he dismisses an officer from the Army, and he does this with ghastly frequency. The country is not contented with this state of things. There is much to be explained.

As to the South African Republics, now struggling for their very existence, the American people deplore the failure of their official representatives to declare for them that sympathy which it is our boasted mission in the world to feel, and, if need be, to exemplify. It will not do to say that our sympathies in this direction have always been confined to the Western Hemisphere. We remember Kossuth too well. The truth is that hundreds of thousands of thinking men who will vote next November are to-day asking themselves for some creditable explanation of the Government's apparent alliance with England in the war of rapine and spoliation upon the South African Dutch.

It will be for Mr. McKinley to bear in mind the fact that this is a sentimental people; that, while Americans idolize valor, humanity, and justice, they condemn with equal fervor unfairness, cruelty, and bad faith. They recognized in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a trap for shameful possibilities, and they are watching, with a vigilance perhaps unsuspected in high quarters, what they begin to regard as a dangerous and abominable tendency. The President still holds the people's affectionate regard and trust, but this may be strained too far. Indeed, the tension has already become perilous, and everybody knows it.

APPENDIX V.

[Washington Post, June 5, 1900.]

POSTMASTER-GENERAL SMITH.

Mr. Charles Emory Smith is an accomplished gentleman. He writes well and talks well. As the spokesman or orator of the Administration—a self-constituted rôle, we understand, and one of which the Administration has really stood in no need—his official career has not been without its brilliant aspects. In literary work Mr. Smith excels. His contribution to Collier's Weekly, only last month, entitled "The mails follow the flag," dealing familiarly with the Cuban postal service and lauding Director Rathbone's work to the skies, was an especially fine bit of work from a purely literary point of view. The service he rendered in upholding the hands of Congress during the Porto Rico imbroglio, in his exhaustive, though anonymous, presentation of the merits of the proposition to his doubting and even obstinate countrymen, also stands out as a shining example of the value of a Cabinet officer who wields a trenchant pen.

But generously conceding to Mr. Smith his notable achievements in literature, and granting his usefulness as an Administration orator, the close observers of affairs—of whom the Post is one—will naturally pause to inquire, Has all this literary work, all this oratory, really been worth while? Has Mr. Smith, the accomplished writer and gifted speaker, in the rôle to which we here allude, been of as great service to President McKinley as he might have been had he more closely pursued the duties of his important office? In view of recent deplorable events, which might easily have been prevented, or at least minimized, by proper official vigilance here at Washington, a negative response is sure to be given to both the foregoing queries.

The Post is moved to these remarks not through an uncharitable feeling toward the Postmaster-General, but by a most remarkable statement given to the press yesterday in his own defense in connection with the fraud disclosures at Habana. We are told that the work of retrenchment and reform now being so effectively performed by Mr. Bristow was, in fact, ordered—"imperatively demanded" is the term used—"some months ago" by Postmaster-General Smith. Such an excuse is neither potent nor creditable. Are we to understand that a Cabinet officer's duty and responsibility end when he imperatively demands that abuses be corrected?

Are we to justify him in closing his eyes in the months ensuing while the extravagances multiply and culminate in wholesale peculation? Was it not the Postmaster-General's duty—his imperative duty—to see that his orders for retrenchment were carried out? Is it anyone's fault but his own that Director Rathbone was not required or compelled to keep the Department here fully and correctly informed as to postal affairs on the island? Does it relieve the Postmaster-General to intimate that it was Governor-General Brooke who should have discovered the deficiencies?

The explanations of Mr. Smith are lame and illogical throughout. They are neither courageous nor businesslike. It is unfortunate for Mr. Smith that he explained at all. His statement has simply emphasized his own shortcomings in the premises.

Civil Code for Alaska.

OF

HON. HERMAN B. DAHLE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 17, 1900,

On the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAHLE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I will not enter into any general discussion of the pending bill (the Alaska code), but will take advantage of the rules and practice of the House and will speak on a measure of very great importance to the producers and consumers of dairy products of our country.

The magnitude of the dairy industry in my State, and especially in my district, emboldens me to address the House on the subject of suitable protection for that industry from unfair and ruinous competition. There is an old maxim to the effect that when the farmer is prosperous the country is prosperous, but that when the farmer is not prospering the country can not long prosper without him. The experience of generations has proven the truth of the saying. There can be no enduring prosperity unless it is based on the welfare of the men who till the soil.

There has been before the House for the greater part of this session a bill (H. R. 3717), introduced by Mr. GROUT, of Vermont, which I believe will do more to promote the legitimate prosperity of the agricultural interests of the country than any measure which has been before Congress for many years. It will not only promote the interests of the agricultural population, but will do so notwithstanding the assertions of those opposed to it, without injuring any legitimate industry which places reliable, pure products on a fair market and is free from fraud.

This bill, if passed, will serve two purposes. It will not only safeguard the interests of the producer of butter, but will at the same time protect the consumer from deception in the nature of the food he buys, and enable him to buy butter if he wishes butter, and oleomargarine if he wishes oleomargarine, at the proper price for each commodity. The bill to which I refer has been extensively misrepresented. It simply provides that oleomargarine shall be sold as oleomargarine and not as butter, and that consumers seeking butter shall not be imposed upon. The bill seeks to place each industry on its own basis and make each stand or fall by its own merits. Can anything be more fair? What injustice is there in this proposition?

If the manufacture of oleomargarine is a legitimate industry, free from fraud, what wrong is there to it to require its product to be sold on the open market for what it really is, and not for something which it is not? We have heard a great deal during this session about this bill being an effort to crush a legitimate business. How can a legitimate business be crushed by a law which requires its product to be sold for what it actually is? The cry raised by the friends of imitation butter that the bill will ruin them is a confession that they depend on selling their imitation for butter to continue that enormous business and to reap the enormous profits they have been reaping.

The cry against this bill is a confession from the men engaged in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine that their great profits, amounting in some cases to over 100 per cent, depend on fraud and the deception of the consumer. When has a more startling position been taken before a committee of this House by the representatives of any industry? The farmers of the nation come to us with a memorial for protection from fraudulent and ruinous competition with imitation butter, and the representatives of the manufacturers of that imitation come before us and demand that they be permitted to sell an imitation to deceive the consumer and to ruin the farmer.

We are asked to place each industry on its own basis: make each class of producers sell their product for what it is—butter as butter and oleomargarine as oleomargarine. We are asked to protect the consumer from being deceived as to the food he buys; to protect him from being given oleomargarine, or some other imitation, when he asks for and pays the price of butter. A more fair and just proposition was never laid before Congress.

The importance and necessity of some such legislation as this is readily seen, when it is remembered that the oleomargarine manufacture has doubled and more than doubled in the past four years. The oleomargarine factories of the United States produced 45,000,000 pounds of the imitation in 1897, and in 1899 the amount had risen to 83,000,000 pounds. Of this the greater part was consumed under the belief that it was butter.

Were it not that the greater part was palmed off as butter, this bill would not have received the support it has received from the farmers and butter consumers of the United States. Congress was not appealed to until every other method of protecting the dairy industry from this fraudulent and ruinous competition had been exhausted. A majority of the States of the Union have enacted laws forbidding oleomargarine being colored to imitate butter, but from the very nature of things these laws have been found insufficient to protect either the producer or consumer of butter. Oleomargarine manufactured in one State can be sold in another in violation of law, and the officials of neither State can successfully trace the shipment and effectively enforce the law.

Twenty years' experience has demonstrated that imitation butter of any kind can be sold by the dealer to his customers for butter if it be colored to imitate butter, and the substitution is difficult of detection. Any law which seeks to prevent the sale of colored oleomargarine as butter to the consumer by the retailer is very difficult of enforcement, and is on the whole impracticable. Experience in the State of Wisconsin has shown that the proper way to protect the legitimate butter industry is to so tax the manufacture of oleomargarine colored to imitate butter that its cost to the retailer will be equal to that of butter and the incentive to fraud is thereby done away with.

Under existing conditions the temptation to substitute the cheaper imitation for butter when sold to the consumer at retail is very strong. Both kind of goods look alike, and the unskilled consumer can not detect the difference. The dealer will get a profit of perhaps 2 or 3 cents a pound on the butter and twice as much or more on the oleomargarine. Both kinds of goods are kept in the same refrigerator.

The opportunity for substitution and fraud on the consumer is more than the morals of many men can stand, and the result is that multitudes are given oleomargarine, costing the dealer from 10 to 15 cents a pound, in place of butter which was called for and which cost the dealer 18 to 28 cents a pound. The customer pays for butter. As long as the dealer confines his sales of oleomargarine as butter to known customers, whom he can rely on not investigating the nature of the goods they are supplied with, he is comparatively safe, and may continue his fraudulent practices for a long period of time and reap the large profits resulting from getting butter prices for a cheaper substitute. Against this condition of affairs the producers and consumers of butter are helpless unless Congress comes to their relief.

The present laws for the protection of the public from fraud in the sale of oleomargarine have failed, and it is because of the failure of these laws, State and national, that this Congress is appealed to. Thirty-two States have enacted statutes against the sale of colored oleomargarine. These statutes have been found unequal to the task of protecting the public, and twenty years of experience has shown that only a law which shall control the manufacturer and the nature of his product will accomplish the desired end. The evil must be met at its own source and freed from fraud before it gets into the great channels of trade. Human experience has demonstrated the insufficiency of State laws to protect the public from this fraud.

Experience has also shown that only a law which will clearly distinguish between butter and oleomargarine, in some way that the one can not be sold for the other and the public deceived, will meet this growing evil and avert the danger which threatens the legitimate dairy industry of the nation. Gentlemen may quibble, may talk of the rights of the oleomargarine manufacturer to deceive the consumer, but the fact remains that only a national color law will meet the evil.

As long as oleomargarine can be made and put on the market in imitation of butter, resembling pure butter in color, so long will it be sold as butter. In voting on this question we must take one horn of the dilemma; we must either allow this admitted evil to continue or we must stop the sale of an imitation for the pure article. The people of the United States demand this action, as is shown by the multitude of memorials before the Committee on Agriculture. In another way, however, the public sentiment of the nation has been shown on this question. Over thirty States have enacted statutes intended to protect the people from deception in the nature of the food they buy under the name of butter. Not a single one of these statutes has ever been repealed. Can any more direct testimonial be desired of the nature of public sentiment on this question?

We have heard before the Committee on Agriculture a great deal of argument against the bill, during which much was said of oleomargarine as a food for the poor, because it is cheaper than butter. The representatives of the oleomargarine manufacturers have posed as the friends of the poor man. Now, if this statement of the representatives of the oleomargarine manufacturers is true, why do they wish to color their product and sell it at butter prices? How does the poor consumer benefit from the sale of oleomargarine when he pays butter prices for it? Would a law forbidding the coloring of oleomargarine prevent the poor from buying it?

Would such a law in any way restrict his right and opportunity to consume it?

No reasonable man will contend that it will. If the poor or any other class of consumers wish to eat oleomargarine instead of butter, this bill will not prevent them doing so. The dairymen and butter consumers of the country do not ask that any individual who prefers oleomargarine shall not be allowed to buy and consume it at his wish. Let butter be sold as butter, and the imitation as imitation. As said before, oleomargarine can be sold to the consumer for from 10 to 15 cents a pound.

This being so, how does the poor man benefit from the sale of oleomargarine when he is charged from 15 to 25 cents a pound for it, the regular price of pure butter? The bill lowers the tax on oleomargarine as such to one-quarter of a cent a pound, and if it is left uncolored, or is colored some other color than that of butter, the consumer, the poor consumer, will get it at its rightful price, and will be saved from 5 to 15 cents a pound of what he is now charged. Nothing shows the hypocrisy of the argument of the oleomargarine manufacturers more clearly than their unwillingness to sell their product for what it really is at its proper price. They claim to be the friends of the poor man, and at the same time insist that they be allowed to sell him oleomargarine at butter prices.

This fact was shown in my own State within the past few years, when numerous convictions were had of retail dealers for selling colored oleomargarine against the State law. The oleomargarine was sold to the poor, but was sold as butter and for butter prices. In no case, as far as I am aware, was the imitation sold otherwise than as pure butter and for the best butter prices. This is the whole contention, this is the whole opposition to the bill. "We must be allowed to sell our product for butter," is the cry of the oleomargarine industry, "and we must color it to imitate butter to do this."

The enormous profits resulting from selling oleomargarine at butter prices has caused the bitter fight against this bill. The same enormous profits have caused the creation of a huge fund for the defense of dealers arrested charged with the violation of State laws in the sale of oleomargarine. The profits are so great that men are willing to take many risks of fine and imprisonment, and the manufacturers are willing to spend large sums to keep the market open to their imitation butter.

One of the principal arguments used against this bill has been the importance of the oleomargarine industry and the large sums invested in the plants of the manufacturers. The bill, we have been assured, will seriously impair the prosperity of this business, and thereby injure a large established industry. The immensity of the dairy interests which are being undermined by the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter has received but scant attention from the plausible gentlemen who have been before the committee. The importance of the oleomargarine business, except to the millionaire owners of the business, is a matter of opinion.

The importance to the country of the prosperity of the millions of farmers engaged in the production of butter is a matter of fact. The two classes of products can not live together. Pure butter or colored oleomargarine must give way. Either the sale of colored oleomargarine sold as butter must end, or the farmers engaged in the manufacture of butter must forfeit their prosperity. Which is the most important to the country? Can any reasonable man sincerely believe that the prosperity of a handful of manufacturers, numbering 26 firms, to be of greater importance than the prosperity of 5,000,000 or more farmers who depend either wholly or partly on the butter market for their well-being? Is the piling up of a few colossal fortunes better to the nation than the prosperity of the farmers scattered over the smiling face of the country?

The farmer is the great consumer, and on his financial welfare depends, more than on any other, the well-being of the rest of us, and the fact, for fact it is, can not be too strongly dwelt upon, that either he must suffer serious loss or the sale of oleomargarine as pure butter must stop. In 1899 the oleomargarine product was over 83,000,000 pounds, and more than three-fourths of that was sold as butter. Every pound sold as butter displaced a pound of butter and took the value of that pound of butter from the pockets of the farmer. Were this done by legitimate competition there could be but little objection, but all this immense loss to the farmers of the country was caused by fraud, was caused by the consumer who wished to obtain the farmer's product being deceived and tricked into buying something he did not want at a price far in excess of a legitimate profit.

The sale of oleomargarine is steadily increasing at an average rate of 20 per cent a year, and if this continues, as it is most likely to unless some legislative safeguards are thrown about the consumer, the butter makers of the land will soon have to divide the market with this cheaper substitute, and the consumers will be sold more and more of an article they do not want in the guise of what they do want.

Considering the facts, aside from the exaggerations of the importance of the oleomargarine industry, it is easy to see how entirely insignificant the oleomargarine interest is when compared with the dairy interests of even a single State. If the injury which we are assured this bill will work to the oleomargarine business is to be made the test, we will readily appreciate the greater claim of the dairymen and consumers for protection. Much has been said before the committee of the immensity and importance of the oleomargarine industry.

The fact is that the entire oleomargarine business, as measured by the value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of the 26 factories, is not equal to the value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of the 252 dairy plants of my district alone. Think of it! The entire value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of the oleomargarine factories of the United States not equal to capital invested in dairy plants in one Congressional district of four counties.

One of the largest oleomargarine manufactories in the country is that of William J. Moxley & Co., of Chicago. According to the last statement by this firm to one of our most reliable mercantile agencies, the value of this plant, fixtures, and machinery is $30,850.63. There are 26 such factories in the United States, the majority of them smaller and with less capital than this one and with less invested in machinery and fixtures.

The Moxley plant being worth $30,000, it is fair to estimate the average value of the oleomargarine plants, machinery, and fixtures at $25,000. There are 26 oleomargarine manufactories in the United States, and at the average value of $25,000 the total value of these plants would be $650,000. That is the value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of the oleomargarine factories of the United States.

How does this compare with the value of the creameries of a single State, or, better still, a single Congressional district? If it is a business of such magnitude as has been urged, surely it must be worth more than the creameries of four counties comprising the Second Wisconsin district. There are 252 creameries in my district, worth on an average $2,700, making a total value for the creameries of the district, taking only the values of the plants, machinery, and fixtures, $680,000, or $30,000 more than the entire value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of all the oleomargarine factories of the United States.

This oleomargarine business, because established, now comes before us and argues that it is of such importance and has so much money invested in it that it has the right to undermine and fraudulently ruin one of the oldest legitimate agricultural industries of the country. It defends itself against this bill on the ground that it is so important, and yet it has less money invested than is invested in the legitimate dai industry of a single Congressional district.

In the State of Wisconsin there are 951 creameries, with an average value of $2,700, making a total value for the State in plants, machinery, and fixtures of $2,567,700. Set against this sum the value of the plants, machinery, and fixtures of the oleomargarine factories of the country, which was given before as $650,000, and you can readily see the insignificant amount invested in the imitation business when compared with the legitimate industry.

The representatives of the oleomargarine manufacturers have laid great stress on the amount of money invested in their business as the reason why it should be allowed to continue its fraudulent practice. If the amount invested is the test, how small a voice should the oleomargarine business have in this discussion as compared with the colossal amount invested in butter making in my State alone, not counting the other great dairy States of the Union.

This method of measuring the relative importance of the two industries is the best one, for it precludes the consideration of watered stock, overcapitalization, and exaggerated values. The average statement as to the value of the oleomargarine business is unreliable because of the impossibility of knowing the exact conditions of the business. In order to make the investment of the industry look large, the representatives of the oleomargarine industry figure in immense outstanding accounts, large amount of cash on hand, great quantities of stamps kept in the offices of the concerns.

The Moxley Company claims total assets at $291,581.16. This is made up, however, chiefly of cash on hand, stamps, bank deposits, and outstanding accounts. Its plant, machinery, and fixtures are worth but $30,850.63 on its own statement; and the actual value of the plant, with the fixtures and machinery considered, is the only true way to measure the two industries. Were the stock kept on hand by the dairymen to be known and the value of their outstanding accounts capable of being measured, they would show a sum so immense the amount claimed for the oleomargarine industry would sink into insignificance.

The necessity of some Federal legislation for the protection of the consumer and the legitimate butter producer can not be more clearly shown than by the immense quantity of oleomargarine sold, colored like butter, in the States where such sale is absolutely prohibited. I can speak more knowingly, Mr. Speaker, of my own State, where I am somewhat familiar with the conditions, and the efforts that have been made to enforce the law. Some years ago a statute was passed absolutely forbidding the sale of oleomargarine colored to resemble butter.

I know from personal knowledge that the most strenuous efforts have been made by the State dairy and food inspector to enforce this law, and numerous convictions were had for its violation. In each of these cases colored oleomargarine was sold to consumers who asked for butter, and they were charged butter prices. In spite, however, of the stringent State law, and the earnest efforts of the State authorities to enforce it, 714,742 pounds of yellow oleomargarine were sold in Wisconsin in 1899. This is from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Notwithstanding this report and the undisputable evidence of the sales it offers in Wisconsin, you may travel the State over and you will not find a pound of oleomargarine for sale as such. Over half a million pounds sold in the State, and not a pound offered on the market as oleomargarine. Requests in several cities of the State for oleomargarine by would-be consumers was met by the statement from dealers that there was no oleomargarine on the market in Wisconsin. The conditions in Wisconsin are but a sample of the conditions prevailing all over the United States, and demonstrate most effectually the necessity for a Federal law for the protection of the legitimate industry.

The experience of many years, both among the officials whose duty it is to enforce the law and among men of large experience in the marketing of dairy products, has also taught the necessity of such legislation as the pending bill. I have had some correspondence with various firms of long experience in the dairy markets in various States, firms which as a merchant and manufacturer I have intrusted with my own goods. They are unanimous in saying that only a Federal law taxing colored oleomargarine, so that its cost to the retailer will be equal to that of butter, will be effective. I quote from some of these letters:

Potter & Williams, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Your esteemed favor of May 10 is to hand and noted. In reply we would say that from our point of view there is no question but what Mr. GROUT'S bill should become law. The laws of the State of New York governing the sale of oleomargarine are in all probability as prohibitive as the laws of any State in the Union, nevertheless the oleomargarine manufacturers find a way of getting around our law, with the result that thousands and thousands of pounds are sold all over the State of New York, not sold as oleomargarine, but sold for butter and colored to look like butter. Our present law forbids the coloring of oleomargarine, and when it is uncolored it is almost as white as lard, but in defiance of the law the goods are colored to resemble butter and are sold for butter.

One of our nearest neighbors was apprehended this spring with something over 500 packages of oleomargarine on hand. His sales previous to the time of his apprehension amounted to thousands and thousands of packages, all of which he sold for butter. He also claims that he bought it for butter. We understand the fines due the State of New York from this one man alone amount to about $16,000, but as yet nothing has been done. Whether the manufacturers of the oleomargarine are protecting him or not we do not know, but at all events the State authorities are not bothering him any now.

During the time our neighbor was handling oleomargarine every package of it took the place of a package of pure butter and affected the demand for pure butter to just that extent. We and all others who were dealing honestly in the pure article during the time that our neighbor was handling oleomargarine were practically put out of business. We could not compete with him in price, and apparently his goods were just as good as any pure butter.

Up to the present time the manufacturers of oleomargarine appear to have been strong enough to defeat the object of all State laws so far as they interfered with the sale of oleomargarine. At the present time no one knows when he buys a pound of butter at the retail store whether he is really taking home butter or oleomargarine.

Mr. GROUT'S bill, of course, is in the interests of dairymen, but at the same time it is also in the interest of every person who desires to deal honestly in honest goods, and in the interest of every family in the United States.

A. H. Barber, commission merchant, Chicago:

I surely think that the Grout bill will be a great benefit to all the farmers who are interested in the dairy business. I think that at least seven-eighths of all oleomargarine is sold over the counters by the retailers as butter, and if these goods were made uncolored they could not be pawned off to the consumers for butter. The manufacturers and the wholesalers, I think, as a usual thing sell it to the retailers as butterine or oleomargarine.

It is a fact that the sale of oleomargarine has driven the dairymen quite largely out of business, as the prices on genuine butter have been so low the past two or three years that but very few factories are getting much more than half the amount of milk they formerly did. This past winter butter has ruled higher than formerly, on account of the smaller production of butter. If the Grout bill should become a law, it would stimulate the dairymen to increase their herds, and the consequence would be a larger production of butter, and the prices of dairy products would rule at a remunerative price to the farmer.

Pitt, Barnum & Co., New York:

The State law prohibits the sale of butterine and oleomargarine in our State, but, beyond all doubt, there is lots of it sold—and it is sold as genuine butter. Our State dairy commissioner is watching it very closely, and has prosecuted a number of cases successfully. There can be no doubt but that the unlawful sale of butterine and oleomargarine has its effect upon the demand and price of pure butter in the sections where they are selling it on the quiet.

T. L. Brundage, commission merchant, Cleveland, Ohio:

Since receiving your letter I have had a conversation with Mr. Reynolds, who was deputy dairy commissioner for a time, and he tells me that he is satisfied that from the investigations he has made, fully one-half of the oleomargarine sold is sold to the customers for butter, and of course so far as the influence of such sales are concerned on the price of pure butter it must certainly have a great effect, and it can not be otherwise, and as so much of it is being used the demand for butter is very much smaller. I do not think that it is sold to the retailer for butter, but it is the retailer that sells it to the consumer for butter. The retailer without doubt knows what he is handling, and the consumer is the one who suffers, and the dairy industry is crippled and injured also.

Earl Brothers, Chicago:

We find that the sale of colored butterine, or oleomargarine, is certainly injurious, and also know that it hurts the sale of butter.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party has a traditional policy of protection to American industries from destructive foreign competition. To that policy the great party to which we belong is committed heart and soul. Protection is the cornerstone of Republican policy. Is it consistent to protect the manufacturing industries of the United States from destructive foreign competition and leave the greatest industry of America, that of agriculture, open to the onslaughts of an insidious foe from behind?

Can we justify ourselves before the people in our policy of protection if we leave the farmers of the United States at the mercy of a fraudulent business, which is demoralizing one of the principal agricultural industries of our country? Is it not as worthy, and, indeed, as necessary, to protect this great agricultural industry from ruinous and fraudulent competition at home as well as from injurious competition with underpaid labor abroad?

The dairymen of the United States are protected from Canadian competition by a tariff. The injury that the Canadian butter makers could do the dairy industry of the United States, however, is slight when compared with the ravages being made in the legitimate dairy industry by the ruinous competition of the oleomargarine dealers selling their imitation as butter. If the General Government felt it its duty to protect the dairymen of the country from Canadian competition, how much more is it the duty of the Government to now step in and protect them from this new danger, compared with which the Canadian competition is a mere incident.

The real danger to the dairy industry is from within, not from without, the United States. The Government protects the iron industry with a tariff of $4 a ton on pig iron, $1 a ton on iron ore, seven-twentieths of a cent a pound on steel rails, and a half a cent a pound on structural steel. Lumber is protected by a tariff of from $1 to $2 a thousand feet; shoe leather, 20 per cent ad valorem; chinaware, 55 per cent; brick, 45 per cent; and many others, examples of which might be multiplied.

All this protection is practical, because the danger to these industries is from foreign competition with its underpaid labor. These industries have nothing to fear from imitations at home. Brick can not be easily imitated by some cheaper substitute. Steel rails can not be made from the waste slag of iron foundries. Shoes can not be made from the leather scraps of harness shops. They have nothing to fear from an imitation made of far cheaper materials, but which can not be detected by the consumer. The position of butter is unique. It can be successfully imitated in taste and appearance so that the consumer is unable, without making a chemical test, to recognize the true from the false.

This being the case, it becomes the duty of the Government to protect the public from imposition in the nature of the food it buys, and at the same time protect the farmers of the nation from the danger which is staring them in the face. Congress has defended the American farmer when he was threatened from without by comparatively harmless foes. Shall it now desert him when he is threatened from within by a stalwart enemy? Shall Congress, after its long career as the friend of the American farmer, desert him in his hour of need? Let us join in saying "No," by voting for the Grout bill.

Civil Code for Alaska.

OF

HON. JOHN F. FITZGERALD,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 26, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole, and having under consideration the bill (S. 349) to provide a civil code for Alaska—

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to call the attention of the House at this time to an editorial which appeared in this morning's Washington Post. It contains a statement of fact which seems to me to demand the immediate attention of Congress, and I therefore ask the indulgence of the House while I read the extract:

INFAMOUS SCHOOL MANAGEMENT.

If Congress needs any further evidence of the imperious and immediate necessity for a change in the management and the methods of our public school establishment, the Post is prepared to furnish it. To that end we call attention to two circulars recently distributed among the teachers. They are designated, respectively, as "Form C" and "Form D," and they require the teachers to obtain from their pupils certain information which, in our opinion, the superintendent has no sort of right to seek, and the mere seeking of which is a vile and insolent outrage upon the children and their parents.

We have had an opportunity of examining these two circulars, and we take this occasion to reproduce a few specimen queries which the teachers are expected to respond to, of course by questioning the children themselves or their parents, for naturally the teachers could not possibly speak of their own knowledge:

"Smoke cigarettes habitually?"
"Smoke cigarettes sometimes?"
"Attend theaters and parties frequently?"
"Father illiterate or nearly so?"
"Father lazy and improvident?"
"Father a drunkard?"
"Mother illiterate or nearly so?"
"Mother intemperate?"
"Other perceptible mental or bodily defect."
"Nature of this bodily or mental defect."
"Increase in measurement of chest since October 11, 1899."
"Increase in measurement around the hips since October 11, 1899."

I think this is the most remarkable circular that has ever been issued in a civilized community. It is an insult to every scholar in the schools and an outrage on every family. The man who caused any such document as this to be issued is not a proper man to have at the head of our school system, and I hope the proper committee of this House will take immediate action. An investigation should be started immediately. Congress is responsible for the school system of this District, and if this circular furnishes any basis for judging the qualifications of the head of the public-school system in this District, the sooner we have a change the better.

Porto Rico.

SPEECH
OF
HON. JAMES T. McCLEARY, OF MINNESOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 5, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11538) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy—

Mr. McCLEARY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: On the afternoon of February 28 last this House passed a bill for the relief of Porto Rico, reducing the tariff rates between that island and the United States by 85 per cent and turning the proceeds of the revenue collected at both ends of the line over for the benefit of the Porto Ricans.

That bill passed the House by a majority of 11—almost the exact Republican majority in the House—only 6 Republicans voting against it and 4 Democrats voting for it. Later on, slightly modified in detail, but identical in principle, and supplemented by the addition of a temporary form of government for Porto Rico, it passed the Senate.

Passed by both Houses and approved by the President, it is now the law of the land. In the coming campaign it will probably be one of the things discussed. I therefore avail myself of the latitude allowed in the present debate to present to the House a few facts, some of which, so far as I know, have not heretofore been brought to its attention.

In that bill two questions were involved: First, the constitutional right of Congress to lay and collect any tariff on goods between Porto Rico and the United States; and, second, the propriety of extending the help needed by Porto Rico in that way.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION STATED.

What is the constitutional question involved? It all hinges on the meaning of the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Under the Articles of Confederation, which was our form of government from 1781 to 1789, the General Government had no power to raise money by taxation. It had to depend upon the several States furnishing it with necessary funds. This arrangement worked very disastrously. So under our Constitution, which was put into operation in 1789, the very first power granted to Congress was the one above cited, under which it gets its authority to levy taxes for its own support.

It will be noted that the clause of the Constitution above quoted consists of three parts:

1. The grant of power expressed in the words, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises."

2. The purpose of this collection of money, expressed in the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

3. The limitation on the power thus granted, expressed in the words, "But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Our Democratic friends claim that as soon as Porto Rico came into our possession the island became a part of the United States and, as such, entitled to the same treatment as any other part of the United States; they claim that the Constitution ex proprio vigore—by its own force without the action of Congress—extends over national territory as soon as it is acquired; and they claim that, in view of the limitation in the last part of the constitutional provision above cited, Congress can not levy duties on goods coming from Porto Rico to New York any more than Congress could levy duties on goods going from Minnesota to New York.

Under the constitutional provision, "all duties * * * shall be uniform throughout the United States."

We claim that that provision applies only to the "United States" in its constitutional sense and when the duties levied are for the Treasury of the United States, and not otherwise.

We hold, therefore, that the limitation imposing equality of duties does not apply in the case in question for two reasons:

First. Because in the constitutional sense Porto Rico is not a part of the United States, but simply territory belonging to the United States.

Second. Because the money collected under the act is not to be used to "pay the debts or provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," but simply as a local tax levied and collected for the benefit of Porto Rico.

In this controversy, therefore, the first thing to do is to determine the meaning and scope of the term "United States" as used in the Constitution.

CONSTITUTIONAL MEANING OF "UNITED STATES."

In its usual, everyday, geographical sense the term "United States" includes, of course, all the territory of the nation. But in its constitutional sense the term "United States" means simply what it says, namely, "the States united."

It was "We, the people of the United States," who "ordained and established" the Constitution. Who were "we?" It was only the people of the States who were privileged to vote on the adoption of the Constitution. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution in 1788 we had, outside of the States themselves, the vast national domain between the Allegheny Mountains and the Mississippi River. A year before the adoption of the Constitution the part of this domain lying north of the Ohio River, and comprising the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, had been organized by the famous Ordinance of 1787 into the Northwest Territory, with a regular territorial government. But no resident of that Territory, or of the territory south of the Ohio, had any voice in "ordaining and establishing" the Constitution.

By the Constitution, all legislative powers therein granted are "vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives." Only States choose Senators and Representatives.

The Executive power under the Constitution is vested in the President of the United States. He is chosen by the people of the States, no resident of a Territory having any voice in the matter.

The judicial power of the United States is vested by the Constitution in "one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." It is further provided that "the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior." Evidently, then, the courts of the Territories, though they are established by Congress and though their judges are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, are not courts of the United States in the constitutional sense, because their judges serve only for a term of four years.

Elsewhere the Constitution says, "New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." And again it says, "The United States shall guarantee to each State in this Union a republican form of government." It is evident that the Constitution uses "Union" and "United States" as meaning the same thing, namely, the Union of the States, not including the Territories, whether organized or unorganized.

There was considerable question as to how many of the States would ratify the Constitution, so it was provided that the ratification of nine States should establish the Constitution for and among the States so ratifying. Eleven of the States ratified the Constitution within a year of its formulation. Rhode Island and North Carolina did not ratify it until after George Washington had been inaugurated as President; so at the time of his inauguration the Union consisted of only eleven States. These had ratified the Constitution and so they constituted at that time the United States of America.

The Constitution was ordained and ratified by the people of the States, and by them only can it be amended. The people of the Territories never have had any voice in the making, ratifying, amending, or operating of the Constitution.

The thirteenth amendment clearly shows the constitutional meaning of the term "United States." It says, "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction." Here, as elsewhere in the Constitution, "United States" means the States united; hence the necessity of adding the words "or any place subject to their jurisdiction" in order to exclude slavery from the Territories.

And when the Constitution says (Article IV, section 3) "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States," it distinctly separates the "territory" belonging to the United States from the Union itself and gives Congress full and unlimited power over such territory.

THE PORTO RICO TAX IS FOR MERELY LOCAL USES.

A good deal of valuable time has been wasted by the "constitutional lawyers" of the House, citing cases decided by the Supreme Court as to the interpretation of this clause of the Constitution. Practically all of the effort in this direction is simply "love's labor lost," for the cases cited were not relevant. They had to do with occasions when the money collected was to go into the National Treasury for national purposes. In that case the rule of uniformity would of course apply to all territory included within the United States.

One of the difficulties in getting the original States to unite was the fear of the large States entertained by small States. The small States were especially afraid that the large States might impose upon them an undue share of the general burden of expense. It was to allay that fear that the limitation above referred to was inserted in the Constitution.

Thus it is seen, as above stated, that this limitation is to apply only to the States of the Union and in relation to taxation for national purposes. But since Porto Rico is not a State, and since the taxation is for local and not for national purposes, the limitation does not apply to the case of Porto Rico.

THE SENATE'S EMPHATIC ACTION.

To test the Senate on the matter of its judgment as to whether or not the Constitution and laws extended to Porto Rico without action by Congress, Senator ALLEN of Nebraska proposed on March 16 last the following amendment to the bill for the relief of Porto Rico:

Provided, That the Constitution was by force of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain at the city of Paris, France, April 11, 1899, extended over the island of Porto Rico and its inhabitants.

On Senator ALLISON'S motion to lay the amendment on the table—and thus defeat it—the vote was as follows (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3176):

YEAS—36.

Allison,	Foraker,	Lodge,	Ross,
Baker,	Foster,	McBride,	Sewell,
Bard,	Gallinger,	McComas,	Shoup,
Beveridge,	Gear,	McCumber,	Simon,
Carter,	Hale,	McMillan,	Spooner,
Davis,	Hanna,	Penrose,	Thurston,
Deboe,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Warren.
Elkins,	Kean,	Pritchard,	Wellington,
Fairbanks,	Lindsay,	Quarles,	Wetmore.

NAYS—17.

Allen,	Chilton,	Harris,	Tillman,
Bacon,	Clark, Mont.	Kenney,	Turley.
Bate,	Clay,	McLaurin,
Berry,	Cockrell,	Morgan,
Butler,	Culberson,	Rawlins,

NOT VOTING—34.

Aldrich,	Hansbrough,	Mason,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Heitfeld,	Money,	Sullivan,
Caffery,	Hoar,	Nelson,	Taliaferro,
Chandler,	Jones, Ark.	Pettigrew,	Teller,
Clark, Wyo.	Jones, Nev.	Pettus,	Turner,
Cullom,	Kyle,	Platt, Conn.	Vest,
Daniel,	McEnery,	Platt, N. Y.	Wolcott.
Depew,	Mallory,	Proctor,
Frye,	Martin,	Scott,

Thus we see that by a vote of more than two to one the Senate decided against the proposition of Senator ALLEN. It will be noted that the vote was strictly on party lines, except that Senator LINDSAY of Kentucky probably the ablest lawyer on his side of the Chamber, voted with the Republicans.

"TREAT PORTO RICO AS WELL AS OTHER UNITED STATES TERRITORIES."

Some good people who favor immediate free trade for Porto Rico argue thus: "Porto Rico is certainly a part of the United States as that term is used in its geographical sense, whether it is so in the constitutional sense or not. It should, therefore, be treated as well as any other United States territory—as well as Arizona or New Mexico or Alaska, for instance." To every word of which we say emphatically, Amen.

And now, having agreed that Porto Rico should be treated as well as any other United States territory, let us devote a few minutes to finding out just what that implies.

From figures furnished me by the Treasury Department, and which I have here in my hand, showing the amounts collected by the United States in Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Alaska in 1899, and from figures furnished me by the clerk of the House Committee on Appropriations showing national expenditures in those Territories for the same year, I have prepared and submit herewith a table showing the sums collected in 1899 in each of those Territories and turned into the Treasury of the United States, and the sums paid out for the respective Territories during that year from the Treasury of the United States.

	Paid into United States Treasury.	Returned to Territory.	Profit to the United States Treasury.
Arizona	$221,653.60	$49,650.00	$172,003.60
New Mexico	154,606.30	59,400.00	95,206.30
Oklahoma	587,461.48	44,150.00	543,311.48
Alaska	1,190,282.80	263,150.00	927,132.80
Total	2,154,004.18	416,350.00	1,737,654.18

It will thus be seen that out of every $5 collected in the four Territories named less than $1 goes back to be expended in those Territories. In other words, sir, over 80 per cent of the money collected by the United States in those Territories remains in the Treasury of the United States, or is expended for the general purposes of the Union itself—so much clear profit out of those Territories, as it were. Is that the way that the advocates of immediate free trade for Porto Rico would like to have us deal with that island in its distress? They say that they do; but it can not be that they understand what they are urging upon us.

TERRITORIES PAY THEIR OWN LOCAL EXPENSES.

The number of misstatements concerning the act for the relief of Porto Rico and its operation are not more wonderful than the high standing of those who make them. Here, for example, is the statement made on the floor of the Senate by a distinguished United States Senator:

> The theory and practice have always been for the General Government itself to pay all the necessary expenses of the Territory. Why not raise the revenue as to Porto Rico the same as it is raised everywhere, cove[r] it into the United States Treasury, and, as heretofore, if an appropriation is necessary for schools, for roads, or for administration, or to alleviate distress, do it by means of a direct appropriation?

Such a statement from such a source is simply amazing. I know the Senator too well to think for one moment that he meant to state an untruth, and yet his statement—which will no doubt be widely quoted—is utterly misleading. What are the facts?

The people of a Territory pay taxes for the support of the General Government precisely the same as do the people of the States. If a resident in New Mexico makes cigars, for example, he pays the same internal-revenue taxes as are paid by a resident of Minnesota. In both cases the money collected goes into the National Treasury. In neither case does any of it go back to the State or to the Territory for the building of roads or the support of schools therein. Why, sir, the very purpose of organizing a Territory is to give the people therein control and management of such purely local matters. And the expenses for these local improvements—wagon roads, bridges, schools, the care of the poor and other unfortunates, and other purely local affairs—are paid, in the Territories as in the States, by direct taxation of the persons and property therein.

Not a dollar is appropriated from the National Treasury for such things in the Territories any more than for similar things in the States. The only money that goes from the National Treasury into either States or Territories, with very rare exceptions, is that which goes to pay for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the construction of Federal buildings, the payment of postmasters and other Federal officials, and such other expenditures as are Federal in their nature. The only exception, therefore, that we are making in the case of Porto Rico is in treating her better than we have ever before treated any Territory of the United States!

ANOTHER SAMPLE "ARGUMENT."

Another sample of the argument that is made for immediate free trade is the following, from a supposed petition of Porto Ricans, which was used recently, among others, by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]:

> We recognize the fact that a revenue to support the insular government would be necessary; but we are decidedly of opinion that the better method for raising that revenue will be by internal taxation, for the following reasons:
>
> First. Because by that system no restriction will be placed on our commerce with the United States.
>
> Second. Because the adoption of that system will be as simple in operation here as it is in the United States.
>
> In considering the amount of revenue needed for this island, we beg to submit the following calculation, which, after due consideration, we believe can be realized.

There are annually produced in Porto Rico the following:

1,300,000 gallons rum, which at $1.10 per gallon	$1,430,000
250,000,000 cigarettes, which at $1.50 per thousand	375,000
120,000,000 cigars, which at $3.60 per thousand	432,000
	2,237,000
Estimate the entire special license tax as nominal at	15,000
This will give us revenue total	2,252,000
One-third of that equals	750,666
A fair estimate of the annual cost of administration	600,000
Add for interest and sinking fund on bonds to be issued	150,000
Total required	750,000

Even with free trade with the United States there would be an additional revenue of at least $300,000 annually from customs duties on goods coming here from foreign countries.

If Congress will authorize Porto Rico to issue $2,000,000 of forty-year 5 per cent bonds, the above provides for them, viz:

For interest	$100,000
For sinking fund	50,000
Total	150,000

Therefore we infer that it will be unnecessary to adopt for this island the full internal-revenue rates of the United States. One-third of those rates will give ample receipts to cover all the above.

It will be noted that here, as everywhere else in the free-trade argument, the issuing of bonds is a necessary accompaniment. How natural the relation—free trade and bond issues!

It will be noted that the writers of the petition seem to be utterly unaware of the fact that, with our fiscal system extended to the island, every dollar collected in Porto Rico from internal revenue and from duties on imports from other countries would go into the Treasury of the United States for the use of the nation as a whole! Not one dollar of the money, above referred to by the petitioners as money which they would be able to raise, would, under our fiscal system, go to them for local uses.

As I have said, every dollar of it would go into the National Treasury, and none of it would go back to the island, except the small amount required to pay the salaries of the United States judges and other United States officers, and such as might be expended on the rivers and harbors of the island. After grinding themselves down to pay the $2,252,000 a year of internal revenue, indicated in the above table, the people of Porto Rico would still have before them the present problem of how to raise in their impoverished condition the money needed for schools, roads, municipal expenses, and so on.

The above figures, so far from showing that the people of Porto Rico could raise from internal revenue the funds required to pay the expenses of the island, simply serve to show the amount of the useless burden which immediate free trade would impose upon them. The figures show in part the hardship to the island of immediate free trade.

SOME PRECEDENTS FOR THE ACTION RELATIVE TO PORTO RICO.

It has been asserted by gentlemen whose names carry great weight that our action in not immediately extending to Porto Rico our fiscal system is "unprecedented." Surely, sir, that must have been a slip of the tongue. No American who knows his country's history could soberly make such a statement. Let us look into the matter a moment.

The first territory acquired by the United States from a foreign power was Louisiana. This vast territory was purchased from France in 1803. The treaty was ratified October 21, 1803, and ten days later an act of Congress was passed authorizing the President to take possession of the newly acquired territory. Section 2 of that act reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Under the authority thus granted to the Executive, Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, sent a letter of instructions to our collector of customs in the Mississippi district, a part of which letter was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 14, 1803.

H. B. TRIST, Esq., Collr, Fort Adams.

SIR: The President of the United States having decided that until otherwise provided for, you shall immediately after the occupation of New Orleans by the United States, exercise the powers heretofore vested in the administrator or Collector, Treasurer of the Revenues at New Orleans, and authority for that purpose is transmitted to you by this mail. You will therefore be pleased immediately to proceed to New Orleans, appointing a deputy to act during your absence in the Mississippi district, or remaining at Fort Adams yourself, you will appoint a deputy to proceed to New Orleans.

In the exercise of this temporary authority, it is impossible to prescribe from this Department any precise rules of conduct and much must necessarily depend on your zeal & judgment, on both which perfect confidence is placed.

You will only be pleased to observe—

1st. That the taxes & duties to be collected under your direction are precisely the same which by the existing laws or regulations of Louisiana were demandable under the Spanish government at the time of obtaining possession.

2d. That in those taxes & duties are included specially those on imports, exports, transfer of shipping, &c., which were collected under those officers whose powers are vested in you & generally all other taxes and duties which made part of the general revenue of the province.

* * * * * * *

10th. That until otherwise provided for, the same duties are to be collected on the importation of goods, in the Mississippi district from New Orleans and vice versa, as heretofore.

I am very resp y Sir Yr obt Sert—

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Later, on February 24, 1804, an act of Congress was passed providing that on March 25, 1804, the collection of duties on goods coming into the United States from the territory acquired from France and on goods going into that territory from the United States should cease. On February 27, 1804, Secretary Gallatin wrote to the collector of customs at New Orleans another letter of instructions, from which I take the following paragraph:

As to the period of time preceding the 25 day of March 1804 on which the above mentioned act commences to operate, I have only to observe that in conformity with the Spanish laws heretofore in force, articles exported before that day from New Orleans to the United States, and to any other country, Spain excepted, were liable to pay the export duty; that articles imported before that day into New Orleans from any country whatever and even from the United States unless deposited under the privilege of deposit, were liable to pay the import duty.

It should be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that Thomas Jefferson was then President of the United States. The Democrats of those days did not seem to think that our fiscal system extended to newly acquired territory except by act of Congress. Calhounism had not yet been born.

THE CASE OF TEXAS.

Now let us take the case of Texas. The joint resolution for the annexation of Texas was passed on March 1, 1845. But it was not until the next session of Congress, on December 29, 1845, that an act was passed extending over Texas the laws of the United States. In the meantime the Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, issued an order, of which the following is a part:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 29, 1845.

To Collectors and other Officers of the Customs.

The President of the United States has received official intelligence, that the Convention, as well as the Congress of the Republic of Texas, have sanctioned and adopted the joint resolution of the Congress of the United States of the first of March last, for the admission of Texas as a State of the Union.

By the 24th section of the act of Congress of the United States of the 30th August, 1842, it is provided: "That it shall be the duty of all Collectors and other Officers of the Customs to execute and carry into effect all instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the execution of the Revenue laws; and in case any difficulty shall arise as to the true construction or meaning of any part of such Revenue laws, the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall be conclusive and binding upon all such Collectors and other Officers of the Customs." In conformity with this provision of the law, it becomes my duty to communicate the views and instructions of this Department upon various important questions arising out of the new relations between Texas and the United States.

First. Although there is now a solemn compact obligatory upon both parties for the admission of Texas as a State of the Union, yet until further action of the Congress of the United States upon this subject, and instructions founded thereon from this Department, you will collect duties, as heretofore, upon all the imports from Texas into the United States.

A similar question arose in relation to exports from Florida into New Orleans in 1819, when it was decided by the Treasury Department "that all goods which have been, or may be, imported from Pensacola, before an act of Congress shall be passed, erecting it into a collection district, and authorizing the appointment of an officer to reside thereat, for the purpose of superintending the collection of duties, will be liable to duty."

At that time James K. Polk, a Democrat, was President of the United States. And yet no one dreamed in those days of claiming that our Constitution and laws extended to newly acquired territory until expressly so extended by act of Congress. Calhounism had not even then been born.

As I said on a previous occasion, the Calhoun doctrine that the Constitution extends ex proprio vigore to newly acquired territory was not invented until 1847, when was begun the struggle to extend the institution of slavery to the free territory recently acquired from Mexico. That doctrine was shot to death in the civil war. It was "of few days and full of sorrow."

OUR CONSTITUTION AND LAWS ONLY RECENTLY EXTENDED OVER HAWAII.

Passing over other illustrations showing that there is nothing "unprecedented" in not extending at once our fiscal laws over Porto Rico, I beg leave to remind gentlemen that, although we acquired Hawaii two years ago, our laws were not extended over Hawaii until a few weeks ago.

I hold here in my hand a copy of the joint resolution, approved July 7, 1898, which annexed the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. Let me read parts of it:

Whereas the government of the republic of Hawaii having, in due form, signified its consent, in the manner provided by its constitution, to cede absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all rights of sovereignty of whatsoever kind in and over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, and also to cede and transfer to the United States the absolute fee and ownership of all public, government, or crown lands, public buildings or edifices, ports, harbors, military equipment, and all other public property of every kind and description belonging to the government of the Hawaiian Islands, together with every right and appurtenance thereunto appertaining: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies be, and they are hereby, annexed as a part of the territory of the United States, and are subject to the sovereign dominion thereof, and that all and singular the property and rights hereinbefore mentioned are vested in the United States of America.

The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition: Provided, That all revenue from or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States, or may be assigned for the use of the local government, shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes.

Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct; and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill the vacancies so occasioned.

* * * * * * *

Until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States custom laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged.

THE PORTO RICO ACT NEITHER ANOMALOUS NOR UNPRECEDENTED.

Thus we see, Mr. Speaker, that all through our history it has been the practice of the Government to allow a period of time to elapse after the acquirement of territory before extending over that territory the Constitution and laws of the United States. The length of that time has always been fixed by Congress. It is therefore not true that the plan embodied in the bill for levying temporarily for the benefit of Porto Rico a duty on goods carried between that island and the United States is either "anomalous" or "unprecedented." On the other hand, it follows the precedents of our entire national history. No Jefferson or Jackson Democrat can object to it, for it follows the practice of Jefferson in Louisiana and of Jackson in Florida. No Lincoln Republican can find fault with it, for it follows the principle for which Lincoln contended and on which he was elected President.

PROFESSOR SCHURMAN'S MISQUOTATION.

It is very easy to misquote. Indeed, it requires effort to quote correctly. But when an error in quotation may seriously mislead a large number of people, it would seem that a man of high character and position would feel bound to exercise great care to quote correctly.

Professor Schurman, late president of the Philippine Commission, is a gentleman who deservedly stands high in the respect of the American people. Any statement of his carries great weight with us all. It is especially incumbent on such a man, talking at a critical time about an important matter, to be exceedingly careful when he ascribes to a person in authority certain words to be sure that he quotes exactly.

In a letter to a personal friend, which has found its way into print and which has been used in this debate, Professor Schurman is quoted as saying:

DEAR SIR: I agree with you that the United States is under obligation to extend its tariff laws to the island of Porto Rico. But I can not accept your contention that this obligation is derived from the Constitution, which, in my judgment, does not of its own force apply to annexed territories. The obligation is moral, not constitutional. As the President said, with equal truth and felicity, it is "our plain duty."

We are bound to this course by solemn promises. The supreme and irresistible reason for removing all customs barriers between the United States and Porto Rico is the promise made by General Miles, when first landing American forces on the island, that the Porto Ricans should enjoy the same rights, privileges, and immunities as the people of the United States. On this understanding the Porto Ricans accepted American sovereignty, not only without opposition, but with joyful trust and confidence.

The present issue is simply this: Shall we repudiate, or shall we fulfill, the national engagements? Shall this great Republic break faith with the little island of Porto Rico? Having secured the fruits of General Miles's promise, shall we now renounce the promise?

The American people will not tolerate any faltering with solemn obligations. Recognizing the national good faith as the nation's chiefest good, they will condemn any violation of it as the blackest crime.

That is the language of a good and true man. In it he voices the sentiment of his countrymen. They do not propose that the national faith shall be broken at any time, in any way, to any person. And the weaker and more helpless the one to whom the promise is made, the more scrupulously must that promise be kept, if it is duly made by one authorized to promise in the name of the United States.

It behooves us, then to inquire what promise was made, by whom it was made, under what circumstances and by what authority, and what may be inferred therefrom.

WHAT GENERAL MILES ACTUALLY SAID.

Let us see first what General Miles really did say. Here is the text of his proclamation:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Ponce, Porto Rico, July 28, 1898.

To the Inhabitants of Porto Rico:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity its military forces have come to occupy the island of Porto Rico. They come bearing the banner of freedom inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our country and yours, and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance.

They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold. Hence, the first effect of this occupation will be the immediate release from your former political relations, and it is hoped a cheerful acceptance of the Government of the United States. The chief object of the American military forces will be to overthrow the armed authority of Spain and to give to the people of your beautiful island the largest measure of liberty consistent with this military occupation.

We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries has been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. It is not our purpose to interfere with any existing laws and customs that are wholesome and beneficial to your people so long as they conform to the rules of military administration of order and justice. This is not a war of devastation, but one to give to all within the control of its military and naval forces the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General Commanding United States Army.

WHAT GENERAL MILES'S PROCLAMATION PROMISED.

What General Miles really promised was, therefore, not as Professor Schurman alleged, "the same rights, privileges, and immunities as the people of the United States," but—what is a very different matter—"the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government."

What are some of these "immunities and blessings?" Let me enumerate a few of them:

Immunity from arbitrary arrest. Under the Spanish régime a person could be arrested without cause; he could be cast into prison and held there without trial and without opportunity to communicate with friends who might act in his behalf.

Immunity from "star-chamber" trials. Under Spanish rule trials of accused persons were in whole or in part secret.

Immunity from involuntary confinement without cause. Prior to our advent into Porto Rico the writ of habeas corpus was unknown there.

Immunity from press censorship. There was no freedom of the press until after we took possession of the island.

Immunity from unwarranted searches and seizures and other immunities and blessings enumerated in the early amendments to our Constitution.

The immunities which go to make up liberty of person, of thought, and of expression—blessings which Porto Ricans had never enjoyed—these are the "immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government" which General Miles promised. That promise will be abundantly redeemed. It is already being redeemed.

WHAT GENERAL MILES DID NOT PROMISE.

General Miles did not promise all of even the "immunities" enjoyed by our citizens, and he did not promise any of the "rights and privileges" enjoyed by American citizens. The immunities which the Porto Ricans can enjoy they shall have. But there are rights and privileges which will come to them only after considerable time has elapsed, if ever. For example, the most intelligent European coming to live among us is required to reside in this country at least five years before he is admitted to citizenship. Should a people, 85 per cent of whom can neither read nor write, be given all of those rights and privileges at once?

General Miles knows too well the institutions of his country to promise the Porto Ricans all the rights, privileges, and immunities of American citizenship. And Professor Schurman should know them well enough and have sufficient respect for General Miles not to put into his mouth such an absurd promise. A promise of "the same rights, privileges, and immunities as the people of the United States" would be a promise to give Porto Rico immediate statehood, with the right to vote and the privilege of holding any office of profit or trust under the Government. General Miles knows that it is one of the fundamental principles of our Government that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power, and that it is for Congress and not for him to determine the civil status of the Porto Ricans.

In the language of the treaty with Spain, under which we acquired our new island possessions:

ARTICLE IX. * * * The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

General Miles did not use the language which Professor Schurman ascribes to him, nor did the language used by him have at all the meaning so often, on the strength of Professor Schurman's statement, given to it. General Miles knew that Uncle Sam would treat the Porto Ricans justly and kindly, giving them immunity from many of the practices from which they had suffered and dowering them with blessings characteristic of our institutions. But the General did not presume to arrogate to even the Commanding General of our forces the powers and prerogatives which Congress holds in trust for the people of the United States.

Nor is Professor Schurman any more fortunate in his statement that "on this understanding" the Porto Ricans accepted American sovereignty. They simply accepted the inevitable as gracefully as they could, and the pleasure manifested was simply because they believed from what they knew of Uncle Sam that he would treat them better than they had been treated. And all their reasonable expectations are being and will be realized.

As I have stated, I think that Professor Schurman owed it to himself and to the American people, who hold him in such high regard, to be more careful in quoting General Miles. We should remember, however, that he made the statement in a personal letter written to a friend and not intended for publication. He is probably chagrined to find that the letter has been published.

REDUCTION IN TAXES AND EXPENSES.

It is not an easy task to reform conditions that have been forming for centuries. But considering the brevity of our occupancy of the island and the difficulties to be encountered, we have accomplished a great deal.

From the report of General Davis, military governor of Porto Rico, I take the following table, showing the taxes and expenditures of the island during the last two years of the Spanish rule:

	1897-98.	1898-99.
RECEIPTS.
Budget of the island:	Pesos.	Pesos.
1. Land and other taxes	576,200.00	901,200.00
2. Customs	3,132,900.00	3,377,900.00
3. Taxes on monopolies	184,200.00	312,200.00
4. State property	9,300.00	9,300.00
5. Contingent receipts	96,900.00	181,900.00
Budget of provincial deputation:
Total of receipts	1,217,700.00	324,592.89
Total for both budgets	5,157,200.00	5,117,092.89
EXPENDITURES.
Budget of the island:
1. General liabilities	498,501.60	498,501.60
2. Justice	423,818.80	454,773.80
3. War	1,252,377.76	1,252,377.76
4. Finance	260,800.00	225,825.00
5. Navy	222,668.20	222,668.20
6. State }	878,175.83	592,653.83
7. Interior }		1,210,527.12
Budget of provincial deputation:
1. Deputation provincial	221,261.48	227,772.89
2. State	210,254.00	.....
3. Interior	788,184.52	96,820.00
Total for both budgets	4,754,042.19	4,781,920.20

In our short period of control we have struck out of those expenditures the general liabilities, which had been going to Madrid, 498,501.60 pesos; the charges for the army, 1,252,378 pesos; for the navy, 222,668 pesos; for the clergy, 197,945 pesos. This is a total reduction of 2,171,492.60 pesos. And the budget of the coming year contains further reductions.

As testified by Mr. Henry G. Curtis, a member of the insular commission (Senate hearings, pages 95 and 96), "In the town of San Juan we found that they [salaries] cost $362,000 by the last budget—that for the year ending June, 1899. By our plan we will save $148,000 a year and give them a better government. At Caguas [a town of 5,000 people] we save $35,000 a year." These are samples of improvement in administration general throughout the island. And although expenses have been thus cut down, we are expending $119,709.30 more for education in the island than last year.

In his report on the island, General Davis says that under Spanish rule there were 21 officials who received salaries exceeding $4,000 a year, against 2 under our military government; 48 received salaries exceeding $3,000 a year, against 17 under our rule; and so on.

The reduction in customs rates can be readily seen by the following tabular statement of the rates per hundred kilograms, under Spanish rule, the rates under our temporary military government, and the rates in the act as finally passed:

	Duty under Spanish rule.	Under military government.	Under act as passed.
Wheat flour	$4.10	Free.	Free.
Wheat	3.25	$0.60	$0.09
Corn	3.25	.18	.027
Corn meal	4.10	Free.	Free.
Pork	4.60	Free.	Free.
Lard	4.60	1.70	.255
Hulled rice	2.88	.60	.09
Jerked beef	2.45	2.50	.375
Codfish	1.00	Free.	Free.
Salt fish	1.00	.50	.075

It will be noted that food products are admitted free, or nearly so. So are clothes and medicines.

THE METHOD OF TAXATION MADE LESS BURDENSOME.

But the reduction in the amount of taxation and expenses are not the only improvements made under our control. The methods of collecting the taxes have been improved and rendered less burdensome. In order to appreciate this we must take a brief glance, at least, at the methods of taxation under Spanish rule. From the report of Mr. H. K. Carroll, the special agent sent to investigate the condition of the island, I take the following:

Customs were levied both on imports and exports. There was a special tax on the loading and unloading of freight, the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, and transitory duties of 10 per cent on duties on imports. * * *

No kind of business seems to have escaped the sharp eye of the State experts. Public baths, balls, and concerts; periodicals, including daily papers; laundries, funeral agencies, gymnasiums, livery stables, all kinds of industries, even the manufacture of artificial feet, were taxed.

Blacksmiths paid, according to the town in which their business was conducted, from 12 to 3 pesos, architects from 36 to 6, dentists and pharmacists the same, physicians and surgeons 48 to 12, nurses and midwives 18 to 5, veterinarians 15 to 5, barbers 8 to 2, lawyers, registers of property, and notaries 48 to 16, while carpenters, cabinetmakers, bookbinders, florists, tailors, milliners or dressmakers, professors of music and languages, painters, etc., paid according to their class and grade. * * *

Day laborers were assessed on the basis of one-third of the value of a half year's wages. * * *

The earnings of merchants, manufacturers, and other producers were subject to a tax of 12½ per cent or more, according to the financial exigencies of the treasuries, provincial and municipal.

If a merchant's income were valued at $10,000 a year, he would pay in direct taxes $1,250. He would also pay for his cedula or personal passport, the amount of which was graduated, according to personal means, from 12 cents up to $25 or more. He would pay a direct tax on his residence and furniture, and on his horses and other live stock, if not used for labor. If he were just starting in business, he would pay a patente or tax for the privilege. * * *

Articles of common use, such as rice, flour, corn, charcoal, wines, etc., not only paid heavy import duties, but were subject, with fresh beef, milk, and sugar produced in the island, to a consumo tax at the gates of the municipalities.

Flour, which had paid a duty of $4 at the custom-house per hundred kilos, paid at the city gates $2.50 consumo tax, or a total of $6.50, which was at the rate of about $3 per hundredweight. Rice, the common article of diet, paid $2.70 import duty and $1 consumo tax. Fresh beef paid a consumo tax of $5 a hundred kilos or 220 pounds. This was in addition to the head tax paid the city by the slaughterer.

* * * * * * *

As between Spanish and Porto Rican producers and manufacturers the latter had no chance. Nor were the needs of Porto Rican consumers, however urgent they might appear from the insular point of view, treated as worthy of serious attention. Indispensable articles of food not produced in the island had to come in a roundabout way through the hands of the merchants in Spain or pay enormous duties if imported direct from other countries.

The principal consumo taxes on food, fuel, and drink have been abolished. All export duties have been discontinued. The use of stamped paper and all stamp taxes have been abolished. The fisheries have been made free. Notarial fees have been greatly reduced.

In the light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, are we not keeping the promise made by General Miles?

SOME OF THE NEEDS OF PORTO RICO.

And now let us consider briefly the condition and needs of the island.

That was a very suggestive statement which was made by one of the Porto Ricans to our commissioner, Mr. Carroll: "With what has been collected for the making of roads in the four hundred years of Spanish domination we could have all our roads paved with silver." And yet, sir, in all the island there are only about 150 miles of wagon road. Another Porto Rican testified that from June to October, inclusive, a journey the length of the island, from Maunabo to Mayaguez, about 85 miles, costs more than one from Porto Rico to New York. To use his own words:

After four centuries of existence we are almost cut off from intercommunication. Of our internal roads it is best to say nothing; no one dares journey by them. Even in traveling on foot one's ribs are not safe. There are towns where no mail is delivered for five or six days when the rivers rise, and neither the public-works department nor private enterprise has thought of spanning the rivers by footbridges even. With a thousand obstacles and expenses, we have to carry our produce to market and bring back our provisions the same way, adding to the expenses of freight those of "consumos," which keeps up the already excessive prices and causes general discontent. The want of activity of the Porto Ricans forcibly condemned to inertia by want of means of travel is not to be wondered at.

In the Senate hearings Mr. Curtis, a member of the insular commission, testified as follows (page 86):

We found not a single schoolhouse on the island which had been built for a schoolhouse and but one owned by a school district. The schoolhouses used were rented and were generally shacks which belonged, many times, to the teachers and were occupied by them as a family residence or in some cases as a store. * * * They were public schools, yet with the understanding of the right of the teacher to charge or collect from those able to pay a tuition fee. * * * Very few of the children attended. Those that did and those we found in the schools were bright little fellows, anxious to learn. Each had to furnish his own seat, little bits of boxes and chairs brought by themselves. The school books were very scant.

As to the condition of the people, Mr. Curtis says, same page:

We found the population of the island—some of them—quite wealthy and well-to-do and living in fine style. * * * Only a very few of them speak English, but their education is good. However, the most of them have given little attention to the subject of government. * * * The other portion of the people perhaps might be classified in two parts—the small owners of little patches of land and the teamsters, who do freighting and such, and keepers of small stores, and then those who simply depend on day labor.

They are mostly ignorant of everything except their particular work. You can not get them into conversation about any public matters, for they do not know anything about them.

What American can read this series of pictures without feeling an interest in those people, who, after four hundred years of Spanish rule, come to us in the providence of God in this condition? And who does not realize the seriousness of the problem and the sanctity of the opportunity that lies before us?

THE PRESENT ARRANGEMENT THE KINDEST POSSIBLE.

As I said on a previous occasion when addressing the House on this subject, we had three alternatives to choose from in providing the means with which to meet the public expenses of the island: We could donate the necessary funds from the National Treasury; or we could establish a local government and permit it to issue bonds; or we could arrange to make the island self-sustaining from the beginning.

Being in the receipt day by day of urgent requests from citizens of my State for a reduction of the "war taxes" levied by the National Government, I could not see my way to donate funds from the Treasury to pay the expenses of the island. Our own people have some rights in this matter that must be respected. Besides, people who live in a warm climate like that of Porto Rico need no encouragement to become lazy and dependent.

Inasmuch as Porto Rico came to us without a public debt, we naturally disliked to inaugurate our control of the island by the issuance of bonds. Moreover, while the needs of the island were urgent, there was at the time the bill originally passed the House no government in Porto Rico and consequently no authority which could properly issue the bonds.

The third alternative, that of putting the island on the basis of self-support, being the only alternative remaining, the problem then became how to raise the money in the way least burdensome to the people of the island.

While the island had no public debt when it came to us, the private or personal debts were and are enormous. Many of the little farms are so heavily mortgaged that even to put a tax on them would jar them out of the hands of their owners. We could not bear to think of doing that. We wanted to give those poor fellows every possible chance to recover. Twice by order of the President have the mortgages been extended, once for a year and again for six months. As General Davis said in his testimony before the Senate committee, "A general system of taxation to produce revenue enough to carry on the government would amount to confiscation."

In the Senate hearing on this subject Senator NELSON of Minnesota asked General Davis: "Have you any system of taxation akin to our internal-revenue system?" To which General Davis answered: "Only on two articles—one, the liquor tax, of which I have spoken, of 3 cents a liter, and the other a tax on matches, the manufacture of matches." To have imposed upon them our internal-revenue system would have thus been to treat them worse than Spain treated them and would have made rebels of them.

There remained, then, only one thing to do, and that was to raise the revenue so far as possible by customs duties. As will be seen by the table given a few minutes ago, the bulk of the funds for the expenses of the island had been raised for many years by customs duties. The people were accustomed to that kind of taxation and their affairs were adjusted to it. Besides, the bulk of it was and is paid by the wealthy, the poor not using imported articles to any great extent. The poor live largely on the tropical fruits which grow there in such abundance. Children up to 8 years of age go naked. People never wear many clothes. Three-fourths of the people never in their lives wear shoes or stockings.

To sum up on this point, free trade would have freed the Porto Ricans from customs taxes, but it would have imposed upon them our internal-revenue taxes, the proceeds of which would have gone into the National Treasury, and then it would have been necessary for them to raise by direct taxation the funds necessary to defray their governmental expenses. This, as General Davis said, would have amounted to confiscation of their property.

On the other hand, with the small customs duties levied under the act, the Porto Ricans escape entirely our internal-revenue taxation, which would have made "moonshiners" and rebels of them; and they escape entirely direct taxation of their property, which would in many cases have amounted to confiscation.

Our plan gave them one small, usual, easily carried tax; the other plan would have put upon them two heavy, unusual, burdensome taxes.

We believe that we adopted the plan kindest to them and wisest for us. And I propose now to show that it is the most satisfactory plan to the people of Porto Rico themselves.

WHAT THE PEOPLE OF PORTO RICO THEMSELVES THINK.

None of the Porto Ricans in this city, except the lobby which came here in the interest of the men who own the sugar and tobacco now stored in the warehouses of Porto Rico, wanted immediate free trade. Those who were consulted were unanimous in their opinion that the small duty proposed in the House bill, and which saves the people of Porto Rico from having to carry the burden of our internal-revenue system and from direct taxation on their property, is kinder and better for Porto Rico than immediate free trade would be.

And now let us see what the people of Porto Rico say when talking among themselves. Here in my hand I hold a copy of the San Juan News of March 3, 1900. As its name implies, this paper is published at San Juan, the capital of Porto Rico. Its editor is Mr. Hobart S. Bird, formerly of Wisconsin. Mr. Bird is a Democrat, a free-trade, free-silver Democrat at that, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. MINOR] advises me. So Mr. Bird will hardly be accused of using his columns to sustain the action of a Republican Administration. And Mr. Bird's own views as to the proper policy to be pursued may be seen from his "platform" here at the head of his editorial columns, which is as follows:

First. Free trade with the United States.
Second. Territorial government.
Third. Good roads.

Here on page 1 of the paper I find over a column of matter giving the substance of interviews with the leading business men of San Juan on the bill which passed the House on February 28, reducing the present tariff rates between Porto Rico and the United States by 85 per cent. Let me read a portion of this matter to show what the leading business men of Porto Rico said on this subject when talking among themselves:

BUSINESS MEN ARE PLEASED—THINK THE 15 PER CENT TARIFF SATISFACTORY FOR ISLAND—THE GENERAL OPINION IS THAT THE EXTERNAL REVENUE IS BETTER THAN LAYING HEAVY TAXES—WHAT PROMINENT BUSINESS MEN AND SAN JUAN MERCHANTS SAY OF THE WAYS AND MEANS BILL.

By interviewing a large percentage of the prominent bankers and business men of San Juan the News is able to state that the consensus of opinion here is that the passing of the Porto Rico tariff bill will be the signal for renewed prosperity on the island.

For the last four or five months the financial condition of Porto Rico has been very critical. Money has been extremely scarce, and business transactions have been growing fewer and fewer. Men desirous of borrowing money to carry on some business enterprise, even though they were of acknowledged integrity, were unable to raise the desired amount. Men who needed a few hundred dollars to consummate their plans were forced to give up in despair because the necessary money was not forthcoming.

* * * * * * *

The passing of the Ways and Means bill has relieved the tension. The business men feel confident that the Senate will follow the example of Congress and rule the 15 per cent of the Dingley rate. There is now a feeling of certainty. Men know what are to be the duties on goods and what money will bring.

The majority of business men think that the 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff duty is preferable to free trade with a high internal revenue. They say that so long as the proceeds from the tariff are to go toward educating the Porto Rican children, cleansing the cities, and improving the roads, it is better to have the duty than not. Even if there were free trade, it is not at all certain that the consumers of the island would be benefited. The wholesale dealers might place a lower price on their goods, but it is highly improbable that the retail dealers would offer their articles cheaper.

HOW IT STRIKES SAN JUAN.

Mr. George S. Latimer, of the firm of Latimer & Fernandez, believes that 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff will be better than free trade. He said to a News reporter:

"I am pleased to have this matter of customs tariffs so nearly settled. It will bring about a great change for the better in the welfare of the island. The great trouble has been that business men have felt the uncertainty which has been prevalent because of the trade question. Now that the American government is definitely known, the present tension will be relieved and business will begin to boom."

Mr. Andros Crosas, when interviewed on the subject, said:

"I have talked with a number of business men on the tariff bill, and I can tell you that they all are delighted to have the question so nearly settled. The uncertainty which has recently prevailed has ruined the business of the island."

Mr. Townes, of the Porto Rican American Tobacco Company: "We have never shipped any tobacco because we could not afford to ship under its tariff. As soon as we get the new factory up we will ship under the new 15 per cent tariff."

A. Berg said: "The 15 per cent tariff is a good thing."

Mr. Arnold, of the Colonial Bank, said: "Personally I should rather have had 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff. Fifteen per cent will not be enough for the needs of the island. Still, the main thing is to have this tariff question settled, and I am pleased to have had Congress pass favorably on the bill. Goods have been held back all over the island waiting for this tariff question to be settled. Now there will be a great deal of sugar and tobacco shipped which has been stored up."

De Ford & Co. are also of the opinion that 25 per cent would have been better for the interests of the people at large. They are, however, pleased with the 15 per cent bill, and believe it will, to some extent, relieve the present hard times.

CONCLUSION.

"Civis Romanus sum"—I am a Roman citizen. That, Mr. Speaker, was the proudest boast of antiquity. But prouder still is the boast of him who can say to-day, "I am an American citizen." Vaster in area, greater in population, richer in natural resources and accumulated wealth, more potent for good in the world than the Roman Empire in its palmiest days is the great Republic in which it is our good fortune to live.

Under the Roman system, though citizenship was very extensive, it was only by going to the imperial city itself that a citizen could participate in the government of the empire. The principle of representation had not yet been discovered or invented. But in this country the people of every State in the Union can participate in the government of the Republic through their right to share in the selection of President and the Senators and Representatives in Congress.

With us every campaign is an education. In 1892 the great question was the fiscal policy of the country. In 1896 it was the question of the standard of value. In 1898 everyone was studying geography. This year all of these subjects will be reviewed, with the addition of the study of our great charter—the American Constitution—its history, nature, and applications. These are great questions, worthy the candid consideration of a great people.

Upon the wisdom of the people in deciding aright the questions arising will much of their own weal depend. For the sake of themselves and their children, for the sake of the institutions under which we have prospered so wondrously, it is vitally necessary that the consideration of all pending questions be in the spirit of calm deliberation. The man who uses epithets and appeals to passion and prejudice confesses thereby that he has a bad case. The man who would rather be consistent than right is not a safe counselor.

Mr. Speaker, I have faith in the American people. I have faith in our institutions. I believe that this nation, the highest product of civilization, has been predestined to a great work for the world, and I believe that it will do that work under the guidance of Him who assigned it the duty and who holds the destiny of nations in the hollow of His hand. [Applause.]

Statues of Benton and Blair.

REMARKS

HON. STEPHEN B. ELKINS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, May 19, 1900.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolutions:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 4, 1899.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the State of Missouri for providing and furnishing statues of Thomas Hart Benton, a deceased person, who has been a citizen thereof and illustrious for his historic renown and for distinguished civic services, and of Francis Preston Blair, a deceased person, who has been a citizen thereof, and illustrious for his historic renown and for distinguished civic and military services.

Resolved, That the statues be accepted and placed in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, and that a copy of these resolutions duly authenticated be transmitted to the governor of the State of Missouri—

Mr. ELKINS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Reared and educated in Missouri, I feel a deep interest in everything which concerns that great Commonwealth. Added to this, because of my father's great loyalty to and admiration for Mr. Benton I wear his honored name. I feel, partly for this reason and others, that I can not allow this occasion which helps perpetuate his fame to pass without a word from me.

I will have but little to say about his life and public services, because they have been dwelt upon in the eloquent speeches of the honored Senators from Missouri just pronounced in the Senate.

No man ever dominated a political party more than Mr. Benton did the Democratic party of the State of Missouri from 1820 to 1850. His hold was so great on the Democrats of that State during this period that he hardly asked to be reelected to his high office—his party thrust his election upon him. Once in two or three years he made what might be called Benton's triumphal progress through the State, and told the multitudes who came out to greet him and hear him speak what "I, Thomas H. Benton," had done as their public servant in the Senate of the United States for the State of Missouri and the whole country.

Benton's greatest weakness was his vanity and egotism, so seldom united with genuine ability and merit. But in Benton this weakness was pardonable and forgotten, because it laid alongside so much merit and virtue, such great integrity, loyalty, and unselfish devotion to his country and its best interests. Listening to his speeches on the hustings and remembering the great services he had rendered his State and the country, people forgot his vanity, although he constantly referred to himself and what he had accomplished. In his Thirty Years' View—the best political history of that period ever written—he never fails to make mention of what Mr. Benton did and give him the fullest credit.

He was not the equal of Clay as an orator, nor of Webster as a constitutional lawyer, but he was greater than either in being a many-sided statesman in understanding the wants and needs of the whole country, especially those of the West. No statesman during his time or since has had as clear a conception of the possibilities of the great West beyond the Mississippi River, and especially that part which came to us by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as Benton. It is a historic fact that Webster denounced as worthless the vast territory that came to us through this treaty. He said it never would be useful, could not sustain population, and would be a burden to the General Government; while Benton foresaw and foretold in the most accurate way its future. Webster's vision did not extend much beyond the Mississippi; he could not see as far as the shores of the Pacific.

Benton not only saw the Pacific, advocated a Pacific railroad, and said it would be built one day, but he saw with an unerring eye the road to the Orient, the commerce of the Pacific and our trade with Asia, which is just beginning. The mighty events that are so rapidly crowding upon us are verifying his prophecies as to the possibilities of trade and commerce with the islands of the Pacific and the Orient. No American statesman ever advocated and proposed so many public measures that were beneficial and affected the welfare and destiny of the whole country as Benton.

He was the best informed man of his time on questions growing out of the public lands, Indian affairs, and mines. This was not altogether due to his ability and persevering industry, but he enjoyed the advantage over other statesmen of living beyond the Mississippi and learned lessons of wisdom from the trappers, miners, and pathfinders of the Rocky Mountains who made frequent visits to St. Louis from the West as far as Oregon. He was acquainted with all these daring and adventurous spirits, among them the Astors, who told him of the wealth of the Rocky Mountains and the climate and soil of the Pacific coast, now occupied by prosperous States. He not only understood the West, but favored all measures looking to its development.

Twenty years after Benton's prophecy that a Pacific railroad would be built across the continent uniting the two oceans, even General Sherman doubted that it would ever be accomplished, and, with all his knowledge of the West, said a Pacific railroad was impracticable.

Though a Southern man, Benton persistently opposed the extension of slavery into the Territories, and in the early talks about secession and the mutterings of discontent on the part of slaveholders and nullifiers and threats of the dissolution of the Union, Benton stood like a stone wall against all these evil and pernicious things.

He was the last link between the makers of the Constitution and the present era; he reached from Jefferson to Sumner. An incessant worker, tireless and persistent, he never gave up a purpose when adopted after mature consideration. He was so sensitive in the discharge of his public duties that he would not appoint a relative to office, no matter how great his merit and qualifications.

When elected to the Senate he was the leading lawyer of St. Louis, and engaged in the heaviest litigation in the State, notably that growing out of the public lands and grants of land made by France, which was the most important and paid the best fees. After his election to the Senate he called his clients together and gave up all his land cases, stating that their interests might conflict with those of the General Government and his duty as a Senator. He did this when to have continued as attorney would have made him a rich man for those times. He not only gave up these cases, but refused to name any lawyer to take charge of them.

Benton stood for sound money and the faithful performance of all national obligations. He favored a liberal distribution of the public lands and selling them to actual settlers at a very low price. Although this policy was strongly opposed by the Eastern States, yet after a struggle covering many years he secured its adoption. He was the author of the preemption system.

When he was the leader of the Jacksonian Democrats in the Senate he opposed the spoils system and favored the merit system.

As a Senator, Benton never could be swerved from his public duty as he understood it. He lived up to his convictions and voted according to the lights before him and his best judgment, without regard to the consequences to himself. With him personal appeals against duty fell upon deaf ears. His patriotism was as broad as the Union and knew no section. While he stood for the whole country, he always supported and defended the West and Western interests. Better than any statesman of his time he understood the grandeur, power, and glory of the great Republic, its possibilities, certain progress, growth, and expansion in trade and commerce.

He mastered nearly all the economical and political problems that affected in any way the Union and the whole country. He had but little regard for foreign things and foreign countries, and ignored their claims everywhere and whenever in conflict with those of the United States. Especially was he opposed to the pretensions and claims of Great Britain, and constantly fought British influence on this continent. His Americanism was intense, and his love of the Union, with its manifold blessings and splendid future, so clear to his vision, was his grand passion.

In a service in the Senate of thirty years, covering most exciting times, his integrity was never questioned. Honesty of purpose characterized all of his official acts. He was satisfied to be a Senator of the United States and never tried to be President. He knew that many leading statesmen had been dwarfed and enfeebled by pandering to popular favor to reach the Presidency. This dementia never reached Benton; therefore he was always able to act up to his convictions and follow his best judgment on all public questions. His public life and services, his rectitude and singleness of purpose, his unselfishness, as well as his perseverance and industry, furnish an example and pattern worthy of imitation. Taking Benton all in all during his thirty years' service in the Senate, he was the most important factor in the general legislation of the country.

It is a remarkable fact, alike honorable and creditable to the intelligence and fairness of the people of Missouri, that, though a slave-holding State and favoring strongly the cause of the South in the civil war, its legislature should have voted that Benton and Blair, with their splendid records and achievements in favor of the Union and against secession and the extension of slavery, were of all other statesmen most deserving to have a place in the Hall of great and famous men in the nation's Capitol.

GENERAL FRANCIS P. BLAIR

Was both a soldier and a statesman; his name and fame sheds luster on the history of Missouri. His services in behalf of the Union can never be forgotten. Through his ability and prompt action as an officer of the Army the first year of the war Missouri was saved to Federal control and authority during the entire war.

For his splendid services in behalf of his State and country, both in peace and war, he deserves a place by the side of Benton.

The Late Denis M. Hurley.

REMARKS
HON. GEORGE W. RAY,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Whereas the late Hon. DENIS M. HURLEY, member of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Second district of the State of New York, died on the 26th day of February, 1899, immediately preceding the final adjournment of the Fifty-fifth Congress; and

"Whereas the pressure of public business in the few days then remaining of the Fifty-fifth Congress prevented a day being set apart for the customary tributes to the memory of the said deceased:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives be permitted to print in the RECORD appropriate remarks in eulogy of the said Hon. DENIS M. HURLEY, deceased"—

Mr. RAY of New York said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The life and character of DENIS M. HURLEY, late a member of this House, demonstrate the truth of the frequently repeated statement that in the United States of America we have no aristocracy save that of brains and integrity. DENIS M. HURLEY was born in Limerick, Ireland, in 1843. He came to Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1850, at the age of 7 years, where he always resided, except that for twelve years during his boyhood, from 1854 to 1866, he resided in the city of New York. He was educated in the public schools and in the broad field of human activities, where, availing himself of every opportunity, he added to his knowledge and mental resources until he became a leader among men.

His ability, integrity, and worth, the estimation in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, are shown by the fact that in the city of Brooklyn he was elected to the Fifty-fourth and reelected to the Fifty-fifth Congress as a Republican by substantial majorities. He was neither a politician nor an office seeker, as those words are commonly understood. He mingled actively in politics for the reason that he was interested in good government, the growth and prosperity of his city and State and adopted country, and also fully realized and appreciated the benefits conferred upon the human race by our system of government. He accepted office not as a business or means of livelihood or to gratify ambition, but that he might do his part to insure the honest administration of affairs and promote the general welfare. He was an industrious, intelligent worker wherever found. When a young man he learned and practiced the trade of carpenter and joiner with success. He knew how to shape, fashion, and fit material things and make them useful to man.

When he engaged in municipal and State affairs, he demonstrated his ability to shape governmental policies, to utilize the moral and mental forces about him, and construct useful and permanent laws. He never tore down a structure for the mere sake of destruction, but that it might be replaced with something better, something more useful. He never opposed any proposition or measure unless he could see that its adoption would produce injury, or more injury than possible good. He was progressive in his instincts and purposes. He was American in every act and inspiration. He was a Republican because he believed in the principles of the party—was convinced that the prosperity of the whole country depended on the adoption and execution of its policies. He had the warm, generous nature characteristic of his nationality. He was genial, he was kind, he was true. He was aggressive when occasion demanded, and brave, but he rarely gave offense.

In his habits and manners DENIS M. HURLEY was unostentatious and unpretentious. He was a practical man—practical and accurate in his judgment and so made few mistakes in dealing with men either in public or private life. He knew the people and sympathized with them. He always opposed anything and everything savoring oppression. He believed in the broadest measure of liberty to the citizen consistent with good government. In his judgment, force was the fit instrument of despots and tyrants, but the last resort in the government of a free and an intelligent people. He believed that aggregations of men will care for themselves, and if intelligent, will govern themselves wisely and well and that therefore the only true form of government is a republic; that to insure a high degree of liberty there must be a high degree of intelligence and education. Hence he was the friend and champion of our common-school system and of governmental aid in every field where the uplifting of the masses is possible.

He had no enemies in this House. We came to know him gradually, but knew him to be an honest, careful, painstaking business legislator, a true reliable friend. He admired oratory, but was never swayed by it. Mere words made no impression on his judgment. He was always himself. It has been said that "he is great who is what he is from nature, and never reminds us of others." It is certainly true that no man can become great by imitation. DENIS M. HURLEY imitated no man. He was what he was and as he was because he was natural and made the most of his opportunities without trenching upon the rights of others.

Not a demagogue himself, he had no respect for demagogical statesmanship. He wanted the truth and the wise action demanded by actual conditions. He had great pride in his home city, in the city of New York and in the Empire State, but he felt an equal pride in the Republic. He was not, could not be sectional. Hence, he had no sympathy with sectionalism. He would not support legislation designed or calculated to benefit one locality at the expense of another. He was respected by his colleagues irrespective of party. He was a safe adviser. He never sought to wear the laurels won by another. He was happy when his Republican colleagues from New York won recognition. He always stood by his party on party questions, but never hesitated to act independently when private rights were at stake, nor would he permit private rights to be made a party question.

But DENIS M. HURLEY is, as we say, dead. When the tidings came that our loved and honored colleague had been called from his field of usefulness here to that other land of which we think much, but know little, a feeling of sadness, of bereavement, permeated every heart. We realized that we had lost a companion and a friend. It is fitting and proper that we pause in our labors and pay fitting tribute to his memory. True, what we say here will not be long remembered, but we can point to the life of DENIS M. HURLEY and say to the young men of America, "Do thou likewise," and trust that some will find encouragement and perhaps inspiration to pursue life's work with greater zeal and determination.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.
Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, may take heart again.

Who will say that the life and successes of DENIS M. HURLEY, born in Ireland, educated in the free schools of New York, a toiler at the carpenter's bench, a wise, respected, and honored legislator in the Congress of the United States of America, are not an inspiration to the youths of America, "footprints" that shall guide young men aright and encourage hundreds to renewed effort? This age is wedded too much to fiction. We have too many dreamers. Too many follow visions that constantly change and thus lead their devotees a weary chase after the unattainable and the impossible. DENIS M. HURLEY was not visionary, but a practical man and hence a successful one. There was no dash or glitter in his make-up. He was solid, substantial, reliable, persistent, and hence he carried men with him when he advocated a measure or a policy. He succeeded because the man and his methods merited success.

Whatever of greatness he possessed he achieved; it was not thrust upon him. What great and good men have done others may do, and with improved methods and more extensive knowledge those who study the lives of worthy and successful men and avoid their errors may accomplish still greater results. Our late colleague has not lived in vain. His example was worthy of emulation and his influence was felt impelling men in the right direction. Those who know what he did, those who read the story of his simple and honest and laborious life, more fully appreciate the blessings flowing from our system of government and the rewards that crown honest and persistent effort. When he became a man he saw a field of labor open to all who would compete. He at once became a competitor. The occupation was humble but useful. He mastered the business and became a leader and then a commander. He knew how to do things and did them. He honored labor and labor honored him. The masses in his Congressional district were entitled to representation, and their choice fell upon him because he was of them and understood them and could speak for them.

In the broad sense DENIS M. HURLEY is not dead, but called to a higher field of usefulness. God has so ordained that no material thing, however much it changes its form, is lost. Who can doubt that in some form somewhere the brave spirits of God's noblemen find an eternal home and work to do? It is well that we do not know what lies beyond the grave. We do know that this earth on which we live is but an atom in the vast creation of Omnipotent power. We do know that there is room beyond the sky and that our Creator has planted deep in every human breast, not hope merely, but an expectation of immortality. In the firm belief that this expectation is to be fully realized let us assert what our late colleague firmly believed, that what we call death is but "transition," and that he is now where the grasses are ever green, the flowers ever bloom, the birds ever sing, and the ended centuries are ever in the springtime of an eternal life.

There are no dead; we fall asleep
To waken where they never weep.
We close our eyes on pain and sin,
Our breath ebbs out, but life flows in.

Military Academy Bill.

We supposed General Otis and the Administration meant what they said when they informed us that the war in the Philippines was over.

What war are we getting ready for now? Is it a war of the tax eaters on the tax payers?

OF

HON. JOHN J. LENTZ,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 5, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11538) making appropriations for the Military Academy—

Mr. LENTZ said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: This amendment has in it a proposition to make Major-General Miles a lieutenant-general, and that is the only merit in the amendment; next it proposes to make Mr. Corbin a major-general, and in addition, if I am not mistaken, the bill carries with it a proposition for 50 more cadets at West Point to be appointed by the President. I ask the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. HULL] if I am right in that.

Mr. HULL. The bill increases the number of cadets to be appointed by the President from 20, as now provided by law, to 50, making an increase of 30.

Mr. LENTZ. I understood the President had only 10 appointments.

Mr. HULL. No; he has 20.

Mr. LENTZ. When did he get the twenty?

Mr. HULL. About a year ago.

Mr. LENTZ. That shows just what is going on. You can slip along and increase the number from ten, as it was a year ago, and give the President twenty appointments, and now in the last hour of Congress, when we are railroading hundreds of bills through, there will be an effort to sneak in the proposition for thirty more. Why not go into the military business entirely? Why not stop all other legislation and simply convert the whole country into a military establishment. We have spent five months out of our six months in legislating about people on the other side of the earth. It is about time that we look after our own family of 75,000,000. Thirty more cadets at West Point! Fifty appointments by the President a year! Why?

Mr. HULL. Fifty altogether.

Mr. LENTZ. Fifty altogether. We supposed General Otis and the Administration meant what they said when they informed us that the war in the Philippines was over. What war are we getting ready for now? Is it a war of the tax eaters on the tax payers? We have Army officers to burn. [Laughter.] They are in and about the Military Committee room every hour asking for some kind of promotion or restoration. Millions of dollars on the pay roll for men who are retired! Will this thing ever stop? Personal legislation, political legislation, or pull legislation—call it what you please. It does seem to me, gentlemen of this Congress, that the brakes ought to be put on somewhere. Fifty men for West Point and Otis saying the war is over! We have stolen enough down in Cuba, it is true, if we had gotten it into the Treasury, to pay for the support of these military heroes we propose to create by legislation, but those who are doing the stealing in Cuba are not turning the spoils into the public Treasury; they are getting ready for another campaign, to prate about the flag and national honor.

Now, I suppose after this infernal post-office scandal and thievery we are about to retire from the work of benevolent assimilation in Cuba. It ought not be long until we need no forces in Porto Rico, and Otis says the war is over in the Philippine Islands. Yet you are here legislating at the last hour for fifty cadets, to cost the Government thousands of dollars each. What purpose is there in it if this is not to establish militarism—if it is not another step in the career of imperialism?

Can it be possible that these cadets are to receive all the advantages of an education at West Point and $2,200 in cash in addition for the four years without suggesting militarism and imperialism? What will the farmer and mechanic receive for the education of his son or daughter? Whose sons will receive the perquisites and cash allowances of these fifty appointments to be made by the President? Will they not go to those sons of those dads who have political pull? You who are stupid enough to believe they will not should read the article in the May number of the Jeffersonian Democrat, which is as follows:

PATRIOTISM AND TREASON.

[By Lieutenant Nopull.]

During a recent debate in the United States Senate Senator SEWELL, replying to a speech of Senator PETTIGREW, stigmatized the latter as a "traitor." Senator PETTIGREW's speech, which brought forth this violent epithet, related to the Philippine question, and was a vigorous denunciation of the war policy of the present Administration.

Senator SEWELL's reply was intolerant and violent, and his epithet of denunciation was one seldom heard in the halls of Congress.

With excited words and angry gestures he denounced the "treason" of Mr. PETTIGREW, and proclaimed his own patriotism. He availed himself of the proud opportunity to announce that he had a son fighting in the Philippines, who had been on the staff of Lawton; a gallant soldier whose life was endangered by the cowardly traitors who disapprove of the war in the Philippines.

Let us examine the "patriotism" of Mr. SEWELL and the "treason" of Mr. PETTIGREW. They are terms now frequently heard. Let us see what they mean when used as the shibboleth of partisan appeal.

Let us commence by making inquiries about this gallant son, this soldier that is fighting and bleeding and dying in the Philippines.

We will consult the Army Register: "Robert Sewell, appointed second lieutenant Seventh Cavalry, 1892."

"Ah! a West Pointer, no doubt," you say. Let us see. No; he is not a West Pointer. There are no "M. A." after his name to indicate that he belongs to the graduates of the National Academy.

"Then he served faithfully and gallantly in the ranks, and won his commission by force of honest merit, as many a deserving young man has done."

Be patient, gentle reader; we will see. It is all here in the record.

No; he has no service in the ranks. He was appointed from civil life.

"Then he was a young man of especial brilliant parts, of fine education, who had attended some military school and achieved distinction."

The register is silent as to this. Go to any Army post or camp and ask the question of any officer that you meet. It won't matter who, but better ask one who has won his commission with his brains at West Point; and that it may all be clear in his mind, let his service date back as far as young Sewell's. With these limitations any officer will do. Here is his answer; here is what he will tell you:

"Young Sewell's appointment caused much comment at the time, because of rank favoritism. He was ordered before an Army board in due form for mental examination, and failed. Notwithstanding this, and in violation of the regulations made for the common herd, he was appointed. He is a fat, lazy, good natured boy."

If our interrogated officer is talkative, he will add that of late it has become a common practice to appoint the sons or relatives of influential men who fail in their examination, while holding the rule of successful examination operative for the general applicant.

But let us return to the register and further examine the record of the Senator's son:

"Appointed first lieutenant, 1898." This is all right; this is in due form. "Captain and assistant quartermaster, September, 1899." Captain and transferred to the staff with its safety and special privileges. And why this promotion?

Had he distinguished himself in battle? Not at all.

Had he acquired especial proficiency through painstaking experience? Not at all. He had had no experience as a quartermaster.

Did his rank entitle him to promotion? Not at all. At the day of his appointment 103 first lieutenants ranked him in his arm of the service, of whom 87 were educated West Pointers; while 428 first lieutenants ranked him in the Army, of whom more than three-fourths were graduates of the Military Academy.

Why, then, was Robert Sewell made captain and quartermaster? Why was he passed over 428 deserving officers? Let justice answer. His father is a United States Senator and filled to o'erflowing with "patriotism."

And what about this "patriotism" which volunteers at the firing of the first gun for appointment as brigadier-general or staff officer, with high rank and ample safety?

And what about the bestowal of brigadier-generalships, colonelcies, and majorities upon the sons of fathers and children of society?

What about this patriotism which walks hand in hand with a high ranking military appointment, this patriotism and spot pay? Here are a few of such appointments made since the commencement of the war with Spain:

Name.	Position.	Recommendation.	Experience.
1. Wm. J. McKee	Brig. gen.	Father of "Baby McKee"	Nothing.
2. C. A. Whittier	do	Child of wealth	Do.
3. John A. Hull	Lieut. col.	Son of Representative HULL	Do.
4. John J. Astor	do	Child of society	Do.
5. R. B. Harrison	Major	Son of President Harrison	Do.
6. Geo. A. Hobart	do	Nephew of Vice-President	Do.
7. Perry Belmont	do	Child of society	Do.
8. P. B. Strong	do	Son of Mayor Strong	Do.
9. Wm. B. Schofield	do	Son of General Schofield	Do.
10. G. C. Webb	do	Child of society	Do.
11. James G. Blaine	Captain	Son of father	Do.
12. Stuart M. Brice	do	Son of Senator Brice	Do.
13. D. VAN VOORHIS	do	Son of Representative VAN VOORHIS.	Do.
14. Wm. A. Harper	do	Child of society	Do.
15. C. D. Coudert	do	do	Do.
16. Fred. M. Alger	do	Son of Secretary Alger	Do.
17. Wm. B. Allison, jr.	do	Son of Senator ALLISON	Do.
18. Harry S. New	do	Son of Representative New	Do.
19. Webb Hayes	Lieut. col.	Son of President Hayes	Do.

Seriously, were those appointments made because of patriotism and military efficiency, or because of corrupt partisan promptings?

Ask any returned soldier, any officer or private returned from the Philippines and not obligated by an undeserved appointment, and he will tell you that the conflict with the Filipinos came as the natural result of our own work in attempting to subdue a people to whom we had given arms and encouraged to rise and fight for their freedom.

Ask any "patriotic" Senator whose son holds a high commission without possessing military education or merit, and he will tell you that the conflict with the Filipinos was caused by the disagreement of Senator HOAR or Senator MASON or Senator PETTIGREW with the policy of the Administration. Out upon such canting hypocrisy!

Senator PETTIGREW should reform. He should "bend the pregnant hinges of the knee" just a trifle. He should sing hosannas to the benign Republican party. He should exalt his patriotism, hire a band, gather crowds, and denounce the "traitors," "antis," and "copperheads" who oppose war. He should declare for the elevation of the poor Filipinos even though it were necessary to shoot every one full of holes in order to accomplish the elevation.

Then, perchance, his son or nephew would be made a colonel or major in the Army, and with sanctified face and benign unction he could repeat to admiring audiences:

"I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust adulterers, or even as this publican."

I ask those of you whose brains are torpid enough to submit tamely to these political raids on the public Treasury for the benefit of the sons of those who have political pull to read the Scriptures, and, in the language of Jeremiah, I ask, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots? Then may ye also do good that are accustomed to do evil." What was done before will be done again by the President and his political general, who heretofore has been known as the Adjutant-General and hereafter is to be known as major-general.

If we could change the title of the Adjutant-General and call him Political General, so as not to deceive the uninitiated, there might not be so much confusion about the title and duty of the major-general. But if a few more sons of members and relatives of their wives are to be appointed, why will it not be in order to make the Adjutant-General also a Lieutenant-General? And don't forget the pay and allowances. As for General Miles, I place him where Lincoln placed him, among the bravest and worthiest leaders. I would promote him as I would Winfield Scott Schley. These two men achieved the greatest results and won the greatest victories of the Spanish war with the least sacrifice of human life among our boys.

Schley at Santiago and Miles at Porto Rico have no superior and only one equal—that of Dewey at Manila.

Had Miles been sent with full power to Luzon he would have been diplomat and strategist enough to have brought the Filipinos to friendly terms just as he did the Porto Ricans. I know there are men who think ill of General Miles because he did not support the beef trusts, and others because he did not have enough bloody war in Porto Rico—that he did not sacrifice enough of his men by attacking the Spaniards in their forts and strongholds. But what should the people ask or expect of a great general if not that he should save his own men and still receive the sword of the enemy?

Let the mothers answer who is the great general—whether Miles in Porto Rico, or Shafter in Cuba. Let us not forget that critical day when Shafter wished to retreat from Santiago, and when the President and his political general gladly turned to General Miles to extricate them all. Let us remember that the Spaniards did not surrender at Santiago until they met the tact and strategy of General Miles.

I am in favor of General Miles's promotion to that of Lieutenant-General, but I am not in favor of allowing any staff officer who remains here in Washington in a bomb-proof building in time of war receiving any higher grade or pay and allowances than that of a brigadier-general. Six thousand two hundred dollars a year, with retirement at age of 64 on three-fourths pay, is enough for any staff officer, and much better treatment than that received by any other servant of the people, be he Senator or Cabinet officer or Vice-President.

But there are other evidences of militarism abroad in the land besides that of giving the President royal and autocratic power of appointment. You have an army out in Idaho which has been used to break up labor unions and deny men the right to work. The type giving a history of this militarism is set up in the Printing Office, and sets forth the testimony taken at the investigation which we have made of that matter. This morning in the Military Committee we asked to have a resolution passed to print 10,000 copies of that evidence. The Republican end of that committee reported that there was no justification in the resolution that we filed here for an investigation.

The Republican end of the Military Committee will place before the country their findings that the charges are not sustained by the evidence; and when we made a motion requesting the Printing Committee to bring up a resolution which was passed in the Senate to print 10,000 copies of that evidence, to show how the Army was used in Idaho to break up the labor unions, the chairman of the committee ruled that that motion was out of order. It was merely a motion to request the running of a few sheets of white paper over a cylinder with black ink on it, and it would cost this Government only a pittance, and yet the Republican chairman ruled it out of order.

It is exceedingly harsh to say, but it is an old and a well-known maxim that "the man with a pure heart and a clean record has nothing to conceal." Every Republican on the Military Committee and every Republican in the House who had anything to say with reference to printing of the testimony in the Cœur d'Alene matter seems to be determined to burn or bury the record. Every Democrat on that committee is equally determined to have the complete record given to the public. This alone ought to show thinking men that somebody has something to conceal. The two reports of the two ends of the committee are diametrically opposed to each other, hence one or the other is false, and the fact that the Republicans refuse to give the public the testimony ought to be considered significant, to say the least.

You Republicans refuse to give the public anything except a garbled statement of the testimony, made by yourselves to support a finding which you confess is not supported by the complete record, or you would be glad to publish the complete record.

We spent nearly all of our time in the Military Committee room between the 19th of February and the 10th of May taking this testimony. It cost the Government in the neighborhood of fifteen to twenty thousand dollars to bring the witnesses from Idaho, to pay stenographers' fees, and to set the type to print the testimony from day to day for the use of the members of the committee, so that at this time the only expense to which the Government would be put in giving this testimony would be that of running some white paper over some printers' ink. You can fool the people a part of the time, as Lincoln said, but I do not believe you will be able to fool them all the time.

Labor unions and newspapers and public thinkers all over the country are asking for the complete record of that evidence, and not a Republican in the committee or here in the House dares to raise his voice in favor of the publication of that record. The Republican end of the Printing Committee of this House has had the privileged resolution from the Senate for the printing of 10,000 copies since last Friday or Saturday.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. LENTZ. I do.

Mr. LACEY. What is the politics of the governor of Idaho who called for these troops?

Mr. LENTZ. He belongs to any old trust or capitalistic combine that wants to use him. That is his politics, and that explains why you and the Republicans on the Military Committee love him. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. He is a Democrat, is he not?

Mr. LACEY. Do you mean to say that, being a Democrat, he belongs to a trust?

Mr. LENTZ. His politics is exactly the same as those of Mr. William McKinley. He is in the service of the capitalistic mine owners.

Mr. LACEY. What political party elected him?

Mr. LENTZ. I understand he was elected on a mixed ticket. [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.] But the mere fact that he calls himself a Democrat does not make him one, for he proves himself a despot, and a rose would smell as sweet by some other name. Although you call this man a Democrat, every Democratic member of the committee, without an exception, signed a report condeming him and the President alike in their use of the military for no other purpose than to black list the labor unions of Idaho and to drive them out of the State. Now, sir, we insist that you men shall go before the country confessing that you are ashamed to publish this testimony, if you allow this House to adjourn without publishing the 10,000 copies of it as provided in the privileged resolution passed by the Senate and sent over here a week ago. Publish it if you dare, and show your good faith in support of your findings that the resolutions are not sustained. The type is there, the plates are there; it is only a question of a few pounds of white paper.

But I do not care to take any more time on that. I propose to serve notice upon gentlemen here that if you are honest in your report you will agree to publish ten or twenty or thirty thousand copies of the evidence complete.

Fifty cadets for West Point! And General Corbin to be made a major-general. General Corbin, just at the last hour of the last Congress, when we sat up all night, was hovering around the corridors here trying to have himself legislated up to a major-general and a salary almost double that of a Senator. I would like to see some of these men getting higher military honors by fighting for it. I am tired of having men beg for military degrees.

I have not much respect for political beggars or military beggars. A major-generalship, the highest place, the highest office we have in the Army to-day, to be given to a man who sits in a bombproof building and does nothing but act as the clerk for the President! What do we have a commanding general for? It is his place to direct the movements of the Army in war. Are these men here simply to wear shoulder straps and go to good dinners and attend the theaters and be handsome-looking fellows for the benefit of the ladies, or are they to fight?

I repeat and emphasize that I am not in favor of any staff officer holding a higher title than brigadier-general. Six thousand two hundred dollars a year, with the privilege of retiring at the age of 64 on three-fourths pay, is as much as any clerk in the War Department or any other Department ought to receive, and the man who goes in on the staff ought to understand that he can not have the highest office, even by legislation. And if there is no way of limiting this infernal system of begging for promotion instead of fighting for it, we need a constitutional amendment to limit the greed of the staff officers rather than to limit the greed of the trusts.

Within the past few weeks we on the Military Committee have listened for many days to the claims made by the officers of the line for greater privileges and opportunities of becoming staff officers. They all know of the luxury and ease of these places here at Washington and they are impatient to secure them.

I have as much good feeling for the brave Army officer and patriotic soldier as any man in this Congress can have, but I am unwilling to have the taxpayers utterly ignored, and I am as jealous of militarism as Jefferson and Lincoln were.

I am not willing to see the cartoons of America, like those of the monarchies of Europe, representing every workingman with a soldier on his shoulders; and I agree with Andrew Jackson's declaration that "Industry in peace is the source of our wealth."

On some other occasion, when time shall permit, I may pay my respects further to the court-martial of the man of whom the President is reported to have said, "General Corbin is the best politician in the Army."

In conclusion and in further support of my repeated assertion that "the times are out of joint" and that the principles of Jefferson and Lincoln have been repudiated by the Republican Administration, I submit herewith a report given by the Akron (Ohio) Daily Democrat of correspondence which has recently taken place between Hon. M. A. HANNA, chairman of the Republican national committee, and ex-Governor Sidney Edgerton, of Akron, Ohio, one of the founders of the Republican party and one of its delegates to the Philadelphia convention which nominated Frémont in 1856. The account of the Akron Democrat is as follows:

[Akron Daily Democrat.]

SPEAKS FOR THE "OLD CAUSE"—"FOR THAT OLD CAUSE IN WHICH I WAS FROM MY YOUTH ENGAGED"—GOVERNOR EDGERTON, REPLYING TO SENATOR HANNA, TELLS WHY HE WILL NOT ATTEND THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION—SHOWS HOW THE REPUBLICANISM OF "THE HEROIC AGE OF THE PARTY" DIFFERS FROM THE REPUBLICANISM OF TO-DAY—DEPLORES THE PARTY'S INTOLERANT ATTITUDE TOWARD HONEST CRITICISM AND DISCUSSION.

Ex-Governor Sidney Edgerton, one of the 14 survivors of the memorable Republican conventions of 1856, which founded the Republican party, has mailed an answer to the invitation sent to him to attend the Republican convention in Philadelphia next week.

In his letter to Senator M. A. HANNA, who mailed the invitation, Governor Edgerton sets forth comparative views of Republican policy in the day of Lincoln and the day of HANNA. He gives his reasons for refusing to accept the invitation to occupy a place of honor on the platform in no uncertain manner. The invitation from Senator HANNA was as follows:

SENATOR HANNA'S INVITATION.

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
NORTHWEST CORNER FOURTEENTH AND G STREETS,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1900.

Hon. SIDNEY EDGERTON, Akron, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: The Republican national committee presents its compliments and congratulations to you as one of the few Republicans now living who participated in the Republican conventions of 1856 at Pittsburg and Philadelphia, and on behalf of the delegates to the coming Republican national convention extends to you and to your surviving associates in those historic events a cordial invitation to be present at and occupy a seat upon the platform of the convention which meets on the 19th day of June, 1900, in the city of Philadelphia.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since you participated in laying the foundation of the Republican party. You have witnessed its magnificent growth from a popular vote of 1,341,264 and 114 electoral votes cast for Frémont in 1856 to a popular vote of 7,104,779 and 271 electoral votes for McKinley in 1896; and therefore the Republicans of to-day, profoundly appreciating the work of yourself and other pioneers of our party, will feel honored by your distinguished presence, and we assure you a most cordial welcome.

With considerations of high esteem, very truly, yours,

M. A. HANNA, Chairman.

CHAS. DICK, Secretary.

GOVERNOR EDGERTON'S REPLY.

Governor Edgerton's answer, which was mailed to the Senator in due season, is printed in full below:

AKRON, OHIO, June 5, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 2d instant, in which you invite me to be present at the convention to be held in Philadelphia on Tuesday next.

For your courtesy in extending to me this invitation I am extremely obliged to you. The thoughtfulness which inspired it—knowing, as you do, how little there is in common between the principles held by me and the foreordained work of the occasion referred to and how little use you will have for such as I am—argues a disinterestedness on your part which, being so rare in this day, is appreciated accordingly.

You do no more than justice to the conventions held at Pittsburg and Philadelphia in 1856 by characterizing them in your letters as "historic events." They truly were so; and to have been concerned in them is to me a source of pride and satisfaction.

I am indeed very unequal to the task to which you have invited me, for I am borne down by the weight of many years and am laboring under great infirmities of body. Nevertheless I should feel it my duty to hazard the undertaking if my journey thither and my presence there could at all promote the keeping by the coming convention of the ancient faith of the Republican party or the maintenance of its ancestral honor. What that convention will do is absolutely known to yourself, and is substantially known to me. From this knowledge I am persuaded that the condition of my attendance, above referred to, must fail—has failed in advance—and, the condition failing, my presence must fail also.

I purpose stating briefly some of the facts which show that the doctrines to be advocated, the policies to be indorsed, and the plans to be pursued by your convention are quite the opposite of those which obtained in the convention of 1856; the only community between them is that of place and party name.

The Philadelphia convention of 1856 was made up of men who had convictions of political right and duty and the courage of them. And they came together for conference and comparison of views, to the end that by wise and tolerant concert of political effort the welfare of the people might be promoted and the great cause of human liberty advanced. The Philadelphia convention of 1900 has for its sole work to ratify and register a political rescript set forth by one man, having for its purpose to perpetuate in power an Administration which has wholy disregarded the interests of the masses.

The Pittsburg convention of 1856 was held on the birthday of Washington, and the Philadelphia convention of that year was called for the 17th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, the significance of which dates will suggest itself to you. Your convention will indorse and eulogize with fulsome praise a policy which has turned its back upon the last counsel of Washington to his people, and which is an organized sneer at the principles for which he fought, and will commend an Administration which, for its supple lackeying and truckling subserviency to Great Britain has not its match in history; and this is, too, by a President whose principal political stock in trade for a generation past has been our economic wrongs suffered at the hands of this hereditary industrial enemy of ours.

The convention held in Philadelphia in 1856 addressed its declaration of doctrine to those who were "in favor of * * * restoring the action of the Federal Government to the principles of Washington and Jefferson," and it accordingly "Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution is essential to the preservation of our Republican institutions." And again it "Resolved, That with our Republican fathers we hold it to be a self-evident truth that all men are endowed with the inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the primary object and ulterior design of our Federal Government were to secure these rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction."

The Philadelphia convention of this year will be made up of men in whose view "the principles of Washington and Jefferson" are avowedly antiquated and far out of date—useful only in the orations of the Fourth of July or the warmed-over porch platitudes of a political campaign; and it will in terms countenance a policy which denies to 10,000,000 "persons within our exclusive jurisdiction" the "inalienable rights" which in its earlier days the Republican party thus guaranteed, a policy which avows its purpose of governing subject peoples without their consent, outside of constitutional principles and safeguards, at the caprice of irresponsible appointees or a venal majority in Congress, and in flagrant and derisive violation of the "principles of Washington and Jefferson," and those "promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution." It will vociferously uphold and applaud the doings of an Administration which, doubling in its own track within a space of sixty days, has broken faith with an innocent and confiding people who, by the hazards of war, had passed under its jurisdiction—an act rightly characterised by itself as the breach of "a plain duty"—at the command of the conscienceless and mercenary appetite for plunder possessed by those by whom that Administration was itself created, and which thus is constrained to remember its creator.

It will indorse a policy which thus lawlessly put in motion has already begun to bear the fruits of lawlessness in the peculations being perpetrated by our officials upon those whom it appears we rescued from one set of brigands only to turn loose another upon them, and it will denounce the individual thieves, in apparent forgetfulness that the thievery is but the symptom and necessary sequence of an irresponsible despotism. For a government of peoples outside of constitutional sanctions is, upon any rational Republican theory, but a despotism; and it is so not the less because it is promised to be administered "benevolently" and for the good of the governed; the fact that they are governed without their consent puts the policy at war with the Republican doctrine of 1856. And so, being irresponsible at its source, the principle of irresponsibility permeates the entire fabric, and stealing and spoliation by subordinates follow as night succeeds the day. Shortly before the convention of 1856 a man of some prominence then and later said: "When the white man governs himself, that is self-government; but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. * * *

"What I do say is, that no man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. * * * Little by little, but steadily as man's march to the grave, we have been giving up the old for the new faith. Near eighty years ago we began by declaring that all men are created equal; but now from that beginning we have run down to the other declaration that for some men to enslave others is a 'sacred right of self-government.' These principles can not stand together. They are as opposite as God and Mammon."

The utterer of these words was Abraham Lincoln. Was he a Republican or not? Measured by the standard of 1856, plainly he was. Judged by the test which will govern the Philadelphia convention of this year, just as plainly he was not.

The Philadelphia convention of 1856 declared in its platform that it was "both the right and the imperative duty of Congress to prohibit in the territories those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery." The Republican party of that time, in obedience to this mandate, and improving the opportunity created by the great civil war, did far more. At a cost in blood and treasure beyond computation, it emancipated a race and secured the adoption of an amendment to our Constitution which forever prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude, except upon due conviction of crime, in all places "within the United States, or subject to their jurisdiction." In like manner it by lawful means extirpated polygamy within our borders.

The Philadelphia convention which you ask me to attend will, by its platform, approve the work of an Administration which, claiming to have subdued the Sultanate of Sulu, nevertheless is in treaty with its Sultan, whereby it guarantees the integrity of his dominions and promises to protect him in maintaining his slave barracoon and his harem of wives. And not only has it thus given him immunity for his breach of our organic and statute law, but it has put a premium upon "those twin relics of barbarism" by paying him a yearly stipend for continuing to be a lawbreaker. And by way of sarcasm on your campaign cry of 1896, it pays him the bounty in those sinful and utterly "dishonest" Mexican dollars! It is a little curious to see how a government can make a treaty with one of its own subjects, for you will perceive that our country, under the "benevolent" extra-constitutional doctrine, has progressed far enough to have subjects as well as citizens; but let that pass. You will claim, and I do not now deny, that the Sultan's territory is "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States. Upon the morality, national or otherwise, of the transaction I make no comment.

But for the party which by blood and iron imbedded the thirteenth amendment in our organic law to sanction it seems to me monstrous—a party sacrilege, a political blasphemy. The same organization, too, thus to be commended at Philadelphia in the polygamy line strains at the gnat (Roberts) and swallows the camel (the Sultan of Sulu). Holy Writ tells us what the proper name of people who do this thing is. I can not improve its definition. And the party has annexed Hawaii also, bringing over, I suppose, its laws with it. By Hawaiian law coolie contract labor is permitted and sanctioned. By that law such contracts for "involuntary servitude" may be specifically enforced in the courts, now under our jurisdiction, or their violation may be corporally punished by the lash. And this is, I understand, in fact done. A clergyman lands on our shores under an agreement to break the Bread of Life to the people of Brooklyn. Upon this fact becoming known he is hustled back to his own land, because he is a violator of the contract-labor law. Here we have another gnat strained at and another camel swallowed. But the one is at the behest of the sugar barons of Hawaii; the other is only a poor person who has nothing but God's word to deal in. The Philadelphia convention of next week will commend the annexation of Hawaii, and, if it says anything on the subject, it will, with equal unction, denounce the wicked contracts to import labor into the harbor of New York.

The Philadelphia convention of 1856 contained this resolution:

"Resolved, That the highwayman's plea that 'might makes right,' embodied in the Ostend circular, was in every respect unworthy of American diplomacy, and would bring shame and dishonor upon any government or people who gave it their sanction."

The facts behind the "Ostend circular" are familiar to every student of history, and I need not repeat them. It is equally patent that the policy "embodied in the Ostend circular" and that now being pursued by our national Administration in regard to the Philippine Islands, and probably in regard to Cuba also, differ from one another in no essential respect, and a simple man would think that both should fall under the same condemnation. But it is quite safe to say that the latter will, at the convention to which you have invited me, be as vigorously applauded as the former was reprobated at the convention of four and forty years ago. How can I, then, if I would keep the political faith of 1856, attend upon or approve the work which the Philadelphia convention of this year has marked out for it, and which it will most obsequiously perform? It would be an inconsistency so gross as to shock the political moral sense of any reasonable creature endowed with a conscience and an appreciation of party fitness.

The Philadelphia convention of 1856 strenuously advocated the construction of a highway to the Pacific over our own territory, and of course under our own control, and to be defended, upon occasion, with the jealous care inherent in a free people against interference, restraint, guardianship, or espionage by any other power whatsoever.

The convention of 1900 will be expected to, and so will, loudly indorse the foreign policy of the Administration, which has been so far recreant to all our traditions of national independence of action and American manhood as to negotiate and ask the Senate to ratify a treaty whereby, at a time when Congress has made provision for a waterway designed also to bring us nearer to our Pacific possessions, over territory conceded to us by an independent power, and hence as much ours as if it were passing over one of our own watersheds, we obligate ourselves to Great Britain never to fortify the canal thus to be built with our own means on territory not at all under her jurisdiction, thus surrendering to her navy in advance in time of war a potential title to our own property.

And the same Administration has refused to allow the bill for the construction of the canal to come to a vote in the Senate, in order that time may be gained and the requisite pressure brought to bear upon legislators to consummate this abject flunkeyism which has become characteristic of our State Department as now occupied and administered. To a Republican of 1856 this fawning sycophancy to the most selfish of nations is nauseating.

The Republican party of that early day, and long afterwards, was upon every consideration the friend of and the sympathizer with the oppressed and downtrodden everywhere. And it so went on record time and again. In the convention of this year there will be no word of rebuke heard for the course of an Administration which has stood calmly but coldly by in sight of the death struggles of two republics in another hemisphere, crushed beneath the blows of armaments too overwhelming for hope of resistance, we all the while uttering no word of cheer and tendering in the meantime no good offices looking to an honorable peace, which, by the express terms of The Hague convention, we would have been warranted in doing without giving any just cause of offense to either belligerent. On the contrary, it is too notorious for controversy that our Government not only had no good offices to tender, being itself engaged in a like enterprise elsewhere, but it resolutely suppressed to the measure of its ability all public expression of sympathy with the South African Republics in their mortal agonies.

The newspaper oracles of the Administration were as dumb as oysters, in strange contrast to their effusiveness when reaching out for the Irish vote, and when the accredited representatives of the Transvaal Government reached the shores of a land, as they supposed, of liberty, they were at the State Department treated as outlaws, being refused other than an unofficial reception, although the refuser then had his own son at their capital, receiving official recognition for the benefit of our citizens, sojourners there; and the Secretary of State hastened to advertise the cold shoulder he had given the envoys, in order that his London friends might seasonably know of his good services, and the President consoled the suppliants for their chilly reception by showing them the fine view from the portico of the White House. No effort was spared to keep the sympathetic heart beat of the American people from their ear.

This is not the Republicanism of the heroic age of the party.

The Republican party of 1856 addressed its appeal to the conscience, to the reason, to the judgment of the people. The Republican party of to-day is wholly intolerant of criticism or discussion of partisan measures within its own ranks, and any dissent from them is promptly stigmatized as treason, not indeed to the nation, nor even to the party, but to the men who control it; so that all independence of thought is stifled and all manly expression of opinion is dragooned into a cowed and discreet silence.

That party, in any early day and to its everlasting honor, offered a lawful and temperate opposition to a decree of the Supreme Court which was wholly extrajudicial, and which, by denying to a race of men the commonest rights of nature, caused all Christendom to cry out against the barbarity of its judgment.

Now it is a cardinal doctrine of the organization which is to convene at Philadelphia that the most absurd and tyrannical deliverances of the most untoward and irresponsible judicial accidents shall be treated as inerrant, and that an intelligent criticism of them is to be hooted down as anarchy and contempt.

The Republican party of its early history was, above all things else, a party of the people. It was organized to voice the protests of the many against the aggressions of the few. It found the Government in the hands of a compact organization, insignificant in numbers and not respectable in political methods, but who held a part of their fellow-men as slaves and made the rest of the people slave catchers. It was, in more modern language, a gigantic trust of land and labor, which undertook to monopolize and control that product of God's earth of which the world was supposed to stand most in need, and which was therefore denominated "king." To the overthrow of this soulless and conscienceless oligarchy the party addressed itself, and its history throughout that long struggle was God-like. At this day it is at once the benefactor and beneficiary, not, indeed, of one trust, but of many trusts, which, in a greater or a less degree, monopolize and withhold from man nearly all of God's gifts to him, exacting an unearned and unmerited tribute for their enjoyment, and usurping the constitutional power of taxing the people.

At the last session of Congress it passed a law which created a monopoly of the circulating medium of the people, and so put into the hands of the few the most unconscionable weapon of oppression over the industry, the frugality, and the thrift of the country which human sagacity, backed by unscrupulous power, could manipulate; and for thus bartering away the rights of the producing and earning masses it expects to be perpetuated in power. This law it passed early and easily. When the last days of the session were here, at a time when it was known that no legislation could pass for want of time for intelligent debate, it proposed the farce of a constitutional amendment which asked the States simply to abdicate all control over their industrial creatures and go out of the governing business.

To this proposition all right of amendment was denied, and upon its merited defeat the purpose of deceiving the people was, if not avowed, at least not denied. At the same time an amendment to make effectual an anti-trust law already on the statute book was not allowed to come to a vote in the Senate; a trust attorney from a trust State was at the head of the Department of Justice, and trust lawyers all over the country were appointed, charged with the duty of prosecuting trusts. The Philadelphia convention will loudly denounce trusts, on paper; its campaign fund will be replenished from their tolls from the people, and its managers will guarantee them countenance and immunity. In this respect also the Republican convention of 1856 was the exponent of a policy the reverse of that which the coming convention will not indeed indorse, but which it will take care to see enforced.

The time was in the history of the party when it chose its public servants for their capacity, their integrity, and their allegiance to principle. Now oleaginous mediocrity may fill the highest position within its bestowal, and places may be sought and obtained from the most sordid motives. A purchased seat in the Senate is no longer esteemed a disgrace to the purchaser, while the purchased are rewarded with Federal appointments, and he who is most astute in obstructing an investigation and in instructing witnesses not to answer is intrusted with the prosecution of the common offenders whom want or misfortune has impelled to crime. Hypocrisy masquerades as political virtue, and platforms constitute only abortive attempts to cover up the nakedness of a bad record with the fig leaves of loud professions and fair promises, coupled with swelling appeals to the glorious lineage and historic past of the party.

It was the Republican party of a generation ago, which as the harvest gathering of peaceful agitation and armed conflict and as an enduring guaranty of political equality among us, planted in the Federal Constitution the fourteenth amendment, which provides the appropriate means for its own efficient execution. The Republican party is and for some time has been in complete control of all branches of our Government. It has the power, therefore, to advance the remedy and to make that amendment a living letter instead of a sealed book, and to right the enormous wrong now being perpetrated against the suffrage in several of the States of this Union. From a constitutional and ancient Republican point of view, this crime against the ballot is the master grievance of the age, and beside which, as a matter of fidelity to party and party principles, every other question and all other offenses dwindle into insignificance.

But I am safe in saying that the Philadelphia convention, to which you invite me, will do nothing and say nothing to cure this abominable evil. If a pledge to repeal or to emasculate the amendment could be hopefully used as a trap to catch a single Southern electoral vote, I venture to predict it would be forthcoming. The past record of the party imposes the duty upon that convention to make good its early pledges by making some deliverance on the subject. It makes another reason why I can not attend that convention that this implied promise is to be ruthlessly and contemptuously broken.

I might enumerate other points in which the old convention and the new are repugnant to each other in matter of substance and principle, so that to countenance by my attendance the latter would be to stultify myself as a member of the former. But these, I conceive, are enough.

The last words spoken by my illustrious and patriotic namesake, Algernon Sidney, as he laid his head upon the block on Tower Hill was to thank his Maker for the opportunity for saying a final word for that "old cause" in which I was from my youth engaged—the "old cause," as he pathetically called the cause of constitutional liberty.

I, too, am grateful that I have been spared thus to bear witness to the same end.

Very sincerely, yours,

SIDNEY EDGERTON.

Nicaragua Canal.

We must place the American flag above American-built vessels, manned by American seamen, and carrying the products of American skill and American farms into every port of the world.

It is not good government farming to pay others $200,000,000 per annum for doing what we could and should do ourselves.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. THROPP,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, May 2, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—

Mr. THROPP said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not often that so practical a question as this of the Nicaragua Canal presents itself for consideration by the American Congress. It is one which has attracted much attention, not only of the people of our own country, but of those of the commercial centers of the whole world.

As a business man representing a large inland district with large and varied industrial interests, but hundreds of miles from the sea, I yet feel it an especial privilege to support this measure.

Aside from the effect of the various grants which have from time to time been made to different parties or companies who have desired to be interested in the construction of the canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and aside from the fact of the Clayton-Bulwer or any other treaty which we may have, or may have had, with European powers, the question under discussion now is a plain, practical, business one.

We know that to transport by water from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or other of the large cities on the Atlantic coast to points on the Pacific coast within our own country involves the passage of the vessels around the dangerous Cape Horn and a trip of possibly 10,000 miles more than by the way of the proposed canal. The distance from San Francisco to New York by way of the canal would be 4,760 miles. An ordinary steamer could make the voyage in about fourteen days. The canal route would only be 60 per cent longer than the rail route.

The whole tendency of the age is to annihilate time; to reduce the cost of transportation and of communication between business centers. The pack mules and Conestoga wagons have given way to the canals, the canals to the railroads, and the slow trains of the railroads to the express freights and limited passenger trains; the "pony post" has been superseded by the special mail trains, the telegraph systems spreading like cobwebs all over our country and the cables under the oceans connecting different parts of the world, and as we sit in our offices, where formerly it took days to communicate, even with the most improved facilities, by mail or by telegraph, we now talk to distant points by the telephone.

The question of connecting the oceans is not a new one. As far back as 1825 Nicaragua asked the United States to undertake this canal. In 1845 Louis Napoleon Bonaparte got a concession from the Nicaraguan Government granting him power to organize a company to build the canal. That farsighted and practical business man, Cornelius Vanderbilt, in 1849 got a concession from the Government of Nicaragua for the construction of a canal on almost the identical route now proposed, and from 1852 to 1857 he used the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua as part of a system for the transportation of passengers and merchandise from points on the Eastern coast of the United States to California and other points on the Western coast.

General Grant, after he was President, in his practical, commonsense way, strongly urged the construction of this canal, writing thus in 1881:

> I commend an American canal on American soil to the American people.

Read this carefully, not only "between the lines," but weigh the words, and you will see clearly Grant's views of what the canal should be and who should control it.

Mr. Hayes followed this with as strong an indorsement, for the first time declaring that we had the right to construct, operate, and own it, and that such a canal should be "considered a part of the coast line of the United States."

Mr. Blaine strongly advocated its construction; President Harrison, with a zeal and earnestness equaling if not surpassing any of his predecessors, urged its construction. In 1892, the great parties approved of it in their platforms; President Cleveland advocated it, and now we have the great mass of the people of our country and boards of trades in all sections urging the American Congress to stop further delay and construct this great public highway.

I understand that powerful influences connected with the transcontinental railroads have for years had much to do with the failure of legislation on this important subject. Having been educated as a civil engineer and having had my first practical experience in life in connection with the construction of railroads, I will yield to no one in my firm belief in the great benefits they are to the country, when the same are properly conducted, keeping in mind not only the rights of their stockholders, but the rights of their patrons, and the fact that the interests of both are mutual; but while I have this feeling for the railroads, I think they are mistaken in pursuing anything like the "dog-in-the-manger" policy. Naturally, those interested in the great transcontinental roads do not wish the incomes of these roads reduced, and some of them, taking a short-sighted view of the conditions, may be fearful that the construction of this canal will injuriously affect the income of the roads. It is right here that I think they make their mistake.

The facts are that among the most prosperous railroads in our country are the Boston and Maine, which, with its branches, skirts the coast of New England and comes into competition with the coast trade on the ocean; the New York, New Haven and Hartford; the Pennsylvania, and Reading railroads, and the Seaboard Air Line, which great systems, with their connections, skirt the coast from Boston to Florida, and all save one are prosperous roads. Then the Lake Shore, from Buffalo, encircling the lakes to Chicago, and the other roads which might be mentioned in the Northwest are among the most prosperous roads, notwithstanding many millions of freight are annually carried upon the bosoms of our great inland seas in competition with the railroads skirting their shores.

Let us consider just for a few minutes some of the conditions that exist and some of the possibilities that are before us: The three Pacific Coast States, California, Oregon, and Washington, contain an area of 325,645 square miles; the population of the three States, according to the census of 1890, was about 1,871,287. Everyone knows that these States have varied soil, varied climate, and, stretching from the southern end to the extreme northern end, all conditions of climate and all possibilities for development are presented both for agricultural and industrial purposes. Now, the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which can be safely compared with them, because they can not be said to be settled so largely with the foreign element as are New York and portions of Pennsylvania, contain an area of 139,405 square miles, and yet by the census of 1890 they had a population of 9,691,071.

If the same population per square mile existed in the three Pacific Coast States as existed in 1890 in these three Central West States, the Pacific Coast States would have had a population of 22,612,499, and, estimating the increased population from 1890 to 1900 at 25 per cent, their population to-day could be 27,134,998. Will anyone say that if these States were as thickly populated per square mile as are the three Western States to which I have alluded, the railroads would not have more traffic in the way of passengers and freight than they have to-day, even granting that the Nicaragua Canal carried the heavier freight and those travelers content with the slower passage?

Will intelligent, broad-minded men for a moment deny this proposition; and in view of its correctness will not all agree with me that no injury to the railroads could accrue by the construction of this great highway, which would be so important a factor in building up and developing the wonderful resources of the Pacific Coast States, but would it not rather be a positive benefit to the roads, and the holders of their securities, and to the citizens of our entire country?

Anything which tends to build up and develop the wonderful resources and make prosperous the people in any portion of our country can not but prove a benefit to the people of all other sections.

The construction of this canal would possibly double the value of every acre of farm land in the Pacific Coast States. The acreage of these three States is about 208,412,800, and an advance of $1 per acre of these three States alone would more than equal the cost of the canal.

There may be those here who think that my estimates as to the possible number of inhabitants of the Pacific coast are visionary, but let me say to them, and in a broader way, too, to the "doubting Thomases" all over our country who are talking about the danger which we may suffer from even proper emigration—and I favor only such—or from too rapid development within our own borders, that the figures I mention are really conservative. Just in this connection I take a moment to compare the possibilities of our country, and I hope, so far as within my power lies, silence the mutterings of the pessimists, who think we have reached the zenith of our power.

No one will question that France to-day is a fairly prosperous nation. Her people have shown wonderful recuperative powers after telling, adverse blows. Her fearful reverse in the conflict with Germany in the Franco-Prussian war and the large indemnity she had to pay was one of these, and the even greater disaster, from a financial standpoint, of the failure of the Panama Canal, which robbed her people possibly of $300,000,000, was another, and yet to-day France is a prosperous nation and is not overpopulated, else there would be greater immigration from her shores. France has an area of 204,177 square miles, and a population of 38,517,975 people. If California, Oregon, and Washington were as thickly settled as is France, they would contain about 62,000,000 people, or about the population of the entire United States in 1890. Comparing her area with that of the United States, not including Alaska, which has of itself an area of 599,446 square miles, or any of our new possessions, and supposing that we were as thickly populated per square mile as is France, we could have a population to-day of 583,433,650.

Let us go a step further. We know that Prussia is one of the prosperous countries of Europe and a part of one of the rapidly developing great world powers. Prussia has an area of 134,467 square miles and a population of about 31,855,123 people. If the three Pacific Coast States were as thickly settled per square mile as is Prussia, they would have a population of about 77,000,000 people, a population about equal to the present estimated population of the United States.

Great Britain has been the great industrial center of the world, although she is rapidly taking second place in some branches, compared with the United States.

The area of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, with the adjoining small islands, is 120,973 square miles, and the population about 38,000,000. If the three Pacific Coast States named were as thickly settled as is Great Britain to-day, they would contain 102,000,000 people. Just one more comparison: Omitting Alaska and our new possessions, were we as thickly populated all over the United States proper as is England, we would contain 971,470,000 people. These figures seem almost too great to comprehend, and yet you will notice that the comparisons I have made have been with three progressive nations and with peoples who occupy the highest positions in the world's civilization, and also with countries from which the percentage of immigration is but small, showing that their people are fairly prosperous and are contented.

Now, I think that if our people here would stop to consider for a moment these figures they would see how absurd is the course of those who would attempt to retard the development of the United States for fear that our pace is too rapid, or of others who say that we need to acquire foreign possessions in order to afford our young men opportunities in life.

Now, I am not going to enter into the discussion of the wisdom or lack of wisdom of our present foreign policy. Our soldiers are upholding our flag under the burning sun of the Philippines, and it is the duty of every loyal American citizen, so long as the soldiers remain there, to sustain them, not only with all the sinews of war, but words of good cheer and encouragement.

Some things are certain. First, that we have to solve the problem of the possession of the Phillipines; second, that we have to take our stand and endeavor to secure our share of the growing trade with the Orient. In order to do this it is necessary to shorten, as much as possible, the route between the great industrial centers on the Atlantic and the rapidly developing trade of the Gulf with the Pacific Ocean, not only for the benefit and for the purpose of rapidly developing our Pacific Coast States, but that we may also have a shorter route, under our own control, to reach by water from our Eastern coasts our new possessions in the Pacific Ocean. Not only would the canal play an important factor in this connection, but it would also be an important aid to our developing trade with the Pacific coast portions of South America, and will aid the Pacific Coast States, by way of the canal, to reach with their products the Atlantic coast countries of South America by a shorter and safer route.

Let us pause a moment to consider one or two practical matters. We have reached the stage of being among the greatest and in some respects the greatest industrial nation in the world. This is the fruit of that wise policy of protection advocated by the Republican party in season and out of season, when victorious or defeated, with a constancy that at times seemed heroic, when one considers the vile torrents of abuse that have been heaped upon the heads of some of us. Not a few Democrats believed in the policy, but lacked the courage to say so. That problem we have solved. The furnaces of the South are shipping 80,000 tons of pig iron within the next few weeks to Europe. The Phœnix Iron Company, in the Chester-Delaware district, has, in competition with foreign bidders, just taken the $4,000,000 contract for the greatest steel bridge in the world, to be erected at Quebec. We send cotton goods to China, farm implements to Europe and South America, locomotives and rails all over the world, and bridges to Egypt.

Now, another great problem presents. Will not the Democrats join us in solving it? We must place the American flag above American-built vessels, manned by American seamen and carrying the products of American skill and American farms into every port of the world. We paid out last year to the foreign owners of vessels built abroad and manned by foreigners $200,000,000 in gold for carrying freights which should have been carried in American vessels. We may have an opportunity to consider this question when another bill is before us, but I just introduce it to show how great are the various points which present in connection with the consideration of the great problem of developing our foreign trade, building this Nicaragua Canal, building vessels and fixing differential duties or subsidies to equalize the expense due to the increased pay to American sailors and the better provision which is made for their comfort in American vessels. It is not good government farming to pay others $200,000,000 per annum for doing what we could and should do ourselves.

It is estimated we can supply from our industrial establishments all the demands of our own people in eight months at most. Do the professional men of this body comprehend just what this means? Unless we pursue a broad, far-reaching national policy along many lines, we may find ourselves with our working people compelled to sit idle one-third of the time.

If we promote the American shipbuilding industry we will give work to thousands in the coal and ore mines, stone quarries, on the railroads, about the furnaces, mills, and shops in the construction of the necessary vessels. If we build up our merchant marine for foreign commerce we will also give employment to thousands upon the high seas and at our wharves. If we make possible the opening of foreign markets to the products of our factories, foundries, shops, and farms, we will give employment to more thousands in providing the cargoes these vessels will carry.

This canal, connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific, will be only about 168 miles in length and only about 26 miles of this will have to be through excavations; and yet, when completed, it will be of greater importance to the commercial world than the Suez Canal.

There is another practical point to consider in connection with this matter. Wherever our commerce goes, there must go, either on peaceful mission or as an evidence of the strong power of the United States, our Navy. We have already spent, since 1883, $98,529,511.85 for the building up of a new American Navy; we have under construction now vessels which will cost $62,570,610.23 in addition, and we are legislating for other vessels which will cost us about forty millions more. We have spent many millions for the building up of the navy-yards and proper dry docks; we will spend $6,000,000 for the rebuilding and proper equipment of the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Now, anything that will add to the effectiveness of this Navy is worth serious consideration.

Secretary Root, who, as an intelligent Cabinet officer, certainly has facilities for learning more than we of the purposes of foreign powers, says "we will have to be prepared in the near future to maintain by force the Monroe doctrine." If this be true, how better prepare than by building this canal, and thus almost doubling the efficiency of the American Navy?

In our recent Spanish-American war we all know how anxiously the people watched the movements of the Oregon, from the time she was separated from the victorious American fleet in the harbor of Manila, during the long days when she steamed over 14,000 miles around Cape Horn to join our fleet in the vicinity of Cuba. We know, too, how uncertain might have been the result there had the second Spanish fleet not attempted to go by way of the Suez Canal to reach Manila, but had sailed direct to join the first Spanish fleet in the Cuban waters and their united fleets had met our vessels in battle without the presence of the Oregon.

No one will seriously question that the chances are that any other great war in which we may have to engage in the future will be upon the seas, and the more rapidly we can concentrate our Navy, either in the Pacific or Atlantic Ocean, the more effective it will be and the greater return we will get—viewing it from an economical as well as a national standpoint—upon the investment made in its construction and expense incurred in keeping it in first-class condition by being able to use it quickly in either ocean. For this reason alone it would almost seem advisable to construct this great canal; but when we consider this in connection with the wonderful possibilities for the future development of our country we see how doubly important it is.

We have on the Atlantic coast, not counting the small indentures, 3,895 miles of general coast line to defend; on the Pacific coast, 1,810 miles. This is not counting Alaska, a country whose area, 599,446 square miles, is equal to about one-fifth of that of the entire United States, and whose coast line is over 4,750 miles, and of whose resources we are but beginning to learn the extent.

We have been expending millions in the construction of coast defenses. Who will question for a moment how much wiser it is for us to spend some of our millions in constructing this canal and doubling the efficiency of our floating forts—the American battle ships, men-of-war, and cruisers? Some hesitating ones may say that it involves too great an expenditure and should not be undertaken by the Government.

If consideration be given to some of the thoughts I have suggested, then will not all progressive men agree that the canal should be completed by the Government and that it should be owned and controlled by the Government? Not only that, I go one step further and say it should be built, owned, and the fixing of its tolls be in the hands of the United States Government without limitations or restrictions, even if, in order to obtain the right to so construct and own and control by the United States, it be necessary for us to compensate to a larger degree than is now purposed the Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. I take this ground not only because of what I have said in connection with our Navy, but for another reason.

Before the civil war we possibly carried one-half of all our exports and imports in American bottoms. To-day we carry less than 9 per cent of our exports and imports in American vessels. Last year, as I stated before, we paid to the owners of foreign vessels $200,000,000 for freight. We are considering even at this eleventh hour—and fifty-ninth minute, it might almost be said—the propriety of endeavoring to build up our foreign commerce by encouraging the construction of an American merchant marine. Men of breadth will not question the wisdom of this policy; and how can we better help do it than by building this canal and giving reduced rates on all tonnage passing through the canal, in either direction, to American vessels?

The Government to-day can borrow money on 2 per cent bonds, and these bonds be above par, while we have a Republican Administration. This canal could possibly be built for $100,000,000 or less, and accommodate the vessels of the size now afloat, or could be built for $130,000,000, or possibly less, and allow to pass through the largest men-of-war and largest merchant vessels contemplated. This latter would be the wiser course. The interest at 2 per cent would be from $2,000,000 to $2,600,000 a year, and if we get no return from this investment, save the increased efficiency of the Navy and carrying the commerce of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans in vessels in which our own people are directly interested to and from one ocean to the other through the canal, the money would be well spent. Our financiers can easily devise a plan by which this debt need not be paid off altogether by the present generation, but the bonds could be made payable in installments after a fixed period.

In ordinary business enterprises, where large expenditures have been made, far-sighted industrial leaders consider it the part of wisdom to add to the investments where such additions promise not only fair returns upon the increased investments, but also to add much to the return upon those already made. Such I would regard the expenditure upon this Nicaragua Canal. We have expended in the improvements of the rivers and harbors of our country about $353,000,000, and upon the Navy since 1883, coupled with what we now have in contemplation, about $207,000,000, making a total investment for our Navy and for the improvements of our rivers and harbors of about $560,000,000.

Now, if by the expenditure of $130,000,000 more we make the Navy doubly as effective in time of war, and possibly add so much to our coastwise and foreign commerce that we will make the $353,000,000 doubly useful, will anyone question that it would be a wise thing for us to build this canal, even if we get no other return upon it than adding to the returns upon the investments to which I have alluded and which we have already made? But I believe if this canal be properly constructed and properly managed that a fair revenue can be directly realized upon this investment without regard to these other two important matters. If I am correctly informed, the gross revenue from the Suez Canal during the past year has been about $18,000,000. If the revenue from the Nicaragua Canal were only half as much, and if one-half of this decreased revenue were required for operating expenses, there would still be left $4,500,000 to provide for the interest and the sinking fund.

Just another moment or two and I have done. We are paying out now over $145,000,000 annually in pensions to the veterans of the civil war. No one will question that this money is well spent, because we are teaching not only our own people, but we are proving to the people of the world that this great Republic of ours is not ungrateful. The effect of this large expenditure is to strengthen us not only among our people at home, but to strengthen us in the eyes of the world by building up such a spirit at home of devotion to our Republic that no foreign power would have the temerity to ever attempt to invade our shores. But if it be the part of wisdom to make this large annual expenditure for this purpose, is it not equally wise for us to encourage this great new enterprise, which would involve a total expenditure of less than the amount spent annually for pensions, and the annual interest charges would be one-fiftieth of the annual appropriations for pensions?

We are a great nation to-day, yet we are but in our infancy, at the end of the first century and a quarter of our national existence, in comparison with what it is possible for us to be; and the men of to-day who take the broadest view and look furthest ahead and legislate not only for the present, but for the great future that remains for our country, under God's wise providence, are the men who best serve the nation, themselves, their children, and their children's children.

HON. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
OF NEVADA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 198) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, Territories, District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise. The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I quite agree with the view taken by this side of the House, that the constitutional amendment now pending is a makeshift measure intended to meet a political emergency, and without any real, sincere, and honest intention on the part of the dominant party to have it finally enacted and make it a part of the Constitution of the United States. I believe that it has been intentionally framed in such a way as to violate Democratic theories regarding government and to alienate Democratic support, although it will require a two-thirds vote in this House, and although Democratic support is absolutely essential.

I believe in the amendments that are proposed by the minority of the Judiciary Committee—amendments which, while securing enlarged powers to the Federal Government over trusts, will at the same time clearly and unequivocally retain coordinate and concurrent powers in the States.

I regret that the rule has been adopted by the vote of the dominant party which denies us the opportunity to vote on these amendments. The opportunity to perfect the pending constitutional amendment by providing for equal power in the State government being denied us, the question is then as to what the action of the minority shall be.

So far as I am concerned, I intend to vote for this constitutional amendment, because I believe that the Federal Government should have enlarged powers for the dissolution and control of trusts, monopolies, and combinations, and I shall vote for the measure that gives those powers, even though it is not framed according to my individual views and those of my political associates, rather than obstruct and defeat the initial action necessary to its subsequent consideration by the people of the various States.

The Republican party is now in possession of all of the departments of the Federal Government, and the Senate of the United States is secure to that party for many years. The constitutional amendment that is submitted to the people of the States must necessarily be framed by the Republican party. So far as I am concerned, I will not take the responsibility of denying to the States the opportunity of adopting a constitutional amendment giving to the Federal Government enlarged powers as to trusts, and I shall vote for this amendment for the purpose of starting it on the course of legislation, so that it may go to the Senate to be perfected there if possible, and so that it may go to the people of the various States in order that they may render judgment upon it.

I do not believe that a constitutional amendment in this form will ever be accepted by three-quarters of the States; but I do believe in the benefit of discussion as affecting public opinion in a free government, and I am confident that the discussion of this measure in the Senate and the various State legislatures in the Union will formulate public sentiment as to what is right, practicable, and expedient in dealing with these great organizations of capital, which are advancing steadily toward the control of industrial conditions in this country.

Having made this preliminary statement, I will now take up the consideration of the constitutional amendment and the House bill presented by the dominant party in detail, and will consider the question as to the power of the States and the power of the Federal Government in controlling and regulating combinations, monopolies, and trusts.

POWERS OF THE STATES.

The power of the State over trusts, monopolies, or combinations organized, existing and operating within it, is ample. It has the power to regulate, dissolve, or destroy such organizations. If such organization takes the form of a combination between independent producers it can be reached by the courts in the exercise of common-law jurisdiction. If it takes the form of unity of ownership of plants heretofore independent by one great corporation, each State can, by its control over domestic corporations, their capital, their powers, and their field of enterprise, regulate, control, or destroy.

The State can, if it chooses, prevent foreign corporations from doing business within its boundaries, or it can put any limitations or restraints upon them as a condition for permitting them to do such business, but it can exercise no control over the extra State production of trusts or combinations organized in other States or the transit of their products from the place of production outside to the place of consumption inside its boundaries. It can not exclude such products from the State; it can not subject them to taxes or duties, for this would be an interference with interstate commerce, which is under the control of the Federal Government. The evil under which the country is suffering is that there are certain States in the Union which in return for certain benefits received from the trusts in the shape of taxes and other considerations, harbor these trusts, and such trusts created, organized, and manufacturing in the trust-protecting States, prey upon all the other States, and each State is powerless against the invasion of the products of the trust-protecting States.

It follows, therefore, that although a State possesses the most enlightened and efficient laws regarding the regulation, control, or destruction of the trusts, monopolies, and combinations within its boundaries, it is the victim of similar organizations in other States, and the domestic field of consumption is open to the products of monopolistic production elsewhere conducted by great corporations which destroy all competition by lowering their prices within the territory of competition and raising prices in the field of their monopoly, and thus without loss in the aggregate yielding to the localized loss which destroys all competitive enterprises. The laborers are also powerless against such combinations, for the corporation which has ten individual plants located in trust-protecting States can by discontinuing work at any individual plant bring its laborers there to terms without affecting its general business, and can thus by discontinuing work at each plant in succession starve its operatives into submission. Thus the individual capitalist and the individual laborer stand no chance against such gigantic corporations of extra State organization and operation.

The result is that the State which endeavors to regulate or prevent domestic combinations, simply loses the benefit of the local investment of monopolistic capital whilst its people are the victims of the enterprises of monopolistic capital conducted in States which harbor them for certain advantages received, and the State is powerless to protect them against the invasion of the goods produced by trusts in sister States, and against the schemes of such trusts cunningly devised to control trade and monopolize the field of consumption.

It is for this reason that the Federal Government is appealed to for a measure which will attack and destroy monopolistic combinations in the States which harbor them, and thus protect sister States from the invasion of trust-made goods.

FEDERAL POWERS.

The Federal Government can exercise such powers only as are conferred upon it by the Constitution or are necessarily implied from powers granted. Nine-tenths of the subjects which affect the industrial, social, and intellectual welfare of the people of this country are by our system of government left with and provided for by State jurisdiction. The domestic sovereignty of the respective States is by the Constitution of the United States deemed adequate to deal with practices which attempt to disturb or impede that welfare. The Federal Constitution assumes that the highest intelligence available to dissolve conditions hurtful to domestic prosperity is to be found in the center of domestic power. The sovereignty of the several States in all matters not granted to the Federal Government is admitted by every political creed, and has been so many times confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States that no one now questions it. The effects of vicious combinations in business are felt in the centers of domestic consumption. The injury done by trusts is measured by the local suffering therefrom. Such suffering is realized when the consumer fails to obtain at reasonable rates the articles dominated by such trusts, and also when the domestic producer finds that the markets for his products are made less available to him by such combinations. The power of States to expel from their territory combinations practicing extortion has been vindicated by the highest court of the Union. If domestic corporations forestall the markets they may be dissolved and punished by State authority. The people of the State prosper in proportion as they are self-reliant and possess the knowledge and courage to protect themselves. Their added strength in this respect strengthens the Union. The endurance of the Federal Government may be measured by the continuance of State independence. The Federal Government was created for specific purposes; its jurisdiction is limited to particular general topics.

The centralization of power in the Federal Government to administer this specific and general jurisdiction was wise. To unnecessarily enlarge that power and to unnecessarily embrace what was and is reserved to the States may change the whole theory of our Government and imperil the entire system. It would be equally fallacious, however, in matters affecting the entire country to withhold needed powers from the General Government at the prompting of loyalty to State rights. Whilst the people of the several States should realize that the power over illegal combinations is a domestic affair, and that they are now equipped with State authority ample to redress whatever injuries are inflicted upon them by domestic combinations, it is a mistake to contend that any State can protect itself against trust-made products of sister States and the countless schemes by which the monopoly of domestic markets is secured for such products. Whilst, therefore, we should keep clearly in view the power and the duty of each State to regulate and control domestic combinations, we should also keep clearly in view that the powers of the Federal Government should be exercised for the protection of the people of trust-regulating States against the combinations fostered by trust-protecting States. If such powers in the Federal Government now exist they should be exercised, and if not adequate they should be enlarged.

Now, what are the powers at present possessed by the Federal Government which can be invoked upon this subject? Congress has power, under the Constitution, to establish post-offices and post-roads, which involves the control of the mails; to levy and collect taxes, duties, etc., under which trusts can be taxed or duties can be suspended as to articles controlled by trusts; and the power to regulate interstate commerce, under which it is contended that the transit of trust-made goods from one State to another can be regulated or prohibited. Are these powers sufficient to reach the evil complained of?

MAILS.

Congress can prohibit the use of the mails by any organization which it considers unlawful or injurious to the public welfare. It can, therefore, declare that any combination organized for the purpose of monopolizing the manufacture, production, or sale of any article of commerce or for the purpose of preventing competition is illegal, and can forbid and prohibit the use of the mails of the United States in aid of such business, but I apprehend that the exercise of this power will be very unsatisfactory in the operation of trusts, as sealed letters do not betray their contents and regulation through the mails would be ineffective. Besides which the express and the telegraph could be used as substitutes for the mails.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

As to customs duties, the regulation is somewhat more difficult. It should be recollected that the complaint of a single State is that its competitive industries are prostrated and its people victimized by the invasion of trust-made goods of adjoining States. Is it wise to contend that the duties on articles monoplized, or partially monopolized, by American trusts should be removed in order that American markets may be invaded by the cheap-labor products or the trust-made products of foreign countries? Such a course would prostrate not only the American trusts, but their victims, for there is no occupation in the United States which is absolutely monopolized by a trust.

The paper trust, which is a familiar instance of the modern trust, has about 20 factories, and outside of it there are nearly 500 paper and pulp companies in the country. It is true that the paper trust, with its splendid plants, meeting every requirement of modern invention and improvement, produces 60 per cent of the entire American product, but the other American paper and pulp companies that are not in the trust supply the other 40 per cent. Would it be wise to abolish the present tariff duty of 15 per cent on paper for the purpose of crippling the paper trust, when its effect would be to cripple and perhaps destroy the five hundred and odd factories that are competitors of the paper trust? Would it be any benefit to the industries of this country to put all the employees of the paper trust and the five hundred and odd competitive paper mills out of employment and allow the cheap labor of Canada, with abundant forests near at hand, to supply all the paper used in this country? The trusts should be attacked inside the tariff wall, whether it be high or low, in such a way as to restrain or dissolve them, and at the same time preserve the individual and competitive industries that are engaged in similar occupations. A foreign club should not be used to destroy the domestic trusts when it necessarily also prostrates and destroys the struggling victims of such trusts, who should be assisted by our national legislation in their efforts to maintain individual effort.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXATION.

Would it not be better to use our powers of taxation in applying an internal-revenue tax, which would reach these great combinations alone rather than in removing the customs tax, which would prostrate both the trusts and their victims? The power of taxation of the Federal Government is ample. It can be used either to destroy or restrain, and it has been so used within our experience.

Thus, for instance, as to the undoubted right of State banks to issue currency under State statutes permitting it, the Federal Government does not deny the right, but it has seen fit to impose a tax of 10 per cent upon State-bank currency and thus practically to prohibit its issue.

So, also, with reference to oleomargarine. The beef trust had organized for the production and sale of oleomargarine upon a great scale. Oleomargarine was innocuous and resembled in appearance and taste the genuine butter. The use of this material was threatening the destruction of the dairy interests of the country, in which large amounts of capital were invested and hundreds of thousands of people were employed.

The States took hold of the matter, and by legislation within their own boundaries sought to protect the dairy interests and restrain the oleomargarine interest. Their legislation was, in the main, ineffective, and so recourse was had to the Federal Government for a far-reaching law. The result was that the power of taxation was so exercised by the Federal Government as to restrain the oleomargarine interest and protect the dairy interest. Thus oleomargarine was made a subject of revenue to the Government, and the tax imposed upon it served to limit its efficiency in competition with butter.

Here, then, we have two illustrations of the power of Federal taxation—one the power to destroy and the other the power to regulate and restrain. Why can not this power be used with reference to the modern trust? Through it two evils can be reached—one the monopoly of production by unions of capital and the other the escape of organized wealth under present conditions from the burdens of Federal taxation. The latter is one of the crying evils of the times. The whole tendency of Federal legislation has been to exempt accumulated wealth from taxation. The wealth of the country has been for years rapidly drifting into corporations. Stocks and bonds in corporations represent more than any other class of property the surplus wealth of the country, for the man who owns stocks and bonds has something which he has accumulated over and above his current wants and expenditures, and the best method of reaching the surplus wealth of the country is to tax corporations.

It is true that the income-tax decision has in a measure restricted the field of Federal taxation. It practically exempts real property and its income from internal-revenue taxation, yet the field of Federal taxation is still a large one, for it embraces all the transactions of business, and though the real and personal property of a corporation and the income therefrom can not be directly reached, yet every transaction in which such corporations engage may be made the subject of taxation by the Federal Government, and the taxes imposed may be classified in such a way as to restrain unions of capital in their monopolistic tendencies.

The purpose, then, of Federal legislation upon this subject should be to reach accumulated wealth and at the same time protect individualism. Taxes therefore imposed upon the transactions of corporations will accomplish both purposes. They will reach accumulated wealth and they will protect individualism, for the individual, freed from the handicap of such taxes, may be able to hold his own, and thus the handicap of the tax will preserve the equilibrium between individual enterprises on the one hand and corporate enterprises on the other.

It is true that it will take time to work out this problem wisely and justly, but there is no reason why progressive legislation, advancing with conservatism, step by step, should not ultimately surmount every difficulty.

The first step should be the organization of a bureau somewhat resembling that of the Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency, to which report should be made by all corporations, showing the amount of their capital stock, their bonds, their income, their transactions, their taxes, the number of operatives employed, the wages paid, and all the other data, which in time will present a mass of statistical information that will aid and guide legislation. Publicity itself will do much in the way of correcting evils, for definite statistics will suggest definite remedies.

The tax at first inaugurated should be moderate. It should reach at first only those great organizations whose evil effects on modern individualism is conceded, and reliance should be placed upon the statistics accumulated later on to furnish suggestions for additional tax legislation.

I shall append to my remarks a statement of the so-called industrial trusts which have been organized in recent years. It possibly embraces quite a number which would not properly come within that term, but it shows how important it is that reliable statistics should be obtained by the General Government regarding these great corporations. These statistics would be useful both in the framing of the tariff law and in the framing of the internal-revenue law. The capital employed and the profits made by these corporations in the manufacture of particular articles would indicate to what extent the duty imposed upon such articles should be protective or otherwise. It would also be instructive to know the amount of taxes paid by such corporations, for all the indications are that such corporations largely escape the taxes which are imposed upon and collected from individual enterprises of like nature. These corporations are the creations of the State, and it is right that the State should be informed as to their operation and conduct, and it is essential that the proper statistical information should be secured for the purpose of not only regulating the question of combination, but also for the purpose of regulating the question of tariff and internal-revenue taxation.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The national power most frequently invoked for the regulation of trusts is the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to regulate interstate commerce. Under this power it is contended that Congress may declare any combination, whether in the shape of a corporation or otherwise, formed for the purpose of controlling or monopolizing the production or sale of any article of commerce, to be illegal, and may provide for the forfeiture of all articles of commerce transported in violation of the provisions of law. It is also contended that under this power common carriers may be punished for transporting any articles which are the product of a monopoly or trust from one State to another.

It will be observed that the United States Government can not, in the exercise of its control over interstate commerce, break up or destroy a monopoly or trust operating in any State. It can only prevent such trust and monopoly from carrying on interstate trade. It has been decided by the Supreme Court that under this power Congress can not reach combinations for the control of production in any of the States of the Union. All it can do is to harass the transit of the articles produced by such combinations from one State to another. It is safe to say the evils of trusts and combinations will never be reached if the Government simply practices guerrilla warfare upon them through the exercise of its power regarding interstate commerce—the mails, the levying of customs duties, and the levying of internal-revenue taxes. These powers do not reach the real evil—the combining for manufacture and production—and they leave the combination in existence with full powers for manufacture and production, and subject only to harassing legislation which may be easily evaded.

BRYAN'S PLAN.

A much more effective way of reaching combinations engaged in interstate commerce would be to carry out the suggestion of Mr. Bryan by Congressional legislation requiring every corporation engaged in interstate commerce to be licensed by the Federal Government to do business in other States than that in which such corporation is organized, and requiring a sworn statement showing the nature of its business, the value of its plants, its issues of stocks and bonds, the taxes paid—in fact, all the statistical information essential to enable the Government to determine whether it is engaging in an attempt to monopolize the production or sale of any article. Under such an act corporations organized for monopoly could be prevented from engaging in interstate trade, and all the transactions of corporations engaged in interstate trade would be put in the light of public investigation and criticism, and publicity itself would necessarily tend to the limitation of the extraordinary powers now exercised by trusts. Under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution all discriminations and rebates and other unfair advantages in transportation could be prevented.

NEED OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

I have thus reviewed the powers of the States regarding trusts and monopolies and the powers of the Federal Government. It is apparent that the State can dissolve all trusts and combinations organized within it. It is apparent that the Federal Government has, under the Constitution as it now stands, no such power, but has simply the power to harass such a trust or monopoly in its operations. It is also apparent that those States which are disposed to exercise their powers in the dissolution of trusts are at the mercy of trusts organized in other States which are disposed to protect them, and as the arm of the State can not reach to and destroy such trusts, the Federal Government must be appealed to.

The power of the Federal Government, if it is to be exercised, ought to be as full and complete as that of the State government. If the one has the power to dissolve and destroy trusts, the other ought to have the same power and should not be limited to a mere guerrilla warfare upon trusts, which will prove annoying to business generally, and which will be weak and inefficient in operation. The power should be accordingly exercised both by the Federal and State governments. The State should have the power to dissolve trusts organized within its boundaries. Congress should have the power to dissolve trusts in trust-protecting States and prevent them from preying upon trust-regulating States.

The constitutional amendment proposed by the dominant party declares that Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise, and also that the several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States. It is contended by many of the minority that this constitutional amendment will withdraw from the States the powers which they now have as to the regulation or destruction of domestic monopolies and will vest such power absolutely in the Federal Government. The minority have proposed certain amendments which will secure concurrent powers in this matter both to Congress and to the States, and will prevent the absorption by Congress of the powers now exercised by the States.

I am entirely in harmony with these proposed amendments, and I think that good faith and a proper regard for the rights of the States demand that they should be incorporated in the proposed constitutional amendment. But the dominant party refuses to allow such amendments to be considered, and proposes to confine our vote simply to the proposition submitted by them. As a matter of political judgment, I do not think we should defeat the proposed constitutional amendment. On the contrary, I think we should send it to the Senate, where it will be submitted to a crucial criticism, such as we are not permitted to make under the arbitrary rule that has been passed. It may there be put in such shape as that all the States can approve it. As it is, the Senate will be Republican for at least five years; and as no constitutional amendment can be passed which does not have the sanction of that body, we must seek relief in the form presented by the Republican party or abandon all hope of efficient Federal relief.

The aim of Federal legislation should be to enable Congress, in the interest of the general welfare, to attack and destroy the trusts which are created by States that are selfishly harboring trusts for the purpose of local advantage in the way of taxes, employment of labor, and other considerations. As no State can reach such an evil in an adjoining State, the Federal Government must be appealed to, and its powers should be ample, not simply to harass, but to destroy.

The whole theory of democratic government is that power should be kept as closely as possible in the hands of the people in our municipalities, our county governments, and our State governments, and that only such powers should be conferred upon the Federal Government as are essential to the general welfare and the protection of all the States. Thus far the Federal Government has exercised all the powers conferred upon it regarding the mails, interstate commerce, customs duties, bankruptcy laws, and other matters in a manner generally beneficial to the entire country.

No one would to-day demand that any one of these powers should be taken away from the Federal Government and vested in the States, respectively. Experience has proven that an evil exists to-day which was unknown when our Government was formed, and which can be reached only by the Federal Government. If for the general welfare it is desirable that the Federal Government should have more power on this subject, is it well for us to deny it because the amendment conferring it is not framed or prepared as we would wish? Recollect that when Congress once defines a trust under this constitutional amendment, the States can pass laws in harmony with that definition, and can then enforce their domestic laws against the domestic trusts, so that we will have two powers operating—the State courts operating against the domestic trust, and the Federal courts operating against those great centers of production and manufacture in trust-protecting States which are preying upon sister States and victimizing their people.

I do not believe that there is any danger of an inefficient law being passed under the proposed constitutional amendment, for the dominant party that passed such a law would be driven from power by an indignant people. We can not assume that Mr. Bryan will not gain the Presidential chair or that the Democratic party will never be in power, and if we assume that the power under this Federal amendment will be inefficiently and insufficiently exercised, we indict our own leaders and our own organization.

Whilst, therefore, I prefer that the constitutional amendment should reserve in clear and unequivocal terms all the powers now enjoyed by the States, I shall not vote against an amendment which gives in clear and unequivocal terms to the Federal Government the power to destroy and dissolve trusts. I shall therefore vote for this constitutional amendment and shall vote for the amendments presented by the minority to the Littlefield bill, and if they are voted down I shall vote for the Littlefield bill, confident that I shall be sustained by my constituency in an honest effort to secure the full exercise of both Federal and State powers in the suppression of an evil which has thus far defied the lawmaking power of both the States and the Federal Government.

[2] A few of the trusts included in this list are not at this particular time in full force. In most such cases new agreements are pending, and it is unlikely that, having realized the benefits of combination, capital in these industries will long continue to compete with itself. Some trusts, like the Michigan Salt Association, are renewed every five years, or at other regular or irregular periods. The Paris Green Combine is likely to make its appearance during, or previous to, the potato-bug season.

[3] When a trust is incorporated the amount of capital reported as issued is usually taken, though it is often far above or below the actual capital employed. When not incorporated, the capital employed in the allied concerns is estimated.

[4] Unincorporated trusts pay no dividends, though they often make profits to the constituent companies. Sometimes the rate of dividends on preferred stock is averaged for two or more kinds of such stock. In bonded indebtedness several kinds of bonds are often grouped together.

[5] Estimated.

[6] Only typical trusts are taken in these industries. Such trusts are duplicated in many other cities or sections of the country.

[7] This association maintains prices of proprietary medicines by refusing to handle goods sold to wholesalers who cut prices. Similar local associations cover all sections of the United States and regulate prices of most leading articles. Jobbers and retailers have similar combinations in States, counties, and cities.

[8] Wholesale grocers' associations exist in all parts of the country. By means of rebates, etc., they assist the manufacturers of sugar, starch, baking powder, and of hundreds of other leading articles in maintaining uniform prices.

In the above list only the capital stock and bonds actually issued or proposed to be issued at once are given, when known. Some of the trusts in this list include trusts in the main list. Thus the United Fruit Company includes the Boston Fruit Company; the United States Flour Milling Company includes the Hecker-Jones-Jewell Milling Company, etc. Some of the trusts are under different names, since being formally organized. Thus the Chicago Sash, Door, and Blind Company probably includes but little more than the Sash and Door Combination; the American Shipbuilding Company is the incorporated name of the Steel Steamers Combination. Some of the trusts marked "forming" are so far advanced that retraction is hardly possible. Others have simply secured options on plants and are attempting to float the bonds and stocks.

Statue of Oliver P. Morton.

REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,

OF INDIANA.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, March 24, 1900.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That the statue of Oliver P. Morton, presented by the State of Indiana, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of the most eminent citizens and illustrious statesmen of the Republic.

"Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Indiana—"

Mr. BEVERIDGE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Great men are the instruments of God. They are His voice to the suffering, His shield to the oppressed, His hand for the building of nations. The Almighty needed his Maccabee, his Joshua, and his David as much as his John the beloved. Richelieu and Washington and Bismarck were his ministers as much as Luther or Wesley or Brooks. And just as truly was Oliver P. Morton one of the small group of mighty men who bore heaven's commission to establish the imperishable nationality of the American people; and fidelity to that trust is the key to all he ever said or did or was.

I do not believe that inspiration is confined to the dreamer of dreams or the singer of songs. Inspiration may glorify the doer of deeds as well. In a sense Oliver P. Morton was inspired when, in the midst of doubt, hesitation and beaconless purpose, he said: "I would rather come out of a seven years' struggle defeated in arms and conceding independence to successful revolution than to purchase present peace by the concession of a principle that must inevitably explode this Nation into small and dishonorable fragments;" and, speaking thus, voiced the loyalty of the land to the flag of the Nation. He was inspired when, on the very day and hour that Lincoln called for troops, he flashed back this message in response:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT OF INDIANA,
April 15, 1861.

To ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States:

On behalf of the State of Indiana I tender to you for the defense of the nation and to uphold the authority of the Government 10,000 men.

OLIVER P. MORTON,
Governor of Indiana.

And, speaking thus, made disgraceful all delay and left only action glorious. He was inspired when he hurled regiment after regiment into battle with all of duty's heroic sternness, and inspired when he cared for and comforted those soldier boys with all a mother's tenderness for her suffering child. His sanitary commission was as holy as religion; his military agency was as sacred as the church; his bureau of finance an institution divinely blessed as an instrument of the great purposes of God.

All this was done in a holy cause. A single passionate belief inspired his life—a single irresistible resolution. A Nation in reality the American people ought to be, and a Nation in reality he would give his powers to make us. To the current of this great purpose every act and word and thought of Oliver P. Morton was tributary. His statesmanship was Nationality. His loves and hates, his hopes and fears, were incidents to the mighty thought that glorified his life and made him mighty as itself.

He was himself an argument for his cause. All great men are God's incarnations of national life. A man like Morton makes sectional lines absurd. Washington was too great for Virginia; Hamilton too great for New York. Bismarck was too great for Prussia—he was, by divine right, the statesman of all the German people. And so we see that God has made all great men for all their people—not for a local subdivision of them. As civilization broadens, governments widen, men are great only as their powers and sympathies are large enough for all the people of their race. At the beginning the greatest man was great in his family alone. From families sprang communities. From communities grew petty states, and from these great nations with all their possibilities of commerce and art, of interchangeable industry and mutual helpfulness, of united power, collective achievement, the civilization of cooperation, the royalty of labor and the sovereignty of citizenship. And so in the hearts of the common people the inspiration toward nationality ever dwells. It is their instinct of power. That is why the common people of every land respond to their Alfreds, their Lincolns, their Cavours, and their Mortons. These seers of statesmanship behold in a consolidated nationality the sovereignty of the people, the prosperity of the people, the happiness and safety of the people; and so the people hear them gladly. No man is great except he serves the people and becomes the visible expression of the people's better thought and higher purpose. He who thinks to be great by serving self alone is ambition's fool, trifling with the lightnings of fate.

And so it was to the establishment of the people's nationality that Morton consecrated his giant powers. He was the Gibraltar of the Government in the West. Stanton and Morton were the imperial wills that held aloft the hands of Lincoln until victory came. So far as deeds and facts could make it so, Morton was Deputy President of the United States in active charge of the Ohio Valley. No man can tell what the result would have been had not some man like Morton been what and where our Morton was. Consider our position. Indiana was the keystone of the North. Indiana invaded, Chicago and Detroit taken, and the Confederate flag would have prevailed from lake to gulf. This territory was a necessary factor in any grand strategy the Confederacy might attempt. Portions of the State were gangrened with sympathy for the rebellion. The Knights of the Golden Circle, numbering 50,000 in Indiana, with $200,000 for the purchase of arms, actually planned a military uprising. Powerful men hoped to see Indiana the open gateway by which the hosts of the stars and bars might split the North in twain. Suppose a commonplace man had been in Morton's place? Think of the certain consequences had a Confederate sympathizer been the executive of this strategic State!

But Oliver P. Morton was governor of Indiana, and, instead of an inward swinging gate to the enemies of the Union, Indiana was made by Morton an entering wedge for the rending of the Confederacy. He did more. He made Indiana an example for every loyal State. He obliterated State lines for the purpose of patriotism. Before Ohio had equipped a single man, Morton had sent four regiments flying across her territory en route to Washington. The Confederates threatened Cincinnati. The proper authorities were laggard in responding; the frightened city turned to Morton. In fifteen hours 3,000 stand of arms, 24 pieces of artillery, with ammunition for both, two regiments of Indiana soldiers in Cincinnati's streets, proved that Morton's patriotism knew not the boundaries of States.

Morgan crossed the Cumberland; they wired the news to Morton, and back the answer flew: "One regiment leaves to-night, another to-morrow, two more next day." He knew neither night nor day in his terrific activity. The Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth regiments were mustered in by candlelight and started to the front before the break of dawn. The Government needed ammunition. Morton, on his own responsibility, established a great manufactory of the materials of war. Admiral Foote needed powder to bombard Fort Henry; Morton furnished it, and that stronghold fell. Most of the ammunition with which the battle of Shiloh was fought and won was supplied by Morton. Indiana's soldiers needed overcoats; the supply of the Government was short; Morton did not wait, but himself bought nearly 30,000 overcoats, paid for them, and, while the Government waited, Indiana's soldiers were kept warm. Indiana's treasury was empty from the very start; Morton raised on private paper more than $4,000,000. Such were the deeds of Morton. He was the Union's flaming sword all along the border. He was faith to the faltering, certainty to the doubtful, courage to the weak of heart, and an inspiration to every State and to every man throughout the entire Nation. Such activity in other days would be called unbalanced, ill-considered, neurotic. But it is the tempest-like activity and the instantaneousness of action which genius always has.

And all this time men planned his death. More than once they sought his life; one time their bullet barely missed its mark. These were the only men that Morton ever hated. He respected the enemy in the field—they were brave men fighting in a mistaken cause. But for the cowards who sought by stealth to kill the cause for which he had sent more than 200,000 Indiana boys to battle, Oliver P. Morton had a hatred hot as the thunderbolts of God. Yet when their leaders, condemned to death, stood in the shadow of the gallows, Morton interceded with the President and saved their lives—so close to the fountains of righteous wrath in the breast of this tender and heroic man the springs of mercy welled.

Morton's whole career was based upon profound belief in the common people—not the theoretical belief of the doctrinaire, not the simulated belief of the demagogue; but the living, vital, human faith of one who in himself is of the people. That is why he was a Nationalist. That was why he sent that telegram to Lincoln the very hour the President called for troops—he believed the 10,000 men he tendered would respond. Faith is the heart of deeds. That was why he built arsenals, bought provisions, equipped a quarter of a million of men for war—he believed the people would sustain him. That was why he pressed the ratification of the fourteenth amendment, and, as a Senator, the adoption and ratification of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That was why he championed reconstruction, based, as he declared, "upon the everlasting principles of equal and exact justice to all men."

Nearly a quarter of a century ago Morton proposed an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Presidents by the people. All his measures, all his deeds were based upon his faith in the people. He did not doubt, he did not underestimate the intelligence, the purity, and the patriotism of the masses. He did not believe in Matthew Arnold's doctrine of the "Saving remnant." He knew that if this Republic is to be saved the plain people must do the saving; that when men get too far away from the soil they cease to love it enough to die for it. He knew that nearly all the heroes of Lexington and Concord, of Vicksburg and the Wilderness, were toilers before they were soldiers.

And so Morton looked at every problem from the view point of the common people. He sprang from them—was one of them himself. His father was a shoemaker. He was himself a hatter. His association, till full manhood, was exclusively with the working classes. Let me again and again repeat that no one can understand Oliver P. Morton who forgets that, first of all, he believed profoundly in the plain people, whom Abraham Lincoln loved; and, second, that the passion of his life was to see this matchless people welded into an indivisible and immortal Nation. These vast characters attract the people by a sort of law of moral gravitation. The people trust them by an instinct that passes the wisdom of formal thought. The people know that these great characters are the agents of the eternal verities, even, perhaps, unconsciously to those characters themselves.

Inspired by such a faith and such a purpose, he put his will into his thought, and instantly they were facts. And his was the kingliest will of that heroic period. After all, courage is the royal element of human character. Stricken with paralysis, this Indiana shoemaker's son, this child and lover of the common people, went from the governor's chair to the Senate, and there, without experience or wide learning, he instantly became the leader of that glorious company of intellect and spirit and learning. And what a Senate it was!—a Senate to be a mediocre member of which was to be a distinguished man! Sumner was there, Conkling was there, Thurman was there, Edmunds and Carpenter and Logan were there. Distinguished men of the Nation who still are Senators of the Republic began their services with Morton—warriors and scholars and lawyers and orators, some of them statesmen equal to the greatest the world has seen. It was a time when America pointed proudly to her Senate and said, "These are representative of American courage and character and mind." And among them sat the Senator from Indiana, stricken unto death, yet lord and leader of those princes of the people.

And he knew that a republic can only be preserved by parties. He understood that principles were greater than personalities, and that a party standing for a principle is greater than any man standing for a personality. Therefore he was a partisan. A partisan like Morton is one who believes in the sovereignty of an idea. A partisan like Morton is one who would have theories reduced to practice. A partisan like Morton is one whose faith in essential things dissolves his discontent with incidentals—whose loyalty to an eternal belief is greater than any temporary representative of that belief. All the world's achievers have been such partisans. From Savonarola to Luther, from Cromwell to Gladstone, from Washington to Lincoln, the lords of human conviction and achievement have been for that very reason partisans of the cause they championed. Between a partisan of a cause and his opposite is all the difference between beliefs and interests, between convictions and investments, between a principle and an expedient. In this sense Morton was a king of partisans. He was a partisan of principle; but he was not the puppet of a machine—a distinction frequently forgotten. No man honored a conviction that differed from his own more than did Morton, the incarnation of conviction; no man so swift and terrible in wrath at wrong in his own party than he, its strongest leader.

America needs to-day more partisanship like that.

Courage and honesty, the gift of seeing things, and an appalling energy—these were the reenforcements that Morton brought to the Union. He was a bridled hurricane. And he saw things with that clear vision which, in another age, would have made men call him a seer. Morton saw through the hearts of men, understood the conclusion of the syllogysm of events, and so beheld the flag of the American people—man's last experiment in liberty—saw that dear banner, carrying with it the destinies of his country and the hope of all mankind, sinking from sight in the smoke of rebellion.

And so, with a passion we can not understand in these cold days, he spoke and wrought. But Indiana's soldiers understood him when he handed them their colors and spoke to them those words of fire at parting. They understood him when, suffering in the hospitals of pain, comforts and cheer and nursing came there from the old Indiana home, sent by the hand of their great war governor. They understood him when the soldiers of other States told them how they looked on Morton as their governor, too. I knew a family of soldiers, Ohio volunteers, yet such was the influence of that matchless man on loyal hearts from every State that in that household to this very day the name of Morton is second only to Lincoln as the best beloved of all our country's civil names since Washington. This Napoleon of patriotism was national in his activity. I have it at first hand from authority absolutely reliable that he made many secret trips to Washington to strengthen the decision of the President, perplexed with conflicting considerations and distraught with the double necessity of acting, and at the same time of holding together discordant elements essential to success, which decided action in any direction threatened to explode. I am told that Lincoln declared that Morton had more influence with that iron man, Stanton, than the President himself. If Lincoln was the great conservative, the genius of statecraft, the scientist of popular feeling, whose skill in the management of men made ultimate victory possible, Morton was the spirit of decision, moving the President to act when the hour had struck. There was none so great that he feared to tell them all his thought; none so humble that Morton would not listen to their suggestion and advice.

He frankly spoke his mind to all. That was the secret of his power in public speech. Every thought was to Morton a conviction. That is the characteristic of all great speakers. The only perfect argument is a truthful statement of your case. That is the method of all immortal words. Christ spoke as one having authority. The Declaration of Independence is not weakened by the expression of a doubt. John the Baptist never said, "I may be wrong." The man who influences men to die for a principle must be an intellectual absolutist. This was the method of Morton. He was not an orator as the term is used to-day—no tonguey man, no round-voiced, graceful-gestured carpet knight of words. I thank God he was not. Had he been he never could have touched the people's hearts as so masterfully he did. But he was an orator in the sense that the great apostle was. Oratory is the telling of a needful truth at an appropriate time by an honest man, who believes what he says so fervently that to his hearers he becomes a magnet of conviction; all else is merely entertainment by a skilled performer upon that wonderful instrument called human speech. The three model speeches of the world are the Saviour's Sermon on the Mount, the appeal of the Apostle Paul on Mars Hill, and the inspired words of Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg. These have no tricks, no tinsel, no flowers of wax; they are immortal in the simple majesty of the truths they so perfectly reveal.

Mr. President, Oliver P. Morton was an elemental man. He had the sincerity and simplicity of nature. He was the personification of the people who are always natural, always elemental, and in the end always—necessarily always—right. All great men are this. They have in them something of the oceans, the mountains, and the stars. In their presence the schemes of schemers seem illogical and absurd—seem like the houses of cards that children build. The road is always plain before these elemental men because they perceive, with the large vision of the seer, whither that road inevitably leads.

Such men have that courage which lesser men call folly, but which history always estimates aright, and to which the people in the end unfailingly respond. They do not hesitate to make their stand. They do not hesitate to act their thought. They do not hesitate to put their destiny to the touch. Indeed, their destiny, their personal fortunes, are the last items they consider. Their cause or their country alone is a thing of consequence to them. Such are all the inspired and inspiring characters in history. Such was Leonidas, such Cæsar, such Cromwell, such Bismarck—such the greatest of all the great, our unapproached and unapproachable Washington. Men like these found States or save them. Men like these clear the rugged and, to weaker men, the impossible way up the mountain, and, taking humanity by the hand, lead it upward to purer atmosphere and broader vision. And such was Indiana's titanic son, the elemental Morton.

The world is so much better than it ever was before. In all civilization no absolute autocrat wears a crown to-day. Men's minds as well as bodies, everywhere, are free. The inquisition is so impossible to-day that all its horrors seem the imperfect memory of a dream. Slavery is gone forever, and on the seat of independence, dignity, and power free labor sits enthroned. There is bread for all who work, and what within this generation were the luxuries of the few to-day are the necessities of all. Thought is free, speech is free; liberty at last is dwelling among the sons of men. All this we owe to the heroes of the people—those minds of light and lion hearts and wills imperial who voiced the people's thought, led the people's cause to victory, and enshrined the people's rights in the people's imperishable Nation. And among them stands our Morton, immortal with the immortality of deeds!

HON. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
OF TENNESSEE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 2, 1900.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. GAINES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: By the very words of his own lips I shall prove that the mouthpiece of the Administration on this floor—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]—is "unwise and unstatesmanlike" in that he and his party are advocating this proposed sixteenth amendment to the Constitution which will destroy the ancient and existing rights of the States over corporations. In a speech in this House December 15, 1899, about five months ago, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in powerful and unmistakable wise and statesmanlike words condemned such a measure and left us little room to believe that he would ever again fail to do his "plain duty." In this speech he said:

Mr. Chairman, I should not undertake to carry out the suggestions of Mr. Bryan and his supporters that Congress shall be authorized to legalize or destroy absolutely the corporations of this country in the different States of the Union. I believe in leaving to the States themselves the power to create and limit the operations of corporations, and I believe the suggestion that carries with it the limitation by Congress of the power of the States in this regard unwise and unstatesmanlike. A proposition that would curtail the power of the States themselves in the management of their local affairs, it seems to me, should shock every man and every intelligent American politician. I have said heretofore that I was a better Democrat than many of those who occupy seats upon the other side and who talk of Democratic principles in that regard. I do not believe in a recognition of power which would authorize the General Government to go into the States and undertake to interfere with domestic affairs or with domestic traffic and to say that such and such commodities shall not cross the line of the States, or which should undertake to limit or destroy the powers of State corporations.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield for a question.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman if the decisions of the courts in the last thirty years have not entirely changed the legal aspect of the interstate-commerce law? In other words, has not the doctrine, in a certain way, deprived the States of the very power the gentleman is now discussing?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, now, that opens quite a wide field. Would that be a justification why Congress should now undertake to assail the corporations of a State by legislation? I admit that there has been all over this country, in the State courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States, a growth of judicial interpretation. I admit that. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he knows I am right, and he knows that there is no great State of the Union that can say that this system of legal interpretation has not invaded the supreme authority of his own State. I admit that, but that is no reason why we should to-day undertake by Congressional action to destroy the power of the States to control and regulate their own domestic affairs in their own way. The States must finish the work so auspiciously begun by Congress and the Supreme Court.—Congressional Record, volume 33, page 345.

He now advocates this amendment, and will (and did) vote for it, possibly because he knew it would never pass Congress (even this House), and if it did it would never be ratified and become "the law of the land," or he may have really thought "there was nothing in it," but simply a campaign subterfuge to appease an enraged and trust-pillaged people until the next election has come and gone.

We all know Mr. Bryan never favored surrendering any rights of the States over corporations; on the contrary, he said at the Chicago trust convention this:

My plan is this: First, that the State has, or should have, the right to create whatever private corporations the people of the State desire.

Second, that the State has, or should have, the right to impose such limitations upon an outside corporation as the people of the State may think necessary for their own protection. That protects the right of the people of the State to say, first, what corporations they shall organize in their State; and, second, what corporations they shall permit to come from other States to do business in their State.

Third, that the Federal Government has, or should have, the right to impose such restrictions as Congress may think necessary upon any corporation which does business outside of the State in which it is organized.

In other words, I would preserve to the people of the State all the rights that they now have, and at the same time have Congress exercise a concurrent remedy to supplement the State remedy.

Mark his language:

I would preserve to the people of the State all the rights that they now have, and at the same time have Congress exercise a concurrent remedy to supplement the State remedy.

I was present at this trust conference, talked with Mr. Bryan before he spoke, when he disclaimed any intention to interfere with existing State rights, and heard this speech made just as I have read it.

Under existing Federal and State laws the "State has the power" to create, empower, regulate, control, and dissolve domestic corporations, and may "exclude foreign corporations entirely" when engaged in internal, local, or State commerce, even though, as in the Texas case, the foreign corporation was "incorporated" to do business "in Missouri and other States" (or interstate and State commerce) by buying and selling naval stores, oils, etc., as the statement of facts shows which accompanies the opinion of the court.

In this case this oil company violated the anti-trust laws of Texas, and under that statute its charter was forfeited, and it was excluded from doing any local, internal, or State trade within the State of Texas. The judgment entered by the trial court was affirmed by the court of civil appeals of the State of Texas, which judgment was reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, March 19, 1900, and reads as follows:

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the defendant, the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, be, and is hereby, denied the right and prohibited from doing any business within this State, and that the permit to do business within this State heretofore issued July 6, 1889, by the secretary of state of this State be, and the same is hereby, canceled and held for naught, and that said defendant, the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, its managers, superintendents, agents, servants, and attorneys be, and are hereby, perpetually enjoined and restrained from doing business within this State. Nothing herein shall be construed to in any way affect or apply to or prohibit said defendant's right to engage in interstate commerce within this State.

The defendant was forced to trial for its illegal acts of commerce in restraining the internal local or State trade done by it within the State of Texas. The trial court expressly excluded from the consideration of the jury the defendant's legal or illegal acts in restraint of interstate trade, to which action the defendant excepted, contending that the court could not put it on trial for its illegal acts done within the State because it was engaged also in interstate commerce. But the Texas court overruled this objection, and this ruling was expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that the courts of Texas had the right to construe a State statute, and that its action did not abridge any of the constitutional rights of the defendant, citing many authorities.

Justice McKenna said:

The transactions of interstate commerce were withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, and were also excepted from the judgment. * * * The statutes must be considered in reference to these contracts—that is, contracts pertaining to local commerce. In any other aspect they are not subject to our review on this record, except the power of the State to restrict their regulation to local commerce, upon which a contention is raised. It is based on the following provision:

"Every foreign corporation violating any of the provisions of this act is hereby denied the right and prohibited from doing any business within this State, and it shall be the duty of the attorney-general to enforce this provision by injunction or other proceedings in the district court of Travis."

The court continued:

The claim is, if we understand it, that the statute prohibits all business of foreign corporations, and hence is unconstitutional as including interstate business, and can not be limited by judicial construction to local business and the unconstitutional taint thereby removed.

Cases were cited which the court held did not apply, holding with the Texas court against the company.

Having stated that the Federal courts have the right to interpret Federal statutes, Justice McKenna said:

The courts of Texas have like power of interpretation of the statutes of Texas. What they say the statutes of that State mean we must accept them to mean, whether it is declared by limiting the objects of their general language or by separating their provisions into valid and invalid parts, citing 175 U. S., 348; 173 U. S., 404.

THE ANTI-TRUST ACT OF TEXAS CONSTRUED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The court expressly held that the "permit" to do business in Texas was subject to the acts of 1889 and 1895, which "provide for the forfeiture of the permit of a foreign corporation which may violate any of the provisions of the statute."

The court said and held:

The act [1889] in force when the appellant entered the State informed it that for a violation of its terms the permit to do business here (Texas) would be forfeited. This provision of the law was as much part of the obligation and as binding upon the appellant as if it had been expressly made part of the permit * * * and that [act 1889], as we have seen, imposes valid conditions upon the plaintiff in error, and their violation subjected its permit to do business in the State to forfeiture. (Waters-Pierce Oil Company vs. Texas, 177 U. S. R., page —.)

"Judgment affirmed," declaring the permit of this corporation "forfeited."

Justice McKenna, for the court, had already said:

The plaintiff in error is a foreign corporation, and what right of contracting has it in the State of Texas? This is the only inquiry, and it can not find an answer in the rights of natural persons. It can only find an answer in the rights of corporations and the powers of the States over them. What those rights are and what that power is has often been declared by this court.

A corporation is the creature of the law, and none of its powers are original. They are precisely what the incorporating act has made them, and can only be exerted in the manner which that act authorizes.

In other words, the State prescribes the purposes of the corporation and the means of executing those purposes. Purposes and means are within the State's control. This is true as to domestic corporations. It has even a broader application to foreign corporations—citing many cases.

As to foreign corporations, the court said:

Having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose.

Now listen particularly to this language:

They [the States] may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contract with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion.

The court, in support of its opinion, cites and approves many cases.

So we have the law now perfectly clear that even a "foreign corporation, incorporated * * * to buy and sell, in Missouri and other States, naval stores and oils"—combining "in restraint of State trade," contrary to antitrust-combine State laws—can be by the State excluded, and was in this Texas case excluded from doing that business in Texas.

Here is not only the law reannounced, but a case in point where (under a Democratic administration) a foreign corporation is excluded from the transaction of any local or State commerce within the State of Texas and its permit to do such business in that State forfeited. The State law is and was held to be supreme in such a case.

THE POWER AND DUTY OF CONGRESS IS TO CONTROL FOREIGN CORPORATIONS AND COMMERCE.

The anti-trust act of 1890 undertook to and does "prohibit" though not enforced, foreign and interstate trust combines, and the court so held in December, 1899:

In the Pipe case the court held:

Congress may * * * prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals * * * to directly regulate to any substantial extent interstate or foreign commerce. * * * The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly * * * regulate to a greater or less degree among the States. (175 U. S. R).

We then see that Congress can "prohibit" interstate trust trade altogether. We will now show that Congress can "prohibit" foreign and interstate corporations and combines.

POWERS OF CONGRESS OVER FOREIGN AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND FOREIGN CORPORATIONS AND BODIES DEALING THEREIN.

While the States have this full and complete power over domestic corporations or foreign corporations engaged in local or State trade, Congress has full and complete power to control interstate and foreign commerce and foreign corporations and bodies engaged in such commerce, and such laws have been held uniformly constitutional, as I will show later on. It is not only within the power, but it is, says the Supreme Court of the United States, the "duty," of Congress to exact in such business and from such associations "any guaranties it might deem necessary for the public security and for the faithful transaction of business," * * * and, as Mr. Bryan says, it "ought to exercise it."

The State of Kentucky undertook to tax Crutcher, the agent of an express company doing interstate and local business, and undertook to justify this tax as a police regulation. Held unconstitutional for the State to levy this tax on interstate commerce, but also held it was within the power and it was the duty of Congress to protect the people from these foreign or interstate corporations and associations.

The power is squarely admitted in and the duty enjoined on Congress.

The Supreme Court of the United States says: Congress has the power, the prerogative, and it is its duty to provide for the security of the people of the United States in relation to foreign corporate bodies or foreign individuals with whom they may have relations of foreign or interstate commerce. This the court held was the law in Crutcher vs. Kentucky (141 U. S., 57), citing many cases. It has been reaffirmed.

This is the rule laid down by Justice Bradley in the leading case of Crutcher against Kentucky. Let us, then, assume that the States have no power to regulate or exclude foreign corporations engaged in foreign or interstate commerce and local, internal, or, State commerce. It is perfectly clear that Congress has the full power to exclude foreign corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or both, and that it is the duty of Congress to protect not only the people of the United States, but of the several States or any State, from such business or corporations. Thus we see Congress can exclude such corporations entirely from the State, while the States can exclude such of them as are engaged or who want to engage in local, internal, or State commerce. Combining, then, the two powers—Federal and State—the trust evil is met, State and national, and crushed. But, as we see from the Texas case, a foreign corporation dealing in interstate and State commerce can be and was in that case prohibited from doing internal business in the State of Texas. We will now read from the Crutcher case, that exploits the power and duty of Congress under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

THE DUTY AND POWER OF CONGRESS TO PROTECT THE PEOPLE FROM FOREIGN OR INTERSTATE CORPORATIONS OR COMMERCE.

Crutcher vs. Kentucky (141 U. S., 57), the court says:

Congress would undoubtedly have the right to exact from associations of that kind (foreign or interstate commerce) any guaranties it might deem necessary for the public security and for the faithful transaction of business; and, as it is within the province of Congress, it is to be presumed that Congress has done, or will do, all that is necessary and proper in that regard. * * *

It has frequently been laid down by this court that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as absolute as it is over foreign commerce. * * * The prerogative, the responsibility, and the duty of providing for the security of the citizens and the people of the United States in relation to foreign corporate bodies, or foreign individuals with whom they may have relations of foreign commerce, belong to the Government of the United States, and not to the governments of the several States; and confidence in that regard may be reposed in the National Legislature without any anxiety or apprehension arising from the fact that the subject-matter is not within the province or jurisdiction of the State legislatures. And the same thing is exactly true with regard to interstate commerce as it is with regard to foreign commerce. No difference is perceivable between the two (citing many cases). * * *

The court happily says the "prerogative" belongs to Congress; the "responsibility" is on Congress; the "duty" devolves on Congress. To do what, I ask? To protect the people of this country against injuries or threatened dangers at the hands of foreign "corporate bodies" or foreign "individuals" in matters of foreign and interstate commerce.

Why, then, do we want an amendment to the Federal Constitution to protect the people in foreign or domestic commerce or from foreign or domestic corporations? Congress, we see, has full and complete power as to the former, while the States have full and complete power as to the latter, with the additional power to exclude foreign corporations dealing in State commerce. I will now show that Congress has for more than a century prohibited foreign commerce by constitutional laws uniformly upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States; that this court has repeatedly said that the power over foreign commerce was no greater than the power of Congress over interstate commerce (Crutcher and Brown cases cited); that Congress has repeatedly passed valid laws prohibiting interstate and foreign commerce; that the power of Congress over interstate and foreign commerce knows no limitation except the Federal Constitution itself. (Pipe case, and Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat.)

Mr. Bryan, in the National Watchman of January 11, 1900, suggests that this power over Congress should be invoked to protect the people against foreign corporations and bodies dealing in interstate or foreign commerce. He says:

As the Constitution gives Congress legislative control over interstate commerce, it would seem to follow that Congress might impose any reasonable restrictions necessary for the protection of the public from monopolies.

The corporation would have in its possession the evidence necessary to secure a license, and it would be no hardship upon it to require it to present that evidence to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to some other body authorized to grant licenses.

Progress is made along the line of least resistance. The license system secures the desired results with but little annoyance to legitimate business. The honest corporation, with honest stock, engaged in honest industry, will find it easy to secure a license, and ought to welcome any system that will protect it from a dishonest corporation, with dishonest stock, engaged in an effort to establish a monopoly.

In answer to the contention that the restrictions above proposed would interfere with the right of a citizen to the free use of his money and property, it may be remarked that there is a material difference between the natural person—flesh and blood and conscience—and the fictitious person called a corporation.

From these adjudications we in brief gather the following as the law:

1. That the States have the power to exclude entirely or admit and regulate foreign corporations engaging in commerce done within the limits of the State, and can require "security" from them to protect the people in their relations with them, in the "discretion of the State."

2. The States have the power to exclude a foreign corporation "incorporated" to do or that is doing a foreign and interstate commerce, or either, and State commerce in addition, in so far as such corporation engages in State commerce.

3. That the States have not the power, but Congress has, to regulate or exclude a foreign corporation that is engaged solely or "strictly" in interstate or foreign commerce or which is employed by the Federal Government in the transaction of Federal business, which is the same thing as interstate commerce, as the court declared in the Pembini and Telegraph case.

MR. BRYAN'S BALTIMORE SPEECH.

We also know this Chicago speech was made before the Addyston Pipe case was decided in December, 1899, which removed all doubts as to the power of the States and Congress over commerce. After this case was handed down, Mr. Bryan in Baltimore last January said:

You ask me what you can do. I do not mean to say that there is but one remedy, nor do I mean to say that there is no better remedy than the one I suggest; but I believe there is an easy remedy that will make monopoly impossible. The Constitution has given to Congress control over interstate commerce. There are certain things which the State can do—and I would not take from the State a single power that it now has—to destroy the trusts. [Applause.] Place upon the corporation from the outside doing business in the State such limitations as the people of the State may think necessary for their protection. I will go further than that.

I believe the State should be permitted, if it pleases, to exclude any outside corporation from doing business in the State, for while the natural men in different States may compete with one another, I do not believe that an individual in one State must suffer competition with a fictitious person created in another State, and regulated by laws beyond the reach of people living outside of that State. But after the State has done all it can, I believe the power will not be complete over monopoly, for the State can only stop the monopoly at the State line, and if a monopoly has forty-four States in which to work, it may be able to get along without the forty-fifth; but if you will stop the corporation when it attempts to go out of its own State, there can not be any monopoly, because it is shut out of the other forty-four.

And I believe that Congress has the power, and ought to exercise it, to say that no corporation organized in any State shall do business outside of that State until it secures permission from Congress, or some body created by it, and that permission can be granted only when the corporation shows that there is no water in its stock, and that it is not attempting to monopolize any branch of business or the production of any article of merchandise. [Applause.]

He says: "And I believe Congress has the power, and ought to exercise it," to protect the people against foreign corporations.

However, the Texas court, through Justice Fisher, and Justice McKenna for the Supreme Court of the United States, recognized an "exception" to this power of a State to "exclude" a foreign corporation, if engaged in "strictly" interstate or foreign commerce. This oil company was engaged in interstate and State commerce, and was being tried for violating the Texas anti-trust statute prohibiting restraints in State commerce. The trial court properly, as Justice McKenna held, separated the two businesses, the interstate traffic and State traffic, and tried it for unlawful transactions in State commerce only and forfeited its permit.

This "exception" to the old rule, excluding "foreign corporations entirely," was first recognized, I believe, in the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company (employed by the Government), 96 U. S., page 1, and the Florida statute excluding the latter corporation from Florida was held invalid as an unconstitutional interference with a governmental means of interstate commerce in behalf of and at the instance of the Government. Justice Field says, in 125 U. S.:

This qualification of the ancient power of the State to exclude foreign corporations entirely was expressed in 91 U. S., 1.

This was, it seems, the first departure from the old law. Justice Fisher, for the Texas court of civil appeals, said:

Except where the foreign corporation is in the employ of the Federal Government, or is engaged strictly—

The word "strictly" is used in 125 U. S. by the court—in matters of interstate commerce such bodies are entitled to no rights or privileges except those which may be conferred upon them as an act of grace by the State. (19 Texas Civil Court of Appeals, 19-20; S. C., 44 S. W. R., 930, citing 125 U. S., Pembini Mining Company vs. Penn.)

The Texas court held in this case (reaffirming a case in 90 Texas, 298, against the Pabst Brewing Company, wherein contracts were held nonenforceable because this foreign corporation had unlawfully restrained local commerce in Texas in making said contracts), did not aim at and did not apply to foreign corporations engaged in "strictly" interstate or foreign commerce, but at domestic and foreign corporations engaged in restraint of local or State commerce. Here is a clear, clean-cut distinction made, and adjudication of the power of the State to punish foreign corporations not engaged in strictly State commerce, but which was engaged in interstate commerce and in State commerce also, and the power and right of the State to separate the one from the other and punish for those illegal acts done as a part of a foreign corporation's business within the State lines, and the Supreme Court of the United States held such a distinction and judgment was valid. This, I think, is a nice question met, settled, and no longer an open question.

Justice McKenna cites the case of Pembini (supra) and approves it, with the later case, Hooper against California (155 U. S., 648), wherein an insurance company (foreign corporation) was held amenable to the laws of California. Justice White collected all the authorities touching upon the rights of foreign corporations in the States. He says:

The principle that the right of a foreign corporation to engage in business within a State other than that of its creation depends solely upon the will of such other State has been long settled, and many phases of its application have been illustrated by the decisions of this court—

Citing many cases—

Whilst there are exceptions to this rule, they embrace only cases where a corporation created by one State rests its right to enter another and to engage in business therein upon the Federal nature of its business. As, for instance, where it has derived its being from an act of Congress and has become a lawful agency for the performance of governmental or quasi governmental functions, or where it is necessarily an instrumentality of interstate commerce, or its business constitutes such commerce, and is therefore solely within the paramount authority of Congress. In these cases the exceptional business is protected against interference by State authority. The reasons upon which the exceptions to the general rule are based have been often explained.

Justice White, we see, recognizes this "exception" to, but reaffirms, the old rule, and quotes in substance what Justice Bradley said in the case of Crutcher against Kentucky, found in 141 U. S., wherein that State undertook to tax the agent of an express company engaged in Kentucky in carrying on State and interstate trade. Note well the tax was on the agent, whose business was both State and interstate, no effort being made to confine the tax to business done by the agent entirely within the limits of the State, but upon both businesses, State and interstate, the statute imposing the tax making no distinction.

Justice Bradley, in observing that the statute was sweeping in its application, and that the tax could be, as has been done, levied

"exclusively on the business carried on wholly within the State," said:

T? a case—

Which I have last stated—

is entirely different from that of foreign corporations seeking to do business which does not belong to the regulating power of Congress.

The court specifically, then, gives adjudged instances where the power of a State to tax or exclude the foreign corporations has been upheld, saying:

The insurance business, for example, can not be carried on in a State by a foreign corporation without complying with all the conditions imposed by the legislation of that State. So with regard to manufacturing corporations and all other corporations whose business is of a local and domestic nature, which would include express companies whose business is confined to points and places wholly within the State. The cases to this effect are numerous. (Citing many cases. 141 U. S., Crutcher's case.)

Justice Bradley cites the case of the Cook Manufacturing Company (113 U. S., page 727), repeatedly reaffirmed, which was a "manufacturing" foreign corporation of Ohio trading in Colorado contrary to the Colorado constitution, which ordained:

No foreign corporation shall do any business in this State without having one or more known places of business and an authorized agent or agents upon whom process may be served.

And by statute carrying this provision into effect provided—

Foreign corporations shall, before they are authorized or permitted to do any business in this State, make and file, etc. * * * And such corporations shall be subjected to all liabilities, restrictions, and duties which are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character organized under the general laws of this State, and shall have no other or greater powers. (Ib., 728.)

In a subsequent (foreign mining corporation) case this constitutional provision was again squarely upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in Fritz vs. Palmer (132 U. S., 288), and the court said:

No question is made in this case—indeed, there can be no doubt as to the validity of these constitutional and statutory provisions, so far, at least, as they do not directly affect foreign or interstate commerce. (Fritts vs. Palmer, 132 U. S., 288; citing Cooper Manufacturing Company vs. Ferguson, 113 U. S., 727.

Justice Field, speaking for the court, says:

It is not every corporation, lawful in the State of its creation, that other States may be willing to admit within their jurisdiction or consent that it have offices in them; such, for example, as a corporation for lotteries. And even where the business of a foreign corporation is not unlawful in other States the latter may wish to limit the number of such corporations, or subject their business to such control as would be in accordance with the policy governing domestic corporations of a similar character. The States may, therefore, require for the admission within their limits of the corporations of other States, or any number of them, such conditions as they may choose without acting in conflict with the concluding provision of the first section of the fourteenth amendment. (125 U. S., 189; Pembina Mining Company vs. Pennsylvania—cited and approved in the Texas case.)

PROPOSED AMENDMENT DOES WHAT?

The second section of this proposed amendment will strip the States of their ancient and existing rights over domestic trusts, monopolies, corporations, or combinations. It reads as follows:

Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise. The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

Suppose Congress defines a trust, monopoly, corporation, or combination. The States by this amendment are prohibited from differently defining them, even if they have any power left them to define them at all. They can not add to nor take from such definition, because such an act, by the very words of this amendment, would be "in conflict with the laws of the United States," and therefore void. Or suppose Congress should incorrectly, or inadequately, or insufficiently define or describe a trust, monopoly, or combination; the States would be without power to correctly, adequately, or sufficiently define them, although the people in a particular State or States might be, as now, suffering by the oppressive actions of these concerns.

The States must, if this amendment is made "the law of the land," be mute, and appear deaf to, although they may hear, the wail of the people against these combines. Or suppose again that Congress should fail altogether to define these combines or to legislate against them. Would not the power of the State to legislate on the subject at least be doubtful, since this amendment ordains that Congress "shall have the power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve trusts," etc.? What powers do the States reserve, or are reserved to the States in this amendment? As the law is, the sole power is "reserved" to the States to control internal, home, or State commerce (154 U. S., 470). Can the States legislate if Congress fails, when we remember that the existing Constitution ordains that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

This provision alone would make the proposed amendment "the law" of our entire domain, and if the power is given for Congress to "define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts," etc., what power is left by this amendment to the States to do so? If you say the power is concurrent, and both Congress and the States legislate, the legislation must be the same, otherwise they would "conflict."

Why have two laws for the same offense?

Again, would not the courts of the United States and the several States conflict and clash?

Do we want this?

Again, suppose a particular State, to cultivate some local industry, desired to incorporate a company and Congress should say no, or should dissolve it. Congress could, under this amendment. Do we want this? In such event the State would have to surrender. In short, this proposed amendment paralyzes and dwarfs the States, destroys local self-government, and inaugurates a centralized or imperial government in its stead, and that, too, when there is no necessity for it. Exercise the powers we have and enforce existing statutes, and amend them if necessary, and maintain local self-government that we set out to do more than a century ago. This is our plan.

THE POWER OVER INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE AND WHAT CONGRESS HAS DONE TO PROHIBIT IT.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that Congress now possesses all-sufficient right and power to "regulate" or "prohibit" interstate commerce under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Having this prerogative, sovereign and complete within itself, we have only to invoke its full operation to destroy all "interstate" trust commerce, of the evil of which the people rightfully complain. With Congress to paralyze, under its commerce power, all "interstate" trust commerce, coupled with the anti-trust laws which the States have, or can enact and enforce, we will have all the anti-trust laws that we need throughout the broad domain of our fair country. These powers, Federal and State, fully invoked and cooperating, will cover our entire domain and crush the trusts. We want the powers the Federal Government, States, and organized Territories have enforced, and if we then fail, a constitutional amendment can be enacted.

The commerce power of Congress is found in section 8 of the Constitution, and ordains that—

The Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and amongst the several States and with the Indian tribes.

The distinguished chairman of the committee reporting this bill [Mr. RAY of New York], in response to my inquiry to-day, said:

Yes; Congress has full power to control interstate commerce.

Let us see what laws Congress has enacted not only regulating but prohibiting interstate and international commerce:

1. The Wilson tariff law of 1894 prohibited the importation of convict-made goods in these words:

That all goods, wares, articles, merchandise, manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited, etc.

This prohibitory provision was carried into and is now a part of the Dingley tariff law. So in recent legislation both the advocates of the Wilson tariff law—the Democrats—as well as of the Dingley tariff law—the Republicans—are committed to the admission that Congress under its commerce power has the right to prohibit foreign commerce, and, as I will show later on, interstate commerce, too.

2. The old laws prohibiting commerce with France and England, known as the embargo acts, were held constitutional as a proper exercise of the commerce power of Congress. They were generally discussed and approved in the Clark vs. Field case (143 U. S.), where the McKinley tariff law was brought in question. Mr. Cooley, on the principles of the Constitution citing cases at page 70, says the embargo acts were a constitutional regulation of our commerce powers, and adds:

The power that controls commerce from the very nature of things includes the power to restrict and limit—to prohibit as to certain things and to suspend altogether when, for the time, it seems wise. It is a sovereign power and knows no limit.

Again:

The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. (Brown vs. Houston, 114 U. S., 622; Crutcher vs. Kentucky, 141 U. S., p. 47).

3. Congress has prohibited commerce with the Indian tribes even within the limits of a State, and all manner of trade with them except by persons duly commissioned (act August 15, 1876), and has empowered the President to prohibit the introduction of certain articles of commerce into Indian Territory (United States Revised Statutes, 2132). Congress has prohibited the exportation of cattle from Indian Territory for trade (United States Revised Statutes, 2138) and the sale of liquors to Indians (ib., 2139).

These laws have all been held constitutional, and the power is unquestionable.

Chief Justice Taney, in the celebrated license cases (5 Howard, 504), enunciates the same doctrine:

Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what articles of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may therefore admit or not, as it shall seem best, the importation of ardent spirits.

And in United States vs. Forty-three gallons of whisky, etc. (93 United States, 188), it was likewise held that—

Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians.

In United States against Holliday (3 Wallace, 407) it was held that—

The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of the selling of ardent spirits to an Indian under the act of February 12, 1862.

By that act Congress made it penal to sell spirituous liquors to an Indian under the charge of an Indian agent, although it was sold outside of any Indian reservation and within the limits of a State. The act is constitutional under the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes.

We have seen from the cases above cited, based, as all our commerce law in question is, on the leading case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton), that the power to regulate interstate commerce is as complete as the power to regulate international commerce, and we see that Congress has the power, and has exercised it constitutionally, to actually prohibit international commerce.

Then why should Congress hesitate to prohibit interstate trust commerce? It clearly has that power and undertook to exercise it in the antitrust act of 1890.

In the recent Pipe case (175 U. S.), Justice Peckham, for the whole court, says:

The reasons which may have caused the framers of the Constitution to repose the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress do not, however, affect or limit the extent of the power itself.

In Gibbons vs. Ogden (supra) the power was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution.

Under this grant of power to Congress, that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void and prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes, regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce. (And when we speak of interstate we also include in our meaning foreign commerce.) We do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to the individual to enter into private contracts limits the power of Congress and prevents it from legislating upon the subject of contracts of the class mentioned.

The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

* * * * * * *

The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

We can not so enlarge the scope of the language of the Constitution regarding the liberty of the citizen as to hold that it includes or that it was intended to include a right to make a contract which in fact restrained and regulated interstate commerce, notwithstanding Congress, proceeding under the constitutional provision giving to it the power to regulate that commerce, had prohibited such contracts.

We then see here, from the latest utterance, that Congress did "prohibit" interstate commerce trust combines, and that such a prohibition does not trench upon that liberty of the citizen the Constitution guarantees. In the other two leading cases—The United States against Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505) and the Missouri transportation case (166 U. S.)—the court holds that Congress has the power to prohibit interstate trust commerce which is interstate commerce.

4. Congress has prohibited the importation of adulterated or unwholesome food or drugs and other things injurious to health (acts August 30, 1890, March 2, 1897) and the importation and exportation of diseased cattle (act August 30, 1890), and interstate commerce in diseased live stock (act May 29, 1884), and the exportation of slaughtered meat (act March 3, 1891).

5. Congress has prohibited the immigration of idiots, insane persons, criminals, polygamists, and Chinese (acts March 3, 1891, March 3, 1894, August 3, 1882, March 3, 1875). See the authorities touching upon these various acts and the power of Congress to enforce them in Desty's Federal Constitution, and Prentiss and Egan on the Commerce Clause of the Federal Constitution, page 387, etc.

6. Only a few days ago Congress passed what is known as the Lacey bird bill, prohibiting the sale and transmission, of birds killed in a State prohibiting their killing, to another State, which, as the author of the bill, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], admitted in his speech, was based upon the right of Congress to prohibit interstate commerce.

7. Congress a few days ago passed a bill allowing the States to prohibit the introduction of convict-made goods in the several States that may refuse their admission.

8. In 1888, May 22 (RECORD, volume 92, page 4533), the House, by vote of 185 to 44, passed a bill prohibiting convict-made goods from being shipped from one State to another. Our most notable Republicans and Democrats in that Congress supported this measure—Mr. Speaker HENDERSON, President McKinley, Representatives GROW, GROUT, HOPKINS, CANNON, DALZELL, BROWN of Ohio, Dingley, Senator BURROUGHS, Senator GEAR, Senator LODGE, Senator MASON, and many leading Democrats.

Now, in the face of the action of Congress here shown for over a hundred years in prohibiting—not simply regulating, but prohibiting—international and interstate commerce, can any fair-minded man halfway patriotic longer dispute that Congress has the power to prohibit interstate and international commerce? For a hundred years Congress has enacted such legislation, and the court has uniformly upheld such laws.

Why, then, should not Congress prohibit interstate trust commerce?

The Democrats will when they get into power, March next, Congress with the full power to regulate commerce, why do we need an amendment to the Constitution to control interstate commerce, unless we desire to crush and paralyze State rights and turn over all the power that now exists in the State to Congress? We have lived happily for more than a century under our dual form of government, Congress having certain granted powers and those necessarily implied to execute these grants, with all the other powers and rights reserved to the States and the people by the express words of the Constitution. Even if this amendment were offered in good faith, I would oppose it, because Congress has full power to controll interstate commerce and the States have the balance of the power to legislate on State commerce, and most of them have done so or will do so, and those who refrain can bear the ills that follow such an omission until they are whipped into active concert with their sister States.

Tennessee has drastic anti-trust laws enacted by and vigorously enforced by Democratic officers. Under this law, in recent years, we have crushed a coal combine, an ice trust, a patent-medicine trust, and possibly others I do not now recall, while amongst the first cases under the anti-trust act of 1890 was one wherein Judge Key, a Democrat, dissolved a coal combine in Nashville, Tenn., while the Addyston Pipe case was begun in Chattanooga by a Democratic district attorney under the direction of the Cleveland Administration.

Every Democrat in Tennessee is proud of the anti-trust record of her Democrats. Every Democrat in Congress from Tennessee in 1890 voted for the anti trust act, improperly named "Sherman law," drafted by Senator Edmunds, except one section by Senator VEST, as Senator VEST informed me a few days ago, and every Democrat in Congress from Tennessee to-day will vote against this constitutional amendment and for the amendments of the minority to the Littlefield bill in their efforts to perfect that measure, which is a step in the right direction, and then, if they fail, will, as a unit, support the Littlefield bill. That bill contains several provisions that I suggested in a bill filed January 3, 1900, and in two speeches in this House, suggesting in them, as I proposed in my bill, amendments to the present anti-trust law. My suggestions were these:

REPUBLICANS ADOPT THE ANTI-TRUST SUGGESTIONS OF DEMOCRATS.

1. That interstate and State trusts and monopolies be excluded from the use of the mails in the transaction of their business, just as we did in the Louisiana Lottery and other cases. This bill only excludes trusts found guilty under the Federal law—but a good halfway invocation of this postal power.

2. That the people be given the right to go before our grand juries and indict these objectionable trusts and combines and to enjoin or sue them for damages, with reasonable attorney fees if successful in the civil cases.

3. That the district Federal judges be required to specially instruct the grand juries on this law at each term of court.

4. That the testimony given before grand juries should be privileged.

The Littlefield bill was not introduced until April 7, 1900—nearly three months after my bill—and these four suggestions of mine were made amendments thereto by the committee reporting it, and yet that bill is contended by the Republicans to be a Republican measure! I intended to introduce certain amendments to the anti-trust act of 1890 and did so all the more gladly that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. GROSVENOR), on December 15 last, in his speech in this House challenged the Democrats to propose in words any amendment to that law. His challenge was so framed as to practically dare the Democrats to suggest a possible, practicable amendment, believing, as he clearly did, that that law was perfect.

The greatest weakness of that law is giving the imperial power to the Attorney-General to say when and when not suits should be filed against the combines reprehended by that law. My suggestions cure that. The people and not the Attorney-General only, with this bill a law, have a right to enforce the law by injunction, indictment, and suits for damages.

In my speech January 19, 1900—over two months before the Littlefield bill was introduced—I said:

Section 1 says if certain concerns or persons "are associated or combined for any one or either or all of the following purposes," naming them, and in addition have used the mail to transact their business, the Federal grand jury finds a true bill and enforces the law against them, as in any other criminal case.

Section 3 gives the right to the humblest man in this land to go before the grand jury, and gives the jury the right to summon him before the grand jury for the purpose of finding a true bill against the violator of this statute.

One of the weaknesses of the present anti-trust law, Mr. Chairman, is that it puts it entirely in the hands of the Attorney-General of the United States to say when suits shall be filed against trusts. By my bill I put it in the hands of the people of this country to say when it shall operate. They are the ones who suffer. They are the victims. I put it in the hands of the plain people of this country—our Federal grand jurors—I put it in the hands of the Attorney-General and the Federal judge in the district where the trust is, and the people can go before the grand jury and say, "Here is A, B & Co., a trust." They find whether it is or not a trust formed for any one, either, or all the purposes named in section 1; and if they find it is a trust, they ask, "Did it send its letters through the mail?"

If the grand jury find that it has done so, they find a true bill, and then they go before a jury of the country, a jury of their peers, and there the case is tried. If they find that it is a trust formed for any one, either, or all the purposes named and that it used the mail in transacting its business, it is found guilty and fined $5,000 or imprisoned one year. I am tired of this one-man Government; I am tired of the Attorney-General of the United States—I do not care whether he is Mr. Olney or Mr. Griggs, I do not care whether he is that greatest of patriots, William Jennings Bryan; if Attorney-General, I would oppose putting it in his hands exclusively—to say whether or not the trusts shall be prosecuted or arraigned by the injunctive process in the courts.

Sir, there has never yet been a remedy for the trust evil suggested that its apologists did not pick a flaw in it. They masquerade as friends of the people and are heard exclaiming, "Trusts are a bad lot, but this is not the way to get at them." Any way is the wrong way. The great nullifying defect in the law of 1890 was doubtless injected into it by the friends of the trust for the exact purpose it has served—to nullify the act. It leaves its execution and the institution of actions solely to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General does not see proper to do it, and so there you are. It is a dead letter, utterly and absolutely useless and of no avail, because its execution rests with one man who does not see proper to enforce it.

My bill addresses itself specifically to this great defect. I have seen this bill criticised for that, it was said, it throws upon postmasters and carriers the onus of determining what is a trust, and I admit the criticism would be fatal if it were well founded; but nowhere in the bill is such duty imposed. On the other hand, the inhibitions, penalties, and maledictions of the bill are all leveled at the person who misuses the mail, and postmasters are not commanded to throw out or refuse mail until the fact that it is sent by a trust is established by the court. Its mandates are addressed to courts and juries and not to postmasters.

The Federal judges are required to give it in special charge to other grand juries, and the juries are given inquisitorial power to ferret them out, and the doors of jury rooms are set ajar to citizens to lodge complaints, whomsoever will, and thus the path is so open and easy and straight to conviction that no trust or person will dare to take the risk. It eliminates this one-man power. It relegates the enforcement of it back to the people themselves, where it rightfully belongs.

The bill enforces itself by its terrors and the care and certainty with which they may be invoked by bringing the courts into use, and by the invitations it extends to citizens to cooperate with the courts, and the power it confers upon grand juries to ferret out and compel information. Our entire system of criminal jurisprudence rests upon the probity and effectiveness of the grand jury. It stands between the people and the lawbreaker with drawn sword, the guardian of the one and the terror of the other; it is hoary with age, and is the wisest and surest and most effective of all the instrumentalities designed for the protection of society and the suppression of vice, and this bill predicates itself in the impregnable and unimpregnable strength and wisdom of this old-time grand-jury system that has never failed in any other branch of crime to fully meet the exigencies and demands of the case.

And again I said April 23 on the same point this:

I have before stated that the great weakness in the Sherman anti-trust law is this: That the Attorney-General of the United States has the sole power to say when suits shall be instituted against these concerns and when they shall not. If he had the disposition to vigorously insist on this prerogative, he has not the time. This was never intended to be a one-man government. The President is one man, it is true, but his powers are limited and he is controlled largely—absolutely in some matters—by Congress, and sometimes by the Senate alone. But as the law is, the Attorney-General has too much power and it should be changed, even if no other legislation is had.

I am opposed to putting it in the power of any one man, I would not care if it was Andrew Jackson himself, to say when and whether or not suits against trusts should be filed. I want the right given to the people, the suffering people, the people who are the victims of these nefarious concerns, and let them go to the criminal courts, the Federal courts, and say: "Here is a trust that is grinding me to death and I have not the money to employ a great lawyer to back up a lawsuit; I have not the railroad fare to go to the Federal Government at Washington to see the Attorney-General about my rights." I want to give the right to the plain people, who are the sufferers. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATS SPOKE AND VOTED FOR ANTI-TRUST ACT OF 1890.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has cited the vote taken upon a question of "consideration," immediately preceding the vote which passed the present anti-trust law in the House, June 20, 1890, as proving the opposition of the Democrats to that bill. He also quotes Mr. Enloe's language on that occasion as evidence of the fact that the Democrats opposed the bill, and forgets to tell the House that Mr. Enloe himself voted for the bill within ten minutes of the time he made the remark. Mr. Enloe had introduced an amendment to the Constitution, without interfering with State rights, but the Republicans had killed it because not necessary. The power of Congress was not then clear nor fully understood. And now, when the power is full, clear, and complete, made so by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that Congress can even "prohibit" interstate and foreign trusts and combines (Pipe Case), the Republicans want—in bad faith, I charge—a constitutional amendment giving Congress a power it already possesses, and an evil addition.

Notwithstanding the fact that the anti-trust bill passed by a vote of "240 to 0" within the same hour that the other vote was taken, and that not a single Democrat voted against it, the gentleman would have the country believe that the Democrats opposed the bill because they voted against "consideration," but the facts do not sustain him.

TRUST BILL FINALLY PRESENTED TO THE HOUSE AND SENATE—WHAT WAS SAID AND VOTE.

The trust bill was presented to the House under a conference report, and it became a question of order whether or not it superseded the regular order. The regular order was the "silver bill;" and when it was proposed to sidetrack that for the trust bill, Mr. Bland raised the question of "consideration," and the Democrats voted with him.

It was not because any single one of them opposed the trust bill, but because they favored the silver bill above all things and were not willing to see it displaced for any reason. The great silver champion, whose spirit has now passed into the unknown, but whose patriotic virtues abide with us still, never, on any occasion, at any time, for any reason, wavered in his allegiance to the principle of which he was the ablest and most conspicuous exemplar, and he was on guard upon that eventful day, as he ever was, to see that no opportunity slipped that gave a chance to enact it into law. And then, and upon all other occasions before and since, the Democrats loyally followed him, but not one of them uttered a word against the trust bill and not one of them voted against it.

The RECORD utterly refutes the gentleman's assertions, and to decide it all I quote Mr. Bland's own language after the vote on consideration was taken. He said:

I regret that the amendments that the House put upon the bill were stricken out; and while I fear the bill in its present shape is not what its friends expect of it, I shall cheerfully vote for it. I raised the question of consideration simply for the purpose of going to the Speaker's table and taking up the silver bill. I am not opposed to the bill itself.

That is, not opposed to the anti-trust bill. He and other leading Democrats had made many speeches in the House and Senate for the bill and proposed several amendments to broaden and strengthen the act, but they were defeated by a Republican House and Senate.

I call attention of the country to the fact that Mr. Bland then gave notice that the Republicans in conference had emasculated the bill. And then I call attention of the country to the further conspicuous fact that the act under Republican administration has been almost a dead letter. Were the Republicans sincere then; else why did they emasculate it? Have they ever been sincere; else why have they refused to execute the act? The history of the act, both in its inception and its execution, has proven the utter insincerity of the Republican party in its pretended opposition to trusts, and the inevitable supposition is that this measure we are considering is a premeditated pretense, a studied deception, a foreordained fraud, and that the Republican party never has and never will sincerely offer harm to the trusts.

HOUSE PROCEEDINGS ON PASSAGE OF ANTI-TRUST ACT OF 1890.

Mr. STEWART of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following conference report.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to raise a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont presents a conference report.

Mr. BLAND. The question simply is, Whether under the rules bills are now in order to be reported from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The conference report takes precedence of even a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The conference report must first be read.

Mr. BLAND. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the House must know what it is asked to consider.

Mr. STEWART of Vermont. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that it will take but a moment. I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The report was read, signed on part of the House by E. B. Taylor, J. W. Stewart, both Republicans, and D. B. Culberson, Democrat.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration, in order to go to the Speaker's table and take up the silver bill.

Mr. STEWART. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

And the House, by an aye and nay vote of 144 to 103, not voting 80, refused to consider the silver bill, and then took up and passed the anti-trust act of 1890 by a vote of "242 yeas; nays 0."

Mr. CULBERSON of Texas. Will the gentleman [Mr. Stewart of Vermont] permit me to make a statement?

Mr. STEWART of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House that I rise simply to state that we agree to this report because it is in compliance with the instructions of the Houses. Individually I thought the amendment originally made by the House was desirable, but the House having instructed otherwise, I agree to this report in accordance with that instruction.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to make a statement.

Mr. STEWART of Vermont. I will yield the floor for a question.
Mr. BLAND. I only want a minute in which to make a statement.
Mr. STEWART of Vermont. Very well.
Mr. BLAND. I regret that the amendments that the House put upon the bill were stricken out; and while I fear the bill in its present shape is not what its friends expect of it, I shall cheerfully vote for it. I raised the question of consideration simply for the purpose of going to the Speaker's table and taking up the silver bill. I am not opposed to the bill itself. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]
Mr. STEWART of Vermont. As there seems to be no disposition, or at least I am not advised of any disposition, to discuss the bill, I will ask for a vote.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KERR (Republican) of Iowa. I think it will accomplish a great deal. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] very truly said that this was an unexplored field; that this was new legislation; that it was a case which demanded that the Government should declare the law, and that out of that declaration of the law would be evolved the decisions of the court, which would settle the question and determine the extent of our control over the subject. When the gentleman from Texas made that statement he had the approval, I believe, of every gentleman on this side of the House, and also a number of gentlemen on the other side.
Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kerr] says that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson] stated that this bill was the complete exercise of the powers of the Federal Government under the Constitution to control trusts. If I remember the statement of the gentleman from Texas correctly it was that this bill was the exercise of all the constitutional power that Congress had except the power to repeal the duties which protect these trusts, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question on that point.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KERR of Iowa. But everybody knows they were in existence. As to hearing of them, we have only heard much about trusts since the Democratic party began to think that they could make political capital out of that question. [Applause on the Republican side.]
Mr. ENLOE. You heard of them when Mr. Cleveland said that they were all over this country, and when Mr. Blaine responded that they were private affairs, with which the Government had nothing to do.

Senate proceedings when the anti-trust act passed. No debate. No opposition. All the RECORD contains is that the conference report on the measure was submitted and "the report was concurred in." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 109, page 6208.)

TARIFF IS THE MOTHER OF TRUSTS.

If the proposition that protection "is the mother of trusts" needed testimony to prove it, I might cite innumerable witnesses selected from the greatest of Republican statesmen. The statement, however, is a maxim within itself and carries its own demonstration on its face.

Under the Democratic tariff of 1846 the rate of duty was about 25 per cent, and we had then no trusts. This tariff gave us an overflowing Treasury and the Democrats reduced in it 1857 to an average of about 20 per cent, and we still had no trusts. Mr. Blaine said "the tariff of 1857 was the lowest we ever had since 1812," in his Twenty Years in Congress. From 1846 to 1860 we had low tariffs, the free coinage of both gold and silver, with the Democrats in power and Whigs to assist them, but no trusts at any time. Mr. Havemeyer, as I shall show, says:

> There is probably not an industry that requires a protection of more than 10 per cent ad valorem * * * and, says he,

> with a protection to an industry not exceeding 10 per cent all menace of trusts to the community would cease.

A 10 per cent tariff would cure, then, the trust evil and in proof of this we see under a 25 and 20 per cent tariff we had no trusts because we had foreign competition. "The mother of trusts is the customs tariff bill," says Mr. Havemeyer, and I may add, under the Dingley tariff the ad valorem per cent of tariff duties is 54.66, plus the war rate, which I can not state.

Are we surprised that trusts are giants and are plundering the people, making Presidents, controlling Congress, running Republican conventions, destroying the Constitution, and making slaves in Porto Rico and fixing to make more in the Philippines? Under our low tariffs everybody was prosperous and happy.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years in Congress, said:

> The business of the country was in a flourishing condition [under these low tariffs], and in 1857 all parties acquiesced in them.

Senator ALLISON, March 24, 1870, said:

> The tariff of 1846, though confessedly and professedly a tariff for revenue, was, as regards all the great interests of the country, as perfect a tariff as any that we ever had.

Mr. Garfield, in this House in 1878, said:

> The decade from 1850 to 1860 was one of general prosperity.

But under the civil-war tariff and succeeding Republican tariffs gigantic combines, trusts, and corporations arose and pillaged the people, just as President Jackson said in his farewell address they would do. President Cleveland and the Democrats charged their breastworks. This charge turned the Democrats out and turned in President Harrison, who abode with pleasure amongst these vultures.

President Cleveland and a Democratic Congress for the first time in thirty years took charge of the Government. They reduced the tariff to an average ad valorem per cent of 40.19 and enacted an anti-trust provision in the tariff act known as the Wilson law. This anti-trust provision, without any change to strengthen it, was reenacted in the present Dingley law, and appears to be a dead letter under the present Administration. It provided that imports protected, made into trust goods, should be placed on the free list when the President ascertained the fact. There is no evidence that the President wants to know such a fact or has turned his hand to enforce this law, though it is his duty under the Constitution and his oath to see that all laws are faithfully executed. We have seen that low tariffs prevent trusts, and that high tariffs are the mother of trusts, and if the present law was reduced to an average ad valorem of 10 per cent, Mr. Havemeyer says trusts will perish, or at least become harmless. Shall we do it? The Democrats say yes. The Republicans say no, and proved this by not reducing the tariff this session.

Possibly there was never a witness called to testify who spoke with more expert knowledge of his subject than did Mr. Havemeyer. He is one of the few greatest of all the beneficiaries of protective tariff, and he has invoked its aid especially in creating and building into enormous strength the next greatest of all trusts. He speaks with exact, literal, expert knowledge and from a standpoint of actual verification, indisputable demonstration.

He sums it all up in the comprehensive phrase, "Tariff is the mother of trusts."

Mr. Havemeyer, with a lavish array of argument, based upon long personal experience, says:

The mother of all trusts is the customs tariff bill. The existing bill and the preceding one have been the occasion of the formation of all the large trusts with very few exceptions, inasmuch as they provide for an inordinate protection to all the interests of the country—sugar refining excepted. Economic advantages incident to the consolidation of large interests in the same line of business are a great incentive to their formation, but these bear a very insignificant proportion to the advantages granted in the way of protection under the customs tariff.

There probably is not an industry that requires a protection of more than 10 per cent ad valorem, and it is to obtain what is provided over such percentage in the tariff that leads to the formation of what are commonly spoken of as "trusts." With a protection to an industry not exceeding 10 per cent, all menace of trusts to the community would cease.

* * * * * * *

In fact, the tariff bill clutches the people by the throat, and then the governors and the attorneys-general of the several States take action, not against the cause, but against the machinery which the people employ to rifle the public's pockets.

* * * * * * *

I repeat that all this agitation against trusts is against merely the business machinery employed to take from the public what the Government in its tariff laws says it is proper and suitable they should have. It is the Government, through its tariff laws, which plunders the people, and the trusts, etc., are merely the machinery for doing it.

* * * * * * *

The true "communism of pelf" is the customs tariff bill. It says to the people, "Here is the law we have enacted for your robbery. Do not complain of it, but do your utmost to attack and injure the machinery engaged in extracting from you what we legislate shall be taken from you.

"Keep up the clatter while the voters on the tariff bill take advantage of the noise to enact laws that cause your impoverishment and thus contribute to the greed and avarice of the few." (See Hearings before Industrial Commission, 1899.)

I here give a table showing the imports under the Wilson tariff law in 1896 and the Dingley tariff law for 1897:

	Values.	Duties.	Ad valorem.
			Per cent.
Wilson law, 1896	$387,579,729.26	$155,763,251.80	40.19
Dingley law, 1897	495,204,550.94	270,094,274.25	54.66

I submit this table in full:

Tear down protection and the trusts will subside within the reasonable and legitimate limits set by trade competition. Tear out the dam and the river will flow evenly and unmurmuringly onward. Tear down the wall and turn in foreign imports and the trusts can not combine to fleece the people.

As early as June 6, 1868, Hon. John Sherman said:

Every advance toward a free exchange of commodities is an advance in civilization; every obstruction to a free exchange is born of the same narrow, despotic spirit which planted castles upon the Rhine to plunder peaceful commerce; every obstruction to commerce is a tax upon consumption; every facility to a free exchange cheapens commodities, increases trade and production, and promotes civilization. Nothing is worse than sectionalism within a nation, and nothing is better for the peace of nations than unrestricted freedom of commerce and intercourse with each other.

Again, in a speech in the Senate on October 15, 1889, he delivered the following terse statement, going directly and conclusively to the point:

* * * The primary object of a protective tariff is to invite the fullest competition by individuals and corporations in domestic production. If such individuals or corporations combine to advance the price of the domestic product, and to prevent the free result of open and fair competition, I would, without a moment's hesitation, reduce the duties on foreign goods competing with them in order to break down the combination. * * * Whenever this free competition is evaded or avoided by combination of individuals or corporations, the duty should be reduced and foreign competition promptly invited.

No man who has lived in this Republic has been better qualified to speak advisedly, and his deliverance upon this point, even if the proposition did not sustain itself, is entitled to more weight, possibly, than any man now living. He lays down the plain remedy for the trust evil, and now that the time is come and the danger upon us, his party turns away from it and resorts to a pretense and a subterfuge.

Again, the great financier, after a fuller investigation of the causes of the trust evil, in the Senate, on March 21, 1890 (page 2456, volume 10, S. Records), said:

If the combination is aided by our tariff laws they should be promptly changed, and, if necessary, equal competition with all the world should be invited in the monopolized article.

[Baltimore Sun, 1890.]

Trusts fixing the price of the necessaries of life exist only to a limited extent in England. Mr. Wilhelm Berdrow, an eminent German writer on political economy, writing in the Forum of May last upon "European trusts," says:

"As far as England is concerned, it must be admitted that, notwithstanding her great industrial activity and a competitive warfare not less than that of other states, the trust system has as yet found but tardy acceptance in that country. This is doubtless due in some degree to the thorough application of the principle of free trade; for it is well known that the largest trusts are powerless unless their interests are secured by a protective tariff, excluding from the home market the products of foreign countries."

In France to-day the conditions are similar to those existing in England prior to the beginning of free trade. An army of French workmen are now preparing to move toward Paris, and in every country where protective tariffs exist many monopolies exist, markets are unstable, strikes are common, and the whole basis of trade is upon unstable foundations.

Governor Mount, of Indiana, Republican, last fall said:

I am against trusts. * * * If it is not possible to prevent these obnoxious combinations by law, then I would suggest a more radical remedy which would surely bring the trusts to time. This is what I mean: Remove the protection from the article controlled by trusts, thereby permitting open competition, and see how quickly these trusts will come to their senses.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

REMOVE THE DUTIES AT ONCE TO KILL THE TRUSTS, SAYS SENATOR WASHBURN

Ex-United States Senator Washburn, a Republican, in an interview published in the New York Tribune September 11, 1899, says:

There is one thing that greatly disturbs me. The Republican party, whether justly or unjustly, is associated with trusts in the minds of the masses. As a party we have reached a crisis where we have got to call a halt. The Republican party has got to disconnect itself from trusts. It has got to legislate them. The Republicans in Congress will have to examine the subject thoroughly, and whenever they find a trust is depending for its exorbitant profits largely on protective duties, it will be the duty of Republican Congressmen and Senators to remove the duties at once. This should be done with the duty on steel rails and tin plate.

Mr. Bryan says:

Some have suggested the free list as a cure-all remedy for the trusts. There is no doubt that the removal of the tariff from a trust-made article would reduce the extortion, but would it necessarily destroy the trusts? If, for instance, steel rails can be sold for $15 per ton in both Europe and the United States, a tariff of $9 per ton would enable the domestic manufacturers to form a combination and raise the price of steel rails in the United States to $24 per ton. A law putting steel rails upon the free list would prevent the extortion, but if steel rails can be produced in the United States as cheaply as elsewhere, a steel-rail trust could be formed without the aid of any tariff wall; and a trust organized under those conditions would be able to control the price of the product as well as fix the rate of wages and the price of raw material.

Whenever an article can be exported in competition with foreign products a trust formed in that article can collect from the consumer the foreign price plus the cost of transportation, and we are yearly increasing our export of manufactured products. It is evident that we are constantly adding to the number of articles which trusts could control without the aid of import duties.

Tariff reform, therefore, or even free trade, would be only a partial remedy. To advance this as the only remedy or as a complete remedy would not only prove a disappointment to the opponents of monopoly, but it would probably rally the protectionists to the support of the trusts.

Extortion is, however, only one of the evils flowing from monopoly. There are other evils which, though less noticeable, are not less dangerous to our country. Mr. Havemeyer's broad defense of trust principles is therefore deserving of as much attention as his condemnation of a high tariff.

A thousand witnesses might be summoned, but can they be needed to sustain such a patent proposition, so clearly true and so clearly stated by these great financial experts?

And yet, in the face of that, the Republican party, after wasting three years of opportunity, controlling the Executive, the Senate, and the House, comes here in this last expiring moment of the session and dares to insult public intelligence with the false pretense that this is a remedy, dares to attempt to hoodwink the American people with this miserable subterfuge, conceived to deceive and to serve the purpose of a campaign pretense.

And this same Republican party, after wasting all these years of opportunity to concoct this brazen eleventh-hour deception, will have the audacity to go to Philadelphia on the 19th of June and proclaim its opposition to trusts, well knowing that it dare not injure them, well knowing that it has no remote intention of suppressing them, and well knowing that the remedy they now propose is a sham, made with deliberate purpose to betray the people and perpetuate the trusts in all their enormity and rapacious greed.

UNCHAIN THE CHAINS.

The St. Louis Republic in its issue of April 23, 1890, thus quotes Hon. Thomas G. Shearman upon this point, and I call attention to its remarkable perspicacity and lucidity:

A large variety of causes have been assigned for the observed failure of anti-trust laws to accomplish their object. The failure has been attributed to the corruption of courts, the disinclination of public officials to enforce anti-trust laws, the employment by the trusts of the best legal talent the country offers, the laws' indefiniteness arising from the difficulty of discriminating between the legitimate business corporation and the combination designed to suppress competition.

Attorney Thomas G. Shearman, of Brooklyn, points out what he believes to be the real cause:

"Combinations subversive of competition," he says, "are always founded on a monopoly of natural resources. These monopolies owe their existence to special unjust privileges conferred upon them by legislation. The foundation principle of these combinations is restriction. Every effort thus far made by legislatures to destroy these combinations has been in the form of still further restriction. Competition is tied up in chains by trust monopolies, and Congress and the legislatures try to nullify the chains by chaining the chains. That is why anti-trust laws fail.

"The tariff laws," continues Mr. Shearman, "are among these legislative restrictions. The inconsistency of any man who demands that competition shall be free when it works in his favor but shall be prohibited when it works against him is obvious. But it is not so obvious to the ordinary mind that it is just as absurd to insist upon freedom of competition within the borders of the United States while excluding competition from without. The demand for freedom of competition at home while denying freedom of competition from abroad is absurd and suicidal. The laws of nature can not be persuaded to work only halfway."

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY AND HIS PARTY.

In discussing the Mills bill, Representative William McKinley, jr., then a member of the House and now President of the United States, on Friday, May 18, 1888, in a speech which I hold in my hand, said that Congress had the power to "control" trusts formed in the United States. He discussed both foreign trusts and domestic trusts. He said that we could not crush the foreign trusts—trusts of Europe—but we could crush the home trusts, the ones now in question, that are dominating the courts of Ohio, running the legislature of that State, and that are controlling, in and out of Congress, the Republican party that has control of that trust-ridden State. I quote from Representative McKinley's speech, which I have in pamphlet form, it having been used as a campaign document at that time:

We should crush out those (trusts) at home and do nothing to encourage those (trusts) abroad who organize to prey upon the American market.

Again he says: "We can control the former"—that is, the home trusts; those then (in 1888) as now (1900) in existence in the United States—"but," says he, "the latter"—that is, the foreign trusts—"while robbing our own citizens, are beyond our control and out of our jurisdiction."

We can "crush," he says, the home trusts. Then why do we want an amendment to the present Constitution that was in existence May 18, 1888, when this speech was made? Why paralyze State rights and smother out State sovereignty reprehended by General GROSVENOR so summarily in this House December 15 last and in a published letter before Congress met? Why does the President, if we can "crush" trusts, want this amendment? Why does he permit his party, although in bad faith, to undertake its passage?

If the President is really an enemy of trusts, why was he silent during the entire extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, beginning March 15, 1897, and ending about the last of July? Why nothing on trusts in his messages to Congress during that long session when the Congress did nothing but pass the Dingley bill?

If an enemy of trusts, why did he not denounce the home-robber trust to this idle House and put it to work with a strong message on the subject of trusts?

Why did he let the distinguished Speaker, the great Republican leader, dominate the House and refuse to appoint committees so that the House of its own volition could enact anti-trust legislation?

Why did he lose all of this good time in doing absolutely nothing himself and without directing his party what to do? Why should he be a trust follower instead of a party leader? Why did he wait until all but a year of his entire term as President of the United States had expired before he uttered a word on the trust question? And then what did he say?

He simply said that there were some trusts in the country about which he had heard, and submitted the matter to the consideration of Congress. What Congress? A Republican Congress—trustee for the trusts! He did not suggest even a plan—not even an amendment to the existing law or Constitution. He suggested nothing. He did not say that we could not "crush" trusts under the present Constitution and that we wanted an amendment, but submitted the matter to Congress. And what has his Congress done? They reported this amendment and the Littlefield bill a few days before Congress adjourned and, I believe, after the House had set June 6 to adjourn and did adjourn June 7. The Littlefield bill reported was not introduced until April 7, 1900. The bill and amendment were reported May 16 and 15 respectively, and taken up for debate on May 31 in the House.

The proposed amendment met a righteous defeat, for the Democrats knew, as President McKinley had said in good or bad faith in 1888, that Congress now has the power to "crush" trusts engaged in foreign and interstate commerce and foreign corporations and corporate bodies dealing in that commerce. So the Democrats voted against it.

They suggested various amendments strengthening the Littlefield bill, which undertook to strengthen the Sherman law, the antitrust act of 1890. Nearly all of the proposed changes to that law have been made by Democrats on this side of the House, as the Littlefield bill and amendments, and the Congressional debates show.

NONENFORCEMENT OF THE ANTI-TRUST ACT OF 1890.

Again, President McKinley's Administration has not enforced the existing law of 1890. The official records show this. I defy successful refutation of this statement. I will prove it. There have been only three cases filed against trusts during this Administration, as shown by a letter from Attorney-General Griggs to me. His letter gives the style of the cases as follows:

"United States vs. Anderson et al. Reported in 171 U. S., 604. Suit begun June 7, 1897. Finally decided October 24, 1898.

United States vs. Coal Dealers' Association. Reported in 85 Fed. Rep., 252. Suit brought December 16, 1897. Decided January 28, 1898.

United States vs. Chesapeake and Ohio Fuel Company. Suit to restrain brought about May 1, 1899. Argued and submitted, but not decided.

Indictments were also returned against the members of the association about May —, 1899, to which demurrers were filed. These demurrers have been argued and submitted to the court, but have not been passed upon by the court."

At page 26 of the Report of the Attorney-General, 1899, just preceding this list of cases, the Attorney-General says:

The following list comprises the suits hitherto instituted on behalf of the Government under that act (1890) against business combinations.

I addressed this letter to Attorney-General Griggs to ascertain when each of these suits was filed, he having power under the act of 1890 to order or not to order suits to be filed. His reply is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.
Washington, D. C., May 31, 1900.

SIR: I have compiled and hand you herewith a statement showing, as completely as I can from the records of this office, the information you ask for concerning certain suits instituted in the Department of Justice under the Sherman Act. I may explain, by way of accounting for the absence of definite dates in some of the cases, that prior to the 1st of July, 1899, no general docket was kept in this Department and no docket attorney was allowed.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. GRIGGS, Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

Information requested by Hon. John W. Gaines, M. C., on May 29, 1900, respecting the dates on which suits were brought or proceedings instituted in the following cases, under the anti-trust law:

United States vs. Addyston Pipe and Steel Company. Reported 78 Fed. Rep., 712; 85 Fed. Rep., 271; 175 U. S., 211. Suit instituted December 10, 1896; finally decided December 4, 1899.

United States vs. Chesapeake and Ohio Fuel Company. Suit to restrain, brought about May 1, 1899. Argued and submitted, but not decided.

Indictments were also returned against the members of the association about May, 1899, to which demurrers were filed. These demurrers have been argued and submitted to the court, but have not been passed upon by the court.

Where it has been possible from records in this Department to give the exact date of the bringing of a suit or the finding of an indictment it has been done. Where no record exists of such fact, the date when the case was decided has been given.

MAY 31, 1900.

This is the record (three case "filed") of this Administration in the face of the fact that the law is well settled that Congress has the power to "crush" these interstate trusts; that it has "prohibited" interstate trusts and foreign commerce, and regulates the means of its transportation; that thousands and thousands of trusts have been formed in recent years and months and are daily being formed under high Republican tariffs.

Comparatively speaking, there were but few trusts in this country, and they were leading trusts, when the trust act of 1890 was passed, and up until the past three years, or "within the past eighteen months," as the Columbus, Ohio, merchants said last fall. Knowing that this Administration was a trust-created Administration and would defend trusts, they have risen up like mushrooms all over the country and are strangling the people's rights, and yet with these thousands of trusts preying upon the people, and the people praying for the Attorney-General to evoke his mighty power to "crush" them, which he alone could order done under the act of 1890, he has violated his promises, refused to answer questions, sat back, apparently, and simply ordered three suits to be filed in three years, when hundreds could have been properly filed.

AS GOVERNOR OF OHIO, PRESIDENT MCKINLEY WAS THE FRIEND OF TRUSTS, THE RECORDS SHOW.

But this is not all of the record of the Republican party nor of Mr. McKinley as a public official.

THE RECORD OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN THE STATE OF OHIO, SHOWING ITS LOVE FOR TRUSTS RATHER THAN ITS HATRED FOR THEM.

President McKinley was governor of Ohio for four years—two terms—and although he dominated during this time Republican legislatures, no anti-trust laws were enacted in Ohio and no prosecutions instituted against trusts. I now prove this statement by the following recent correspondence between the Hon. Frank S. Monnett, ex-attorney-general of Ohio, and myself:

WASHINGTON, June —, 1900.

Hon. FRANK S. MONNETT,
Columbus, Ohio:

Was any anti-trust law enacted while McKinley was governor of Ohio?

JOHN W. GAINES.

Here is his answer:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, June —, 1900.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Washington, D. C.:

None, and no prosecutions instituted.

F. S. MONNETT.

Such is the history of President McKinley as governor of Ohio as given by General Monnett, a leading Republican, who so bitterly fought trusts, under the anti-trust statute passed April 12, 1898, in Ohio, at his instance and suggestion, that he was entirely ignored by the Republican party which nominated Governor Nash, and his magnificent anti-trust record was passed by the Republican convention of 1899 without indorsement. But the Democrats did indorse Monnett.

They said:

DEMOCRATS, AUGUST 29, 1899, RECONDEMN TRUSTS AND INDORSE GENERAL MONNETT'S RECORD AGAINST TRUSTS.

We declare that all unlawful combinations of capital are the legitimate fruits of a gold standard and other corrupt Republican legislation on questions of tariff; and we demand that all articles the prices of which are controlled by trusts be placed on the free list. We denounce the Attorney-General of the United States, appointed from the State of New Jersey, the hotbed of trusts, for his refusal to enforce the statutes of the United States against them; and we commend the present attorney-general of Ohio [Monnett] for his earnest efforts to enforce the statutes of Ohio against such illegal combinations, and pledge the nominee of this convention for attorney-general to the enforcement of the statutes of the State against them.

General Monnett wrote me a letter dated January 12, 1900, published with my speech of January 19, and can be found at page 1077, volume 33, of the RECORD, and in which he said:

Our Ohio anti-trust act was passed April 18, 1898, to take effect July 1, 1898. * * *

There was no member of the house or senate that had the hardihood to stand out against the anti-trust act, and there was only one man that was accused of dodging the vote and trying to do something against it. At least he did not vote for it, and is now holding a Federal place.

Both Democrats and Republicans voted for the anti-trust act of Ohio of April 18, 1898, passed under the administration of the then Governor Bushnell and at the instance of General Monnett, and the only man who was unpatriotic enough to not vote at all on the measure is now holding a Federal office—a premium on a "people-be-damned" servant.

General Monnett's letter continues:

We took the Sherman anti-trust act, the Texas act, and compared the various trust acts of other States, and think we got the best for our State of any that were heretofore enacted. The objectionable feature, or rather the weak part, of the act has proved to be that we can not procure the testimony of interested parties, for the reason that they claim the right of the Federal and State constitutions, on the ground that such testimony would criminate themselves.

Note well there was no "weak part" found in the Texas statute. It stood the test in the trial, Civil Court of Appeals and in the Supreme Court of the United States, and crushed an oil trust in Texas. Though patterned after the Texas act, the Ohio statute is found "weak," made by a Republican legislature, enforced or not enforced, by Republican officials, and by such nonenforcement, General Monnett in an interview of June 5, in the New York Journal, says:

The Standard Oil trust has for eight years defied the supreme court of Ohio, and yet without punishment. A Republican legislature in Ohio deliberately voted down every anti-trust resolution offered this winter at the dictation of the bosses at Washington and the trust magnates of New York.

What became of this anti-trust amendment and all the other anti-trust bills introduced in this Republican legislature, dominated by a Republican governor and United States Senator from everywhere, Marcus A. Hanna? They were defeated.

General Monnett says:

The legislature killed the Russell bill and the freight maximum bill "by almost a strict party vote." Although the Russell bill was bill No. 10, it was side tracked by the trust lobbyists and held back over the protest of some Republicans "and almost all the Democratic members."

He further says:

This was a repudiation of the party platform and the sentiment of the party.

How can the Republican party be trusted on the trust question to live up to its national platform on this subject with such a record as this at home?

RUSSELL ANTI-TRUST BILL NO. 10 HELD UP, SIDE TRACKED, AND DEFEATED OVER PROTESTS OF DEMOCRATS, ALTHOUGH REPUBLICAN PLATFORM DEMANDED THE AMENDMENTS.

Ex-Attorney-General Frank S. Monnett, of Ohio, in an interview on the 19th instant, says Ohio will be lost to the Republicans this fall.

"I do not see how the Republican party can escape punishment this fall," said he.

"The platform of the Republican party in Ohio strongly condemns the trusts and their unlawful methods. I was elected as attorney-general of Ohio on such a platform, and as the officer of the State and the representative of the party I carried out as best I could the platform of the party.

"Yet I was not supported in this by many of the leaders, and the party organs criticised me for doing just what the platform of my party pledged me to do. Newspapers of the State, about 110 of them, printed paid articles criticising my actions, and they, too, party newspapers."

PROPOSED OHIO REPUBLICAN ANTI-TRUST PLANK IN 1899.

We heartily approve the action of the seventy-third general assembly of Ohio (1898) on the passage of stringent laws now on our statute books forbidding the organization of business combinations known as trusts and combines, and declare such unlawful combines as inimical to the best interests of the people, and we congratulate the Republican party on the fact that a Republican legislature and Republican Congress were the creators and authors of such laws, and we demand the full execution of this legislative act and pledge the enactment of such further measures as may be necessary to destroy such unlawful organizations.

The above was the resolution as at first introduced and telegraphed the day before to the Commercial-Tribune, which headed it:

The Trusts Doomed—Enactment of Laws Necessary to Destroy Unlawful Combines Pledged.

Following is as it passed:

OHIO STATE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM, JUNE 2, 1899.

We commend the action of the seventy-third general assembly of Ohio in passing the stringent law now on our statute books prohibiting the organization of "trusts," and we denounce such unlawful combinations as inimical to the interests of the people. We congratulate the people of the State upon the fact that a Republican legislature enacted this law, and we demand its rigid enforcement. We pledge our party to such further legislation as experience may determine necessary to prevent the formation and operation of such iniquitous and dangerous combinations.

TRUSTS DEFY THE OHIO COURTS.

The trusts have defied the supreme court of Ohio for eight years and are yet without punishment. In a common-law action in 1892, the Standard Oil Company was denied the right to enter into a contract with the Standard Oil trust, because it created a monopoly contrary to public policy and the common law. The case is Watson vs. The Standard Oil Company, 49th Ohio State, 189. This is what the common law enforced could and did do, and six years before the anti trust statute of Ohio of April 12, 1898. Something is wrong. The courts, the prosecuting officials, or the statute composed of the best part of the Texas statute and others, is weaker now than the common law which this statute is supposed to intensify and invigorate. Under the common law, they are restrained; under the statute law as enforced, they defy the courts and go unpunished. What is the matter? General Monnett answers my question in a recent interview in the New York Journal, in which he says:

"This is not all. The legislature which has just adjourned killed the Russell bill and the maximum freight bill, and that too by almost a strict party vote. Will not the people punish the party for such actions upon the part of its servants? The party, as such, is not in sympathy with such methods.

"Although the Russell bill was bill No. 10, it was side tracked by the trust lobbyists and held back until near the adjournment and then over the protest of some of the best men of the party, and almost all of the Democratic members, it was defeated.

"This was a repudiation of the party platform and the sentiment of the party. I can not believe that we will escape punishment, and I believe it will come this fall. Why should not the party be punished when the men who control its actions disregard the will of the people?" (General Monnett, interview in New York Journal, June 5.)

PUBLIC POLICY IN OHIO IN 1892—WHAT IS IT NOW?

I would call attention to our own supreme court holding in the Salt case—

Where, I may add, a salt monopoly, under the common-law action, was broken up—and the public policy of Ohio—at least, such as it used to be—which favored competition in trade, to the end that its commodities may be afforded to the consumer as cheaply as possible, and is opposed to monopolies, which tend to advance market prices to the injury of the general public.

The public policy, then, of Ohio, that used to be otherwise, has changed—changed in favor of combines that raise prices and rob the people. What has wrought this change? The Democrats, without a variation, have supported all anti-trust legislation in Ohio. They voted for the original act of 1898 as a unit and for the amendment offered and defeated in the last legislature, just adjourned, to strengthen the "weak" places in the existing law, with a solid opposition by the Republican party, dominated by the trust kings of Washington City and New York. Can we trust such a party, State or national? Can we stand such a party four years longer? Should we stand it? Who are these trust-dominating kings?

"Seventy-five city sales agents of local wholesale houses of Columbus, Ohio, met there October 29, 1899," and passed, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, the following resolution:

During the last eighteen months trusts have been formed without number, until to-day we find every article of household use controlled by trusts or combinations, with a rise in price of from 50 to 150 per cent.

The resolution concludes as follows:

Whereas the Hon. MARCUS ALONZO HANNA, the political godfather of the Republican party, takes great pleasure in declaring trusts a good thing: Therefore

Resolved, That we denounce the Republican party as the mother of trusts and pledge our best efforts to defeat Hannaism at the polls on November 7, 1899.

But these patriots were defeated, trusts were victorious, and their mouthpiece, Governor Nash, was reelected, who, in his campaign for governor last year, in a speech reported in the Philadelphia North American (Republican), defended trusts, as follows:

Within the last few years many of the business men of this company have consolidated their great interests into corporations and combinations which are popularly known as trusts. The men who conduct our manufactures, trade, and commerce are generally intelligent, farseeing citizens, with patriotism equal to that of any other class of citizens. I am very loath to believe that these men would knowingly do anything that would be detrimental to the country or to their fellow-citizens.

Are we surprised, with such a governor, that all anti-trust legislation should be smothered by the legislature which he dominated?

Senator CHANDLER, in an interview July 7, 1899, said:

I am afraid the Republicans will not be as sincere and earnest in doing this work—

Legislating against trusts, State and national—as they ought to be. The other day I saw a cartoon in which Mr. HANNA was bearing aloft a banner inscribed "No trusts," while all the leaders of trusts were pressing forward with immense money donations to the treasury of the national committee. The idea suggested must be dispelled in order to carry on a successful canvass.

Ex-United States Senator Washburne, September 10, 1899, said:

The Republican party, whether justly or unjustly, is associated with trusts in the minds of the masses. As a party, we have reached a crisis where we have got to call a halt. The Republican party has got to disconnect itself from trusts. It has got to legislate them.

Disconnect and legislate them. Did they disconnect or legislate in Ohio in the legislature that has just disgraced itself on that subject by adjourning without strengthening the present "weak" anti-trust law of that State? It is strange, I may say, that the Ohio law was patterned after the Texas law and yet is a dead letter. The Texas law is crushing trusts, domestic and foreign. It crushed a foreign oil corporation doing State and interstate business by excluding it from doing State trade in Texas. Why does this law fail in Ohio and succeed in Texas? It is because faithful Democratic officials and unsuspected courts and un-Hannaized juries enforce it.

The Washington Post of December 25, 1899, Christmas Day, exploits the fact that the supreme court of Ohio had acted as Santa Claus for the people of that great State by dismissing a quo warranto proceedings under the anti-trust law of Ohio in the noted case against the biscuit trust. The communication is thus headed:

Biscuit trust not ousted from Ohio.

And says:

The supreme court has dismissed the ouster suit brought against the National Biscuit Company by the attorney-general.

Not Attorney-General Monnett, if you please. He is an ex-ray, remember. He saw too far for the trusts, and he was beheaded, but was succeeded by an able and efficient "unknown" lawyer—the inefficient (?), unpatriotic (?), unfaithful (?), unfit (?) General Monnett had been turned down and out!

Again, Senator HANNA, in the course of the campaign in Ohio last fall, warmly advocating the trust-loving Mr. Nash in his candidacy for reelection, at different times thus showed he was the bold advocate and friend of trusts.

Trusts are good things.
There is not a trust in the United States.
What harm can these trusts do the people of this country?
It may be that the trusts will do the people harm. If they do, the Republican party will take care of that.

How, I ask? By killing all anti-trust laws, as recently done in Ohio, and the Federal law, and smothering those in Congress?

It is evolution in business. (Trusts!)
There is no such thing.
I say there are no trusts. If there are, prove it.
We know our business.

"WE," not wee-wee, but WE, giant "we," that was not made to be downed as long as the Republican party is in power, State and national.

The trusts have the best men in the country at their head.
I believe in their organization.
The formation of trusts is a step forward.
The combination of corporations is simply the evolution of business.
I am not defending the trusts, nor am I repudiating a single word or phrase in the Republican platform.—Cincinnati Enquirer, October 28, 1899.

Who did repudiate your platform against trusts upon which Mr. Nash was elected governor last fall? Your Republican legislature, "at the dictation of the bosses at Washington and the trust magnates of New York," by killing the "Russell bill No. 10."

The Republicans here point with pride to the history of anti-trust lawsuits in the State of Ohio and to the execution of the law in that State by Republican officials. Too much praise can not be given to General Monnett. He has been, and is still, a hero in the fight. Turn to a case reported in 60 Ohio State Reports, page —, in re Jennings (habeas corpus), and you will find one of the juridical adversities that confronted General Monnett in his efforts to convict the Buckeye Pipe Line Company, which, he says, is "one of the constituent companies of the Standard Oil Company." He had instituted a suit against it styled "State of Ohio ex rel. Monnett, attorney-general, vs. Buckeye Pipe Line Company."

In that case a witness refused to answer questions which General Monnett contended were relevant and pertinent and by which he sought to educe certain proof going to show this pipe line had violated the anti-trust law of Ohio. The witness refused to answer or produce certain records. The notary public (by admitted authority, as this opinion states) committed the recalcitrant to jail, but the supreme court (Republican, of course) of Ohio immediately turned him out; as the decree shows (60 Ohio State Report), and left Monnett the laughingstock, as he is now the political victim, of the trusts and the Republican party of Ohio. General Monnett says that "there are many cases pending"—that is, I suppose, when he was attorney-general—"thereunder" (that is, under this anti-trust statute), but I can find not a single one that has found its way to the supreme court of that State as late as 60 Ohio State Report (1899); but we do know that the public press, as I have stated, says that the supreme court refused to oust the "biscuit trust" on Christmas day last.

I have already shown by General Monnett's own words that the Standard Oil trust is still in existence in the State of Ohio, and that, too, in the face of the trust laws of that State.

It is contended here that in some cases (and the 49 Ohio State Report case is alluded to by the advocates of this amendment as a case) the Standard Oil Company was "ousted from the State of Ohio." The report of the case shows it is not true. The judgment in that case was (page 189, 49 Ohio State Report):

Judgment ousting the defendant from the right to make the agreement set forth in the petition and of the power to perform the same.

Judgment for what? Depriving the defendant of the right to make the agreement and the power to perform the same. Not a judgment ousting the company nor taking from it its charter granted by the State of Ohio as shown by this report of this case. There were three questions which Justice Minshall, speaking for the court, passed on in that case, to wit (I quote the words of the court):

First question or issue:

1. Should the defendant, the Standard Oil Company, be regarded as a party in its corporate capacity to the agreement constituting the Standard Oil trust?

The court answered this question in the affirmative.

Second question or issue:

2. Had the company power to become a party to such an agreement?

The court answered this in the negative, saying that this contract was void as against public policy and the common law of that State (not the anti-trust law, because it was not passed until 1898 and this opinion was given in 1892).

The third question or issue was:

3. If so, is the right of the State to demand a forfeiture of its corporate franchises, or of the power to make and perform such agreements, barred by lapse of time?

The court answered the last proposition in the negative; that is, that the lapse of time had not run and that the company did not have the power to make and perform such agreements and as the judgment shows, it (the defendant) was ousted from the right to make the agreement and of the power to perform the same. But the court did not adjudge nor declare a forfeiture of the corporate franchise of the Standard Oil Company. The court found as facts in the course of its opinion:

By this agreement, indirectly, it is true, but none the less effectually, the defendant is controlled and managed by the Standard Oil trust, an association with its principal office in New York City, and organized for a purpose contrary to the policy of our laws. Its object was to establish a virtual monopoly of the business of producing petroleum, and of manufacturing, refining, and dealing in it and all its products throughout the entire country, and by which it might not merely control the production, but the price, at its pleasure. All such associations are contrary to the policy of our State, and void.

Citing the 77 Michigan case, Buhl vs. Richardson, General Alger's match monopoly case. This defendant company undertook, but was not allowed then (1892), to enter into this contract with the Standard Oil trust.

On page 183 the court says:

In other words, it—

The Standard Oil Company—

is to be managed in the interest of the Standard Oil trust, whose principal place of business is in New York City, irrespective of what might be its (Standard Oil Company's) duties to the people of this State, from which it derives its corporate life; and its real stockholders receive their dividends from the profits of that TRUST, and not from the earnings of their company * * *.

This particular agreement was annulled and prohibited, but where is the case holding that the Standard Oil Company has been deprived of its corporate life by the State of Ohio?

I have searched diligently the reports of the supreme court of Ohio down through Report No. 60 containing decisions of the year 1899. It goes unpunished, directly or indirectly. And so with the Standard Oil trust, a New York or foreign corporation doing a State and interstate business in Ohio. The State law if enforced, as in the Texas case, would drive it from that State. The act of 1890 by Federal procedure could destroy its interstate business. Existing in New York, doing business in Ohio, would make its business either interstate or State or both. Yet Attorney-General Griggs has refused repeatedly to institute suits against this trust.

And General Monnett says both the Standard Oil Company and this "trust have defied the courts of Ohio for eight years." Again, why do not the Republican governor, Mr. Roosevelt, and the Republican legislature of New York attack this trust? The supreme court of Ohio says its main office is in New York and its business contrary to public policy. Why not? Here are plain cases of the failure of State and national officers to do their "plain duty."

Here is an official adjudication in the forty-ninth Ohio case showing this trust is a monopoly, so intended and so acting, contrary to the common law of New York, Ohio, and in all the States, and to the statute law of Ohio and the Federal act of 1890. I insert here letters from Mr. Rice, of Ohio, to Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Griggs, that are shocking to the enemies of trusts and sweet consolation to their friends. I should say that Mr. "John K. Richards, Acting Attorney-General of the United States," is an Ohio lawyer; General Griggs, a New Jersey lawyer; Mr. Rice, an Ohio Republican. Mr. Rice in a letter to Mr. LENTZ, May 30, 1900, says:

I have been a Republican all my life and supposed my party was faithful to its trust, but this correspondence with the Attorney-General and the President leads me to suspect that the Standard Oil trust and not the Republican party is running our National Government.

General Monnett says that the Russell bill No. 10 and all anti-trust bills were defeated by the Republican party at the dictation of corrupt influences from Washington and New York.

THE GREAT CONTRADICTION.

The man whose aim is success, irrespective of how it is obtained, of necessity becomes a contradiction. This truth is forcibly illustrated in the career of M. A. HANNA. It is an old saying that "liars should have good memories." It is unnatural to be a liar. It is natural to tell the truth. When it is not told some reason, generally false, has intervened to make it appear the better to tell a falsehood. It is not the better. It is weakness which suggests it, and it is an exception when a train of evils do not follow the telling of a lie. It is better, therefore, to tell the truth even though the matter at issue is difficult to defend. Indeed some of his enterprises are beyond the pale of defense.

In this latter case a lie will never do. If any scheme of adventure, having for its object personal gain, is bolstered up by a falsehood the chances are ten to one that it will fail. It seems impossible to keep a straight path when the object sought is unworthy. Mr. HANNA is blindly seeking to deceive the people. His memory is bad. He contradicts himself. He may be called the "great contradiction" of the age in which he lives. It is probable that he is a "contradiction" by intent. It is so easy for him to forget anything which does not serve his purpose that it would be strange if he were not a "contradiction." One moment he claims that "trusts are good things." The next moment he declares "There is not a trust in the United States." Then he asks the question, "What harm can these 'trusts' do the people of this country?" He answers the question with a guess: "It may be that the 'trusts' will do the people harm;" and as an antidote to the possibility he suggests, "If they do, the Republican party will take care of that." Then he exclaims, "It is evolution in business. Trusts!" he exclaims, "there is no such thing." Then he declares, "The 'trusts' have the best men of the country at their head. I believe in their organization." Then he cries, "The story that I have defended 'trusts' in any of my speeches is absolutely false." Then he asks, "What harm can these 'trusts' do the people of this country?" Then he says, "I say that there are no 'trusts.' If there are, prove it."

What a wretched memory plagues Mr. HANNA. It does not seem possible that a man of Mr. HANNA'S prominence should forget his every utterance as soon as it is from his tongue. Now, from the conglomeration of ideas we think it safe to conclude that Mr. HANNA'S position as to "trusts" is clearly set forth in the following utterances, which he unquestionably made:

"We know our business." "The English Government is as good as ours." "The great commercial success of England has been due to 'trusts.'" "The 'trusts' have the best men in the country at their head. I believe in their organization." "The formation of 'trusts' is a step forward." "The combination of corporations is simply the evolution of business." "I do not know of a 'trust' in the United States." "I say there are no 'trusts.' If there are, prove it." "There is not a 'trust' in the United States." "I am not defending 'trusts,' nor am I repudiating a single word or phrase in the Republican platform." "Go outside and soak your head."

And thus we have the views of the Cleveland gentleman, who is wearing the Senatorial shoes of John Sherman.

CENTRALIZATION—A REPUBLICAN POLICY.

This amendment is proof of the fact, often charged, that the Republican party believes in centralization; that all our laws should be made at Washington by Congress; that State lines should be obliterated; instead of all power being "inherent in the people," that all power should be vested in and go out from the President and Congress; that this should be an empire instead of a Republic; that the President, who is elected under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States and the States, should have power not only that expressly given and necessarily implied to execute the express powers, but that the President and Congress has and should have and should exercise powers over, above, and beyond the Constitution unbridled and unrestrained save and except by his and their own inner consciousness of right and wrong; that the President has and should have power to control human liberty; in other words, without any limitation under the Federal Constitution.

Toulman Smith thus defines local self-government and centralization:

Local self-government is that system of government under which the greatest number of minds knowing the most, and having the fullest opportunities of knowing it, about the special matter in hand, and having the greatest interest in its well-working, have the management of it or control over it. Centralization is that system of government under which the smallest number of minds, and those knowing the least, and having the fewest opportunities of having it, about the special matter in hand, and having the smallest interest in its well-working, have the management of it or control over it.

But, Mr. Chairman, as Chief Justice Marshall said: "The Government of the United States has been termed emphatically a government of laws and not of men." (Morbury vs. Madison,

1 Cranch, 162.) I believe that all power should be left in the people to make their laws and govern themselves that is at all practicable. The farther we get away from the people as public servants the more danger there is that we may become their oppressors and be controlled by evil instead of good influences. The best and sweetest influence of human life is that which is and should be about the fireside, and that influence becomes evil, and later corrupt, as we get away from that sacred place, either in civil or in political life. So in the same way and in the same proportion, as we get away from the people and their power to control us directly, are we liable to become their oppressors instead of their liberators.

ANDREW JACKSON OPPOSED TO A CONSOLIDATED GOVERNMENT.

This destruction of our "dual form" of government—that is, the State governments and the United States or National Government—Andrew Jackson advised against, reprehended, and condemned not only such a movement, but a consolidated form of government. He said:

It is well known that there have always been those amongst us who wish to enlarge the powers of the General Government, and experience would seem to indicate that there is a tendency on the part of this Government to overstep the boundaries marked out for it by the Constitution. Its legitimate authority is abundantly sufficient for all the purposes for which it was created, and its powers being expressly enumerated, there can be no justification for claiming anything beyond them.

Every attempt to exercise power beyond these limits should be promptly and firmly opposed, for one evil example will lead to other measures still more mischievous; and if the principle of constructive powers or supposed advantages or temporary circumstances shall ever be permitted to justify the assumption of a power not given by the Constitution, the General Government will before long absorb all the powers of legislation and you will have, in effect, but one consolidated government. From the extent of our country, its diversified interests, different pursuits, and different habits, it is too obvious for argument that a single consolidated government would be wholly inadequate to watch over and protect its interests; and every friend of our free institutions should be always prepared to maintain unimpaired and in full vigor the rights and sovereignty of the States, and to confine the action of the General Government strictly to the sphere of its appropriate duties.

* * * * * * *

JACKSON OPPOSED TO HIGH TAXES AND TARIFFS.

But, rely upon it, the design to collect an extravagant revenue and to burden you with taxes beyond the economical wants of the Government is not yet abandoned. The various interests which have combined together to impose a heavy tariff and to produce an overflowing Treasury are too strong and have too much at stake to surrender the contest. The corporations and wealthy individuals who are engaged in large manufacturing establishments desire a high tariff to increase their gains. Designing politicians will support it to conciliate their favor and to obtain the means of profuse expenditure for the purpose of purchasing influence in other quarters.

James Monroe, President of the United States of America, on the 10th of March, 1821, "appointed General Jackson governor of the Territories of East and West Florida." * * * "The Congress" (on March 3, 1821) provided "that, until the end of the first session of the next Congress," (I quote from Jackson's commission, signed by President Monroe), "unless provision be sooner made, for the temporary government of the Territories of East and West Florida, * * * all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining the inhabitants of said Territory in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Now know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and abilities of Major Andrew Jackson, I do, in virtue of the above-recited acts, appoint him to exercise within the said ceded territory, under such circumstances as have been or may hereafter be prescribed to him by my (President Monroe's) instructions, and by law, all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the governor and captain-general and intendant of Cuba and by the governors of East and West Florida, within the said provinces respectively, and do authorize and empower him, the said Andrew Jackson, to execute and fulfill the duties of this present appointment according to law, and to have and to hold the same with all its powers and privileges until the end of the next session of Congress, unless provision be sooner made for the government of the said Territories so ceded by Spain to the United States: Provided, however, that it is the true intent and meaning of these presents that the said Andrew Jackson, or any person acting under him, or in the said Territories, shall have no power or authority to lay or collect any new or additional taxes, or to grant or confirm to any person or persons whomsoever any title or claim to land within the same. In testimony, etc."

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

All the civil, military, and judicial power exercised by the then existing officers of the then ex-Spanish government over the Floridas were given to General Jackson and such other "persons" as he or the President might name. The then existing laws, or the old laws of the Floridas, were continued by an act of Congress temporarily, and General Jackson was to enforce them (with certain changes in the laws and personnel of the officeholders). Congress extended in 1891 our revenue laws and those relating to the importation of persons of color.

JACKSON CONTENDED THE CONSTITUTION EXTENDED AS FAR AS "APPLICABLE" TO THE TERRITORY OF FLORIDA.

It is contended that Jackson was an imperialist; that the Constitution, he believed, did not extend to the Territory of Florida. But such is not true. Desiring to return to his home in Tennessee and to lay down this unprecedented amount of power placed in his hands by his commission, on October 6, 1821, in an open address, not to the slaves, nor serfs, nor aliens of Florida, but "To the citizens of the Floridas," he said:

Considerations of a personal nature and the situation of my family requiring my absence from these provinces for a short period, I make known that in the meantime the government of East Florida is placed under the charge and direction of W. G. D. Worthington, esq., secretary for the same, and that of West Florida under that of Col. George Walton, secretary thereof. Each of these gentlemen is clothed with all the powers appertaining to governors under the late government of Spain, and subject to such instructions as they may respectively receive from the President of the United States through me. They are charged faithfully to protect and maintain all the citizens and inhabitants, of whatsoever description, in the said provinces, in the peaceful enjoyment of all their rights, privileges, and immunities secured to them under the late treaty with Spain, and under the Constitution of the United States as far as the same is applicable. I have instructed them promptly to punish the violators of the law, and to require of all that allegiance to the Government enjoined by my proclamation issued on taking possession of the country. (21 Niles's Register.)

Under the administration of the local laws by Jackson he had committed to jail an ex-Spanish official or ex-officials, who no longer enjoyed any official prerogative after the exchange of the treaty, for refusing to turn over certain valuable public and private documents, deeds, etc., pertaining to the new Government under Jackson and to the ownership of certain citizens of Florida of certain valuable property, which latter they had long unlawfully "held up." These Spanish officials, Jackson contended, were trying to escape to Spain with these documents, which, under the treaty, they had been required to turn over "six months before," and were also inciting the people, Jackson says, to oppose his Administration.

Jackson charged also that Judge Fromentin had joined in this unpatriotic opposition to his Administration. Fromentin, a Frenchman by birth, had been appointed by President Monroe "judge of the United States for West and East Florida," authorized and empowered, his commission says, "to execute and fulfill the duties of that office, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Eligius Fromentin, during his good behavior, and until the end of the next session of the Senate of the United States, and no longer," the date of this commission being May 18, 1821, and is signed President James Monroe.

This commission was sent by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, to Fromentin, at New Orleans, June 17, 1821. Bear in mind that General Jackson was not only governor, but was by Congress and his commission empowered to execute the local laws as "chancellor," and while thus doing what the law directed him to do, his jurisdiction in so doing came in conflict with what Judge Fromentin claimed was his jurisdiction. It occurred in this way:

"Six months" after it was the duty under the treaty of the Spanish officials to turn over the public and private records to Jackson, one Calava, a then ex-Spanish official (and had been for "six months"), with others, conspired to abscond with certain valuable public and private records pertaining to the then government and to the ownership of private property, and to inspire, as Jackson claimed, the people to oppose Jackson's administration. Demand was made on Calava by Jackson for these papers. Calava declined to turn them over, and, on the contrary, gave them to his superior, another ex-Spanish official, and in this way was trying to make way to Spain with these valuable documents.

Jackson committed Calava and others to jail for this contempt. The next day an official search was made and the papers found where Calava and others had secreted them. No property or other papers of these Spanish officials were interfered with. On the contrary, they were "preserved and sealed and watched by Jackson's officials until Calava was released next day," who confessed they were all intact. However, Fromentin issued a writ of habeas corpus directing that these Spanish officials be released. He stated under oath before Governor Jackson that "no petition or oath or affirmation was made for the writ; that the application was verbal," and that he did not know to whom it was directed, nor to whom it was given or who would execute it; that he had no marshal or anyone to execute it. Jackson, claiming that he had the exclusive jurisdiction to execute the local laws, insisted that Fromentin was in contempt of his court. He had him arrested for contempt, claiming that Fromentin had no jurisdiction save and except such as Congress had given him, to wit, the execution of the revenue and slave laws. Fromentin was immediately released—August 24, 1821.

Jackson, nowhere that I can find after diligent search, contended that the Constitution itself did not extend to Florida; but he insisted that this Territorial judge was not given jurisdiction by statute to try this case, it being only a local offense and being tried under the old Spanish laws, which had been by Congress continued temporarily (the equivalent of enacting them literally), and over which he had exclusive jurisdiction. But we do find, as I have shown, that Jackson said at a later date—that is, October 6, 1821, after he had thoroughly investigated the law, possibly—that the Constitution did apply to Florida in certain parts, which we know now is the law. The people of a territory are not entitled to a United States Senator, by the Constitution, nor to "political power," which come to them when they are made into a State of the Union. (1 Pet., 542-543.)

In the course of the debate touching upon the action of Congress as to Florida, it was contended without its being disputed, that the Constitution did extend to the Territories of the United States in certain parts, not in all; hence the Montgomery resolution was voted down. Judge Nelson at a later date in the case of Benner vs. Porter, after holding that the Territorial judges "are not organized under the Constitution [now doubted] nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creations exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control," said, "whether or not there are provisions to that instrument [the Constitution] which extend to and act upon these Territorial governments, it is not now material to examine."

Here is a case showing that these Territorial courts are creatures of the legislative department of the Federal Government, and herein it would seem that the jurisdiction of Territorial courts is controlled by the Congressional act creating the court. But let that be as it may. I will not discuss that. The fact remains that Jackson contended that the Constitution extended to the Territory of Florida, but that the Congressional act did not give Fromentin jurisdiction to try this case of a local nature, which he (Jackson) said had been by Congress given exclusive jurisdiction to try.

In a later case, the Supreme Court squarely agrees with General Jackson as to the application of the Constitution to our Territories. The court said:

Every nation acquiring territory by treaty or otherwise must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own government. (Page 212, 3 Howard.)

This is quoted and approved as the law in the celebrated Magoon letter to the Secretary of War, of April 11, 1900, and is printed in the RECORD at page 4338, volume 33, holding that the Constitution applies by its own force to our Territories and new possessions. He also cites and approves the message of President Polk on our California acquisition, of December 5, 1848, as follows:

The inhabitants, by the transfer of their country, had become entitled to the benefits of our laws and Constitution.

Citing the Cross-Harrison Case (16 Howard, 164), upholding President Polk's contention—that is, that our tariff laws and the Constitution extended to California the moment the treaty was ratified, and was the law of that land, and that California became a part of the United States the moment the treaty was signed. President Polk so instructed both our land and naval commanders specifically and told them to apply our laws and the Constitution in erecting temporary government, and they did.

President Polk to Commodore Stockton, January 11, 1847:

The inhabitants of the (California) Territory are entitled to all the benefits of the Federal Constitution of the United States to the same extent as the citizens of any other part of the Union.

* * * * * * *

That instrument establishes a form of government for those who are in our limits and owe voluntary allegiance to it.

And such governments were upheld, and the Kearney code particularly in New Mexico. In Leitendorfer case, 20 How., 176–7, where the court expressly held that the Mexican laws contrary to our Constitution and laws were void and protected no rights. In Maynard vs. Hill (125 U. S.) it was held that it was unnecessary in the organization of the Oregon Territory to say that the Territorial legislature could enact such laws as it pleased not in conflict with the Federal Constitution. Justice Field said this was the law without such a precautionary provision.

In the 3 Howard case the Supreme Court held that—

It can not be admitted that the King of Spain could, by treaty or otherwise, impart to the United States any of his royal prerogatives, and much less can it be admitted that they have capacity to receive or power to exercise them. Every nation acquiring territory, by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own government and not according to those of the government ceding it.

Further on, at page 224, the court said—and Justice Story, I may add, was on the bench then—that:

And all constitutional laws are binding on the people in the new States and the old ones whether they consent to be bound by them or not. Every constitutional act of Congress is passed by the will of the people of the United States, expressed through their representatives, on the subject-matter of the enactment.

And when so enacted they are the law of the land by their "own force" in State or Territory. The court continued:

And when so passed it becomes the supreme law of the land and operates by its own force on the subject-matter in whatever State or Territory it may happen to be. The proposition, therefore, that such a law can not operate upon the subject-matter of its enactment without the express consent of the people of the new State where it may happen to be contains its own refutation and requires no further examination.

Foreign or Spanish laws, as well as customs, are incompatible with our laws, Constitution, and institutions, and these foreign laws can not be inherited or injected into our form of government. We undertook that, you see, in the case of General Jackson in Florida. We continued the old laws, though temporarily, and in executing them we came in contact with an effort to administer our Constitution under the Federal judge. At that time we did not have as much light on these subjects as now. There is now no excuse in contending that the Constitution does not apply to our Territories. The very last case in which the Supreme Court of the United States touched upon the power of Congress to legislate for a Territory, the Supreme Court said, that Congress might legislate as Congress "may think fit so long as it does not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States." (Hof's case, 174 U. S., 1.) Congress can not, as in this case, where "exclusive" and complete jurisdiction is given it over District of Columbia, a Territory, enact "any" law contravening "any" provision of the Constitution.

Now, I ask if the Constitution, by its own force, did not apply to the territory ceded by the States to the United States both before and immediately after the framing of the Constitution and its adoption, why was it that Congress and the courts held that the Constitution repealed the ordinance of 1787, enacted before the Constitution took effect, and why did Congress immediately thereafter, after the Constitution was ratified, pass a statute so changing this ordinance as to make it fit the limitations and requirements of the Constitution? How could there be a misfit or the two instruments conflict if the Constitution did not extend to these Territories?

The ordinance applied not to the States, but to the Territories exclusively. Hence it can not be said that the ordinance extended to the States and conflicted there with the Federal Constitution. In 10 Howard, page 90, the Supreme Court held that the people of the Territories were parties to our Constitution, and that it was the "supreme law throughout the United States," clearly showing the term United States included States and Territories. The court says:

The Constitution was, in the language of the ordinance—

That is the Ordinance of 1787—

adopted by common consent, and the people of the Territories must necessarily be regarded as parties to it and bound by it, and entitled to its benefits, as well as the people of the then existing States. It became the supreme law throughout the United States. And so far as any obligations of good faith had been previously incurred by the ordinance, they were faithfully carried into execution by the power and authority of the new Government.

In the Milliken Case, 4th Wallace, the court said:

This Constitution of ours operates in war, as well as in peace, in all places, and under all circumstances. It is a law for the rulers as well as for the people; each and every one everywhere within our political jurisdiction is bound by it.

Our courts have repeatedly held that the Constitution protects the people of our Territories in their personal and civil rights, their jury and religious privileges, and this without any dissent (114 U. S., 15; 174 U. S., 1; 3 Cranch, 159; 170 U. S., 349; 136 U. S., 42; 30 Fed. R., 115; the last case holding we can not deny them the right of habeas corpus).

JACKSON AN ANTI-IMPERIALIST.

Notwithstanding the unsettled condition of the law and public opinion on the extension of the Constitution to the Territories in 1803 and 1821, Jackson contended that the Constitution did extend to Florida, and he gave that people grand juries, juries of 12, courts, trial and appellate, justices of the peace, protected them in their property, their religion, and crushed evil doers and drove traitors from the land; and so thoroughly did this that his bitter enemy, Thomas H. Benton, in his Thirty Years in Congress, canonized the man and his Administration, so much so that my distinguished friend from Iowa (Mr. DOLLIVER), in this House, January 28, 1899, quotes Benton as follows:

Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson, governor of the provinces of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the captain-general and intendent of the island of Cuba over the said provinces and the governors of said provinces, respectively.

In the United States, where the people are accustomed to the regular administration of justice, the summary proceedings of General Jackson appeared to be harsh and even lawless; but they were all justified by the Administration and sanctioned by the negative action of Congress. And in Florida, where they took place, and where it was seen that no wealth or power could screen the oppressor, and that governors, judges, and rich merchants were laid by the heels like common offenders and the protecting shield of law and justice thrown over the humble and helpless in this province, so long a prey to oppression and corruption, the conduct of General Jackson appeared like an emanation of divine justice, greatly exalting the American character. * * * He constantly repulsed the idea of the presence of the Constitution in the territory committed to his charge, and in that repulsion he was sustained by the Federal Executive Government at Washington and by each House of Congress, each of these authorities refusing to entertain as breaches of the Constitution the complaints forwarded against him by those who had been militarily dealt with under his government.

I have shown Jackson did not "repulse" the idea of the presence of the Constitution in Florida, and to this extent Mr. Benton is in error.

Compare this administration, this Jacksonianism in Florida, with or without the Constitution, as you please, with McKinleyism in Cuba and elsewhere, with or without Constitution, and let us agree that we will take Jacksonianism without the Constitution rather than McKinleyism with it.

Fromentin was arraigned before Jackson August 24, 1821. Two days thereafter Fromentin wrote the Secretary of State that Jackson condemned the unlimited power that Congress had placed in his hands. Fromentin says:

Much more was said by the General (Jackson) respecting the extent of his powers and the hope that no living man should ever in future be clothed with such extraordinary authority. How fortunate it was for the poor that a man of his (Jackson's) feelings had been placed at the head of the government, etc. (State Papers, first session Seventeenth Congress, page 180.)

Other high authorities quote Jackson as condemning this imperial power, though placed in his own hands, and I quote two others as giving the words undisputed of Jackson:

I am clothed with powers which no one under a republic ought to possess, and which, I trust, will never again be given to any man. Nothing will give me more happiness than to learn that Congress in its wisdom shall have distributed them properly, and in such a manner as is consonant to our earliest and deepest impressions. Yet, as I hold these powers by the authority of an act of Congress, it becomes my duty to discharge the sacred trust imposed upon me to the best of my abilities, even though the proper exercise of the powers given might involve me in heavy personal responsibilities. It has been my misfortune to be thus circumstanced in my various relations as a public servant. Yet I never have nor ever will I shrink from the discharge of my public duties from any apprehension of personal responsibility.—(Frost, Life of Jackson, page 419, and "Monument to Memory of Andrew Jackson," by Dusenbury, 1846.)

The Statesmen's Manual, volume 1, says of Jackson in Florida:

In June, 1821, the President appointed General Jackson governor of Florida, which he accepted, and in August he took possession of the territory according to the treaty of cession. The Spanish governor, Callava, having refused to give up certain public documents deemed of importance, he was taken into custody by order of Governor Jackson and committed to prison. The documents being found under a search warrant issued by Jackson, Callava was immediately set at liberty. Jackson remained but a few months in Florida, for, disliking the situation and disapproving the extent of power invested in him as governor, he resigned the office and again retired to Tennessee. President Monroe offered him the appointment of minister to Mexico, which he declined in 1823.

Congress soon enacted laws relieving the situation in Florida, giving the people there local self-government as far as practicable, and to remove all doubts that the Constitution was or was not in Florida expressly extended the Constitution thereto to protect this people.

There is a difference in the two propositions, however. If the Constitution does go to the Territories by its own force, Congress can not bring it back even by statute. If it is sent there by statute, Congress can bring it back by repealing the statute and leave the people without its protection—a reprehensible contention and dangerous administration of so-called law.

The trouble is with the present Administration that it is administering law in our new possessions in a way condemned by Jackson, although Jackson contended the Constitution extended to Florida, while the present Administration is administering the law in these possessions outside of, over, above, and beyond the limitations of the Federal Constitution. Jackson condemned this power, even with the Constitution present. The Administration commends it administered unbrideled, unrestrained, without any constitutional limitations attached.

Jackson not only condemned this power, but soon surrendered it after he had restored good order in Florida, driven the traitors out, and placed all the criminals behind the bars. He bitterly opposed imperial power and a consolidated form of government. He favored the annexation of Texas, and upheld his disciple, neighbor, and friend, James K. Polk, in accomplishing that. But how was it done? By the consent of the people of Texas. By the vote of that people at the ballot box overwhelmingly.

But so opposed was Jackson to a consolidated government—a one-man power—to squinting at the destruction of State rights, to turning our Government from a republic into an empire, that he refused in 1845, a short while before he died, to receive as a gift from Commodore Jesse D. Elliott a sarcophagus brought home in the Constitution from Palestine, "believed to contain the remains of the Roman Emperor Alexander Severus."

The correspondence between General Jackson and Commodore Elliott is found at length in the beautiful old volume entitled "Monument to Jackson," recently given me by a great lover of Andrew Jackson, my friend the gentleman from New York, Mr. CUMMINGS. I believe this sarcophagus is now being preserved in the Smithsonian Institution, not, I hope, that it may ever be used by any President of these United States; but with the present tendency, I am pained to say, it may be.

I insert here the entire correspondence, but beg to state three sentences which General Jackson wrote in declining this gift:

But with the warmest sensations that can inspire a grateful heart, I must decline accepting the honor intended to be bestowed. I can not consent that my mortal body shall be laid in a repository prepared for an emperor or a king. My republican feelings and principles forbid it; the simplicity of our system of government forbids it.

Mr. Dusenbury says:

The patriotic reply of General Jackson to Commodore J. D. Elliott's letter, tendering him as his final resting place the use of the sarcophagus obtained by him at Palestine having been alluded to in several of the eulogies in this work, and it having been thought proper to insert it in this place, Commodore Elliott has kindly furnished the editor with the correspondence:

WASHINGTON CITY, March 13, 1845.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Last night I made something of a speech at the National Institute, and have offered for their acceptance the sarcophagus which I obtained at Palestine, brought home in the Constitution, and believed to contain the remains of the Roman Emperor Alexander Severus, with the suggestion that it might be tendered you for your final resting place. I pray you, General, to live on in the fear of the Lord; dying the death of a Roman soldier, an emperor's coffin awaits you.

I am, truly, your old friend,

JESSE D. ELLIOTT.

Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

HERMITAGE, March 27, 1845.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 18th instant, together with the copy of the Proceedings of the National Institute, furnished me by their corresponding secretary, on the presentation by you of the sarcophagus for acceptance on condition it shall be preserved and in honor of my memory, have been received, and are now before me. Although laboring under great debility and affliction, from a severe attack, from which I may not recover, I raise my pen and endeavor to reply. The steadiness of my nerves may perhaps lead you to conclude my prostration of strength is not so great as here expressed. Strange as it may appear, my nerves are as steady as they were forty years gone by, whilst from debility and affliction I am gasping for breath. I have read the whole proceedings of the presentation by you of the sarcophagus, and the resolutions passed by the board of directors so honorable to my fame, with sensations and feelings more easily to be conjectured than by me expressed. The whole proceedings call for my most grateful thanks, which are hereby tendered to you, and through you to the president and directors of the National Institute. But with the warmest sensations that can inspire a grateful heart, I must decline accepting the honor intended to be bestowed. I can not consent that my mortal body shall be laid in a repository prepared for an emperor or king.

My republican feelings and principles forbid it; the simplicity of our system of government forbids it. Every monument erected to perpetuate the memory of our heroes and statesmen ought to bear evidence of the economy and simplicity of our republican institutions and of the plainness of our republican citizens, who are the sovereigns of our glorious Union and whose virtue it is to perpetuate it. True virtue can not exist where pomp and parade are the governing passions. It can only dwell with the people—the great laboring and producing classes—that form the bone and sinew of our confederacy.

For these reasons I can not accept the honor you and the president and directors of the National Institute intended to bestow. I can not permit my remains to be the first in these United States to be deposited in a sarcophagus made for an emperor or king. I again repeat, please accept for yourself and convey to the president and directors of the National Institute my most profound respects for the honor you and they intended to bestow. I have prepared a humble depository for my mortal body beside that wherein lies my beloved wife, where, without any pomp or parade, I have requested, when my God calls me to sleep with my fathers, to be laid; for both of us there to remain until the last trumpet sounds to call the dead to judgment, when we, I hope, shall rise together, clothed with that heavenly body promised to all who believe in our glorious Redeemer who died for us that we might live, and by whose atonement I hope for a blessed immortality.

I am, with great respect, your friend and fellow-citizen,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Commodore J. D. ELLIOTT, United States Navy.

NAVY-YARD, PHILADELPHIA, April 8, 1845.

GENTLEMEN: The interest which the National Institute has been pleased to take in the eventual bestowment of the remains of the honored Andrew Jackson in the sarcophagus which I brought from abroad and deposited in your institute makes it my business now to communicate to you a copy of his letter of the 27th ultimo, lately received, on that subject. With sentiments so congenial to his strict republicanism and in accordance, indeed, with the republican feelings common to ourselves, he takes the ground of repugnance to connecting his name and fame in any way with imperial associations.

We can not but honor the sentiments which have ruled his judgment in the case, for they are such as must add to the luster of his character. We subscribe to them ourselves; and while we yield to their force, we may still be permitted to continue our regard to the enduring marble as to an ancient and classic relic—a curiosity in itself, and particularly in this country, as the first of its kind seen in our Western Hemisphere. From it we would deduce the moral that while we should disclaim the pride, pomp, and circumstance of imperial pageantry as unfitting our institutions and professions, we would sedulously cherish the simpler republican principle of reposing our fame and honors in the hearts and affections of our countrymen. I have now, in conclusion, to say that as the sarcophagus was originally presented with the suggestion of using it as above mentioned, I now commit it wholly to the Institute as their own and sole property, exempt from any condition.

I am, very respectfully, yours, etc.,

JESSE DUNCAN ELLIOTT.

The PRESIDENT AND DIRECTORS OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE, Washington.

GENERAL JACKSON.

[From the Floridian of October 2, 1821.]

To the Citizens of the Floridas:

The temporary organization of the government of these provinces, according to the act of Congress of the last session and to the powers conferred on me by the President of the United States, I have the satisfaction to announce is now complete. If it possesses imperfections or defects, the reflecting man will make due allowance when he considers that its duration will be but short and that it is the best that circumstances would permit, taking into view the difficulties I have had to encounter. Where the rule or law is certain I have considered it my duty to follow it strictly, but where this has not been the case I have endeavored to make the best provision in my power, believing that government of some kind was absolutely necessary. It is my sincere hope that the subject will attract the earliest attention of the Congress of the United States, and that the inhabitants of these provinces will be relieved from the state of uncertainty and doubt which at this moment must necessarily prevail.

In the organization of the present temporary government and in its execution I have kept steadily in view the securing to the inhabitants of the Floridas all the privileges and immunities guaranteed to them by the treaty. The principal of these is the protection of their persons, property, and religion until they shall be incorporated into the Union and become entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. In performing this important part of my functions I have endeavored to pursue the spirit of our political institutions. I have made no discrimination of persons; my house has been surrounded by no guards; no one has been kept at a distance by repulsive formalities; all have had free admittance and found a ready ear when they required my aid for the protection of their rights. The American Government, at the same time it is the freest, is perhaps the strongest in the world, because the most wealthy and most powerful in society are as weak in opposition to it as the most humble and obscure. It knows no distinction between an ex-governor and a peasant. In the course of my short administration one case has, unfortunately, occurred which required the exertion of that authority which is no respecter of persons. That the necessity should have existed has occasioned me pain and regret, and especially as it has been misunderstood by some of the inhabitants of this country, from a want of a sufficient acquaintance with the facts of the case, as well as with the character and principles of our Government. It was my duty, under the treaty, exercising the government in the Flordias, to secure to the inhabitants all the evidences of their right of property. The improper conduct of the captain-general of Habana in withholding documents or archives of this nature from an agent sent expressly to receive them, increased the necessity for vigilance on my part.

It was made known to me by satisfactory evidence that there were documents of this character in the hands of an individual here, and that these documents were necessary to establish the right of property in this country. The fact ascertained, my duty was clear and no alternative was left me. That individual was ordered to surrender them, so that in pursuance of the second article of the treaty and of my proclamation, the inhabitants might be secured in their right of property. The individual thus ordered to deliver them, instead of obeying, as he ought, the commands of the Government under which he was protected, and which could know no superior except the Congress and the President of the United States, shifted them into the hands of the person who lately administered the government of this province and who had been authorized by the captain-general of Cuba to surrender the country agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty. This person, whether from misapprehension or worse motives, considered himself not responsible for any act of his to the government of the Floridas, and appeared entirely insensible to the impropriety of not having made a delivery of these documents of his own accord. Whatever diplomatic privileges he might have been entitled to, these privileges had ceased upon the surrender of this country, and he was then not known to me or recognized as having any other rights than those of a common individual. It was not enough for him to consider himself a public agent of the kind of Spain and reside here for the purpose of transacting official business with the agents of the United States, but it was necessary that he should have made known the object and purpose of his stay; had he done so he would have been informed at once by me that my own functions having ceased as commissioner, no one but the President of the United States had any power to give him permission to remain here as a diplomatic agent, enjoying the privileges of a foreign minister. The natural consequences of his conduct are too well known and need not be detailed.

With the exception of this solitary instance, I feel the utmost confidence in saying that nothing has occurred, notwithstanding the numerous cases in which I have been called upon to interpose my authority, either in a judicial or executive capacity, to occasion anything like distrust, discontent, or want of confidence, and I cheerfully take this occasion to express my satisfaction with the peaceful, obedient, and orderly conduct of all those whose allegiance has been transferred to the United States by the cession of the country. It is true the recent occurrence connected with the one referred to has compelled me to take measures I conceived necessary for the character, dignity, and harmony of the government I administer, and which, at the same time, were the mildest the circumstances would admit. I allude to the conduct of a number of the Spanish officers remaining here after the cession, without my permission, but which would certainly not have been withheld so long as they demeaned themselves respectfully to the existing authorities and refrained from any improper interference with the measure of the government. This respect is due from foreign officers in all countries; their situation is materially different from that of other aliens, and their conduct ought therefore to be more circumspect. In the United States those are severely punished who are guilty of writing in a libelous manner of proceedings in a court of justice, for what tends to bring the judiciary into disrepute shakes the public confidence in that part of the Government that is looked upon as the most sacred depository of individual rights.

Hence in both these points of view, without noticing the singular conduct of the Spanish officers, acting as if they considered themselves a distinct and separate body—an imperium in imperio—they were guilty of great indiscretion and impropriety in publishing a most indecent libel against the judicial proceeding of the highest tribunal in the Floridas. Had I consulted my personal feelings, having entertained a favorable opinion of some of them and enmity to none, I should have been disposed to have suffered the act to sink into oblivion. But the dignity and honor of the Government forbade that conduct so outrageous should pass unnoticed. I might appeal to those very persons and ask what would be the consequences if a band of American officers should offer such an insult to the government of a Spanish province. But the inhabitants of the Floridas may rest assured that whatever may be the impropriety or imprudence of some, it will have no effect upon my feelings toward the rest—the innocent will not be confounded with the guilty, and all will continue to experience the same protection and respect for their rights which has heretofore been extended, provided they demean themselves with that propriety which becomes every good citizen and subject; and should any of them, under the influence of momentary passion or feeling, be dissatisfied with the measures I have pursued, on a return of their sober judgment I feel confident they will be compelled to approve.

Considerations of a personal nature, and the situation of my family, requiring my absence from these provinces for a short period, I make known that in the meantime the government of East Florida is placed under the charge and direction of W. G. D. Worthington, esq., secretary for the same, and that of West Florida under that of Col. George Walton, secretary thereof. Each of these gentlemen is clothed with all the powers appertaining to governors under the late government of Spain, and subject to such instructions as they may respectively receive from the President of the United States through me. They are charged faithfully to protect and maintain all the citizens and inhabitants, of whatsoever description, in the said provinces, in the peaceful enjoyment of all their rights, privileges, and immunities secured to them under the late treaty with Spain, and under the Constitution of the United States as far as the same is applicable. I have instructed them promptly to punish the violators of the law and to require of all that allegiance to the Government enjoined by my proclamation issued on taking possession of the country.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Governor of the Floridas, etc.

PENSACOLA, October 6, 1821.

The Financial Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN P. JONES,

OF NEVADA.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Tuesday, February 13, 1900.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes—

Mr. JONES of Nevada said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: This bill, by whatever name known, is in effect but the final section of a great financial project of which the first section was enacted in 1869. That first section was a joint resolution of Congress entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit." It would more appropriately have been named "An act to strengthen the bank accounts of the foreign and domestic holders of United States bonds." It pledged the Government to pay in coin a debt incurred in paper money of much lower value. A second section was enacted when the bondholders determined to define, with unmistakable certainty, the description of coin in which the bonds should be paid. They were not willing to leave their equities to be determined by the courts according to the high standard of honor and honesty always prevailing among the people of the United States. By a clause inserted in the refunding act of 1870 it was provided that the bonds should be paid in coin of the standard of the date of enactment of that measure. The English language could not make plainer the fact that all bonds of the United States Government issued in pursuance of that act were payable in either gold or silver dollars of the standard of July 14, 1870. This meant either gold dollars of 25.8 grains, nine-tenths fine, or silver dollars of 412½ grains, nine-tenths fine; the Government having the option to pay in either.

Other steps in the amazingly farsighted and skillful project of the bondholders were successively taken, when in a new law affecting the working of the Mint the standard silver dollar was shrewdly omitted from the list of coins authorized to be issued, and when by the enactment of the "Revised Statutes," a codification (enacted in block), which was assumed by Congress to be an embodiment of the laws in force at the date of its enactment, a limitation was placed upon the legal-tender quality of the silver dollars already existing. This bill makes the obligations of the Government payable in gold alone.

There will be one or two other sections later. It would be somewhat premature to introduce them now. There will be a section later that in specific terms will retire all the paper money of the Government. It would not do to attempt to accomplish the entire purpose at once. It might shock the American people.

The intention is (as ever since 1869 it has been) that one of the sovereign powers of the Government of the United States, conferred by the Constitution upon Congress alone, shall be delegated to private corporations—the power to issue all that portion of our money which is to be redeemable in gold; and place the duty and responsibility of redemption not on the banks, but on the Government. The bill places in the hands of the national banks the control of the bonded debt of the country. Whenever the banks see fit they can reduce the gold reserve below the limit and force an issuance of bonds; and this process can go on indefinitely. The policy contemplates a permanent increase of the bonded debt of this country. No one can doubt this who has read our financial history for the past thirty-five years, during which the bondholders and public creditors have been leading up to the present measure. That history shows that when patriotism and plunder become synonymous terms it is easy to make converts among the beneficiaries. The legislation of that period, in all the stages of its attempt to reach the gold standard, has resulted in plundering the productive classes of the United States out of thousands of millions of dollars.

In a speech delivered here during the debate of 1893 on the repeal of the so-called Sherman law, I said:

> The repeal of the Sherman law, if accomplished, will be but one-half of the scheme of the banks. They desire to get silver first out of the way. The project is, and the determination of the banks is, that they must be permitted to have a monopoly of the issue of money. They insist that the Government shall cease the issuance of money and hand over the prerogative to them. By the Constitution the right to coin money was given to Congress. The bankers do not believe that was a wise provision on the part of the framers of the Constitution, who should have devolved this duty upon the banks.
> When silver is out of the way, they will acquiesce in the views of the producers of the country that more money is necessary, and will demand an issue of several hundred million dollars of bonds in order that the country may be enabled to have a sufficient volume of money to do its business and maintain some degree of prosperity.

One would not suppose that with so acute a class of men as the bond-holding coterie it would be at all necessary to advise them as to the interpretation of any law providing for the payment of their bonds. No class of people are better able to understand the meaning of plain English when engraved across the body of a bond. One would not suppose it necessary to provide supplemental enactments to relieve them from doubts (which they did not entertain) as to the kind of money in which their bonds should be paid.

By "due process of law" they transmuted lawful-money bonds (for which they paid in paper) into coin bonds. Those coin bonds are now to be transmuted into gold bonds. All men know that the public creditors could have been in no manner of doubt as to the money in which they should be paid. The laws were explicit, and the wording of the bonds was absolutely unmistakable. The statutes were of their own securing, and were worded in accordance with their wishes. The agents and trustees of the people, however—the officials intrusted with the execution of the laws—always interpreted those laws against the interests of the producing masses, and to their enormous injury, merely to gain the meretritious applause of the bond-holding and creditor classes.

When, in 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury wished to make the new bonds read "payable in gold" he was advised by the Attorney-General of the United States that the law required the bonds to be payable not in gold, but in "coin" of the standard of July 14, 1870.

The determination of the executive officers of the United States to pay in gold enormously added to the value of gold. That act was not the act of our people or of Congress, but the act of the agents and officers who had in charge the execution of the laws.

This bill, Mr. President, is vicious from the first line to the last. What a monstrous proposition it is that a self-governing country should allow any executive officer to bond the people to any amount he pleases! The demonetization of silver is alone all that creates the necessity for issuing bonds. There could never be any doubt of the Government's ability, without the issuance of bonds, to redeem in coin any of its notes.

I listened with interest to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] while he was stating the necessity for a great reserve fund of gold. Why, Mr. President, if you take a bill of the Bank of France to that bank and ask its officers for gold, will they give it to you? Not at all. They have no special fund to redeem in gold. They have maintained the two moneys at a parity, yet if a man should take a million francs of paper to the Bank of France and demand the gold he would be laughed at. They would say, "We will give you lawful money, in whatever form we choose. If you want gold we will sell it to you at a premium." Yet France has no trouble with its money, and is not enslaving the country with a constantly increasing debt. When the Baring failure took place it was observed that the Bank of England had to go to France, a so-called double-standard country, to borrow gold with which to maintain its credit; and it was not the first occasion on which it had to do so.

BIMETALLISM.

Our gold-standard friends have given us a great many definitions of bimetallism and have been careful to keep from the public mind the definition which bimetallists themselves would approve. We are told that bimetallism consists of the concurrent use of the two metals, gold and silver, in the same country; again, that bimetallism consists of the use of gold as the measure of value, with silver as money in general use. Bimetallists, however, define it to be the equal treatment of both metals—that is to say, the unrestricted coinage of both when brought to the mint. There is no other form of bimetallism. That was the bimetallism which existed from the foundation of our Government down to 1873, and that was the bimetallism which existed in France for nearly a hundred years down to 1873.

The object in having the two metals linked together by the mandate of law at a given ratio was to protect society and industry from the irregularities and accidents liable to occur in the production from the mines, so that their mutual oscillations of supply might correct each other. With the exception of the period when the American mines were first discovered no simultaneous increase of both metals has occurred since the opening of the Christian era. Whenever one of the metals has been yielding in unusual quantity the other has generally been yielding in a stationary, if not declining quantity, so that the aggregate production has shown but slight variation.

The underlying idea of bimetallism is that a rise in the value of money, or to state it in other terms, a fall in the general range of prices of commodities, is an evil of the greatest magnitude, against the occurrence of which society should take every possible precaution. There is no need to guard against a fall in the value of money, because throughout the entire period of history not an instance can be cited in which such a fall did not prove a benefaction to mankind.

What is claimed for bimetallism is that upon the slightest indication that one of the metals is becoming relatively scarce the pressure of the demand is removed from it and brought to bear upon the other. The bimetallic law, therefore, operates through supply and demand, which all admit to be the only factors entering into the creation of value. It is the enormous surplus of the metals in existence which places it within the power of the law to control their relative value. The larger this surplus becomes the more exactly and permanently can the law control them.

The stocks of the two metals taken together have been very happily likened to two reservoirs, which, although supplied from independent sources, are kept at a common level by means of a connecting pipe. This "pipe," which establishes a legal relation of value between them, is the law, which, by authorizing their interchangeable use as money, maintains their value at the same level. Both being equally possessed of full legal-tender power at the established ratio, no one will give more for one metal than for the other. This is not mere theorizing. It has been subjected to the crucial test of experience.

THE EXPERIENCE OF FRANCE.

In 1803 France fixed by law the legal relation between gold and silver at 15½ to 1. For seventy years, while that law was in operation, the two metals were held together at practically that ratio, though with a preponderance sometimes of the one and sometimes of the other in circulation.

A glance at the figures of French coinage from 1803 to 1873 will exhibit the operation of the system:

Coinage in France from 1803 to 1873.

Date.	Gold.	Silver.
	Francs.	Francs.
1803 to 1820	865,000,000	1,091,000,000
1821 to 1847	501,000,000	2,778,000,000
1848 to 1852	448,000,000	543,000,000
1853 to 1856	1,795,000,000	162,000,000
1857 to 1866	3,516,000,000	55,000,000
1867 to 1873	878,000,000	587,000,000

From these figures it will be observed that when either of the metals became relatively scarce its place was supplied by the other. So far as the people of the bimetallic country (France) were concerned, this did not involve any disturbance of the relative values of the two metals. Whenever silver was withdrawn for shipment to countries in which silver alone was legal tender, its place was supplied in the bimetallic country by gold. Whenever gold was withdrawn from the bimetallic country for shipment to countries in which gold alone was legal tender, its place was supplied by silver. Such slight variations as occurred in exchange were caused for the most part by the demands of single-standard countries for their particular money metal.

In those cases, what by the brokers is called the "premium," such as it was, was not a premium arising from any difference in the bimetallic country in the value of the metals, but a charge made by dealers in foreign exchange for gathering together during the period of the predominance of one metal in the coinage a sufficient quantity of the other—the scarcer—metal to meet the demands to which I have referred. The charges of the money dealers were proportioned, no doubt, to the urgency of the demands from countries that did not have the double standard. England being a gold-standard country, a demand from that country would be met by French brokers with a shipment of gold. When Germany was on the silver standard a demand from Germany would be met by French brokers with a shipment of silver.

Notwithstanding all the statements we see in the so-called "sound-money" papers, and all the statements we hear from the advocates of the gold standard about the impossibility of law holding the two metals together, the facts and figures show that there never was a variation in the purchasing or debt-paying power of the two metals so long as the law of France giving unrestricted coinage to both metals at the ratio of 15½ to 1 was maintained. During that period various countries changed their monetary systems, yet that law held the two metals firm with no variation. During no part of that time were the prices of commodities in France stated in silver as distinguished from gold, or in gold as distinguished from silver. There was but one price, and the two metals were precisely the same in their purchasing and debt-paying power.

After an exhaustive search through the official records from 1820 to 1847, while silver was the metal of largest coinage in France, the utmost so-called "premium"—that is to say, the brokers' charge—on gold in Paris that the most persistent opponent of bimetallism—Sir Robert Giffen—has been able to discover is 2.1 per cent in August, 1832. This was during a period when, as will be observed by reference to the table, the coinages of France were in the proportion of nine-tenths silver to one-tenth gold. I wish it to be specially noted that while among the professional money brokers and exchange dealers there was this trifling charge or so-called premium on gold, it had no relation whatever to the people or the industries of France.

Gold was wanted by single standard gold countries, such as England, where there was a money famine; it was bought up by brokers, who made a business of exchanges, and they naturally charged for their services, as they would do if they bought or sold bonds or stocks. That so-called "premium" was such as might have arisen had the monetary standard of France been gold alone. As we all know, the fact that a country is on the gold standard does not secure it against differences of exchange either with foreign countries or within itself. I have seen material differences in the value of gold between New York and San Francisco—differences having no connection whatever with silver, but arising solely from the temporary condition of balances at the one place or the other.

If the usual or normal rate of discount at the Bank of England be 3 per cent, and an increase to 5 per cent be announced, what in reality is this but an announcement of a premium of 2 per cent on gold in the very country of the gold standard?

While the champions of the gold standard are shocked at a trifling difference of 2 per cent in countries of the double standard, though arising only in the operations of bullion dealers, and in their cases only in connection with the foreign exchanges, they have no word of condemnation for the stupendously unjust exaction to which the domestic business of every gold-standard country has for many years been subjected by a constant and progressive increase in the value of the so-called standard. They strain at the bimetallic gnat, but swallow the monometallic camel. Thousands of millions of dollars have through the silent and stealthy operation of the gold standard been filched from owners of property, by the fall of values and from laborers willing to work, who, owing to the fall of prices, have been relegated to idleness.

The demand of the people of any country is not a demand for either gold or silver as such, but a demand for money. When each metal serves equally well to exchange commodities and pay debts, nothing further can be desired. In the case of the double-standard country (France) each form of money had all the power of the other. Under such circumstances the metals should have and did have the same value so far as concerned all the purposes of the people of the bimetallic country.

As I have said, there were no two prices current in France. There was no differentiation of prices of commodities into gold prices and silver prices. All prices in all markets were alike and were stated in terms of the money of France without reference to gold, silver, or anything else. Whether the money received in payment for commodities or services was gold or silver was to the recipient a matter of entire indifference.

THE METALS HELD TOGETHER BY THE BIMETALLIC LAW OF FRANCE, NOTWITHSTANDING EXTRAORDINARY VARIATIONS IN PRODUCTION.

That the steadiness of the legal relation of the metals from 1803 to 1873 could not be due to steadiness of their relative supplies from the mines will be obvious by noting the wide variations that occurred in their relative production during that period.

From 1803 to 1820 the average yearly yield of gold from all mines of the world was $9,710,500. The yield of silver during the same period was $36,847,500. This was a proportion of 4 of silver to 1 of gold! Yet the law of France establishing the ratio of 15½ to 1 held the metals firmly together. Again, from 1821 to 1840 the average yearly yield of gold was $11,466,000; of silver, $21,964,000—2 of silver to 1 of gold. Again the French law held the metals together. On the other hand, from 1841 to 1860 the average yearly yield of gold was $85,150,000; of silver, $34,826,500—2½ of gold to 1 of silver! Still the bimetallic law held the metals together. From 1861 to 1873 the average yearly yield of gold was $117,991,850; of silver, $68,043,900—nearly 2 of gold to 1 of silver; another illustration of the power of law. These figures show extremes of yield on both sides without variance in the relative values of the metals.

There is nothing unnatural in this. Even Sir Robert Giffen (in the Contemporary Review for August, 1879) admitted that it was to be expected. He said:

> Doubtless the fluctuation in any particular metal at the time when both metals were available as money would not be very great within any reasonable period. That is one of the points of special advantage for the system of bimetallism.

And Professor Hansen, of the Berlin University, said, in 1868:

> Europe, or, rather, the whole civilized world, is indebted to French law for its escape from the perturbations in the relative prices of gold and silver threatened by the enormous arrivals from Australia and California.

ADMITTED BY THE BRITISH ROYAL COMMISSION.

On the same subject the British Royal Commission on Gold and Silver (1886) expressed itself without reserve. Part I of the final report (being the portion signed by all the members of the commission) contains a clear and unmistakable admission by the gold monometallists of the effect of the French law. It says:

> Now, undoubtedly, the date which forms the dividing line between an epoch of approximate fixity in the relative value of gold and silver and one of marked instability is the year when the bimetallic system which had previously been in force in the Latin Union ceased to be in full operation, and we are irresistibly led to the conclusion that the operation of that system, established, as it was, in countries the population and commerce of which were considerable, exerted a material influence upon the relative value of the two metals.

So long as that system was in force we think that, notwithstanding the changes in the production and use of the precious metals, it kept the market price of silver approximately steady at the ratio fixed by law between them, namely, 15½ to 1.

That is the statement of the entire twelve members of the royal commission, of whom six were gold monometallists of distinction.

The royal commission continues:

Nor does it appear to us a priori unreasonable to suppose that the existence in the Latin Union of a bimetallic system with a ratio of 15½ to 1 fixed between the two metals should have been capable of keeping the market price of silver steady at approximately that ratio.

The view that it could only affect the market price to the extent to which there was a demand for it for currency purposes in the Latin Union, or to which it was actually taken to the mints of those countries is, we think, fallacious.

The fact that the owner of silver could in the last resort take it to those mints and have it converted into coin which would purchase commodities at the ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold would, in our opinion, be likely to affect the price of silver in the market generally, whoever the purchaser and for whatever country it was destined. It would enable the seller to stand out for a price approximating to the legal ratio, and would tend to keep the market steady at about that point. (Final Report, Part I, sections 192 and 193.)

While the royal commission ascribed to the Latin Union as a whole the effect of maintaining the ratio, it must be remembered that the treaty creating that union was not entered into until 1865, and that France alone for sixty-two years prior to that time had maintained the ratio with equal force without reference to which of the metals showed the greater yield. Had not the law of 1803 been in operation during the "fifties," when the enormous stocks of gold from California and Australia were finding their way to Europe, that metal would have fallen, as in early times it more than once fell, to the ratio of 1 to 10. So that the law of one important country held the metals together, because it was a country whose industries and commerce were of sufficient magnitude and extent. To whatever extent gold fell in relation to commodities silver also fell. This condition prevailed until the French law was practically abrogated.

THE PRETENSE THAT NATURAL LAW FORBIDS REMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

Laws enacted forbidding the unrestricted coinage of silver deprived that metal of the great mint demand; that is to say, of the "market" which from time immemorial it had enjoyed. This was an effect produced wholly by legislation, and in the interest of a few privileged persons who owned public and other debts. When it is proposed, not in their interest, but in the interest of the masses, that the "market" be restored—in other words, that the mints be reopened through the only process by which that result can be effected, namely, by legislation—the creditor and money-lending classes hold up their hands in horror at the injustice! They declare such legislation to be an interference with "natural law." With Pecksniffian morality they have always regarded as "natural" everything that tended to make money dearer, and did not themselves hesitate to invoke the powerful arm of legislation to aid in increasing that tendency.

A law which forbids the use of an article for a certain purpose to which for thousands of years it has been dedicated they regard as "natural," while a law which removes the restriction and permits the article to be restored to that use they characterize as "artificial." Deprive either gold or silver of the legal-tender function and it becomes immediately relegated to the rank of a commodity, because deprived of the force which creates the demand for it. A demand for either metal as a commodity is a demand for but one thing. A demand for either for the purpose of bearing the money function is, in effect, a demand for all things.

For the money use, considering the world's growing demands for money, the total stock of both metals combined is not now, and, judging from the past, in all human probability never will be, other than extremely limited. Were both relegated to the commodity demand, there being already on hand a supply sufficient to meet all demands of that character for sixty years without reference to the current yield, what would be the value of either or both?

The same legislation which by force took from silver the demand (the market) which for thousands of years in the interests of society it had enjoyed enlarged the demand for gold. From that time forth, for the first time in history, there was committed to gold exclusively a function which theretofore it had merely shared in equal part with silver, the function, namely, of measuring and exchanging all commodities, property, and services in the Western world. But to the gold stock was now superadded the task of also measuring and exchanging all the silver previously used as money, which had been reduced to a commodity.

When, therefore, Germany demonetized her silver coin there was practically placed on the market a quantity of metal sufficient to supply all demand for commodity purposes for at least ten years. This largely increased the demand for, and consequently the value of, gold. In the equation existing between money and commodities one of the factors had been wrongfully removed from the money side and added to the side of commodities. It was no fear of an excessive yield of silver that induced France to close her mints to that metal. They never would have been closed to the current production. They need not have been closed to even the silver of Germany had economic considerations alone governed the policy of France. The reasons for her action were clearly political. The French people after 1870 were in no mood to take from Germany anything that Germany would offer them, and especially anything which Germany wished to discard.

If, in 1873, the United States had kept its mints open to silver we could then have received and utilized that German metal at a time when we were contemplating resumption of specie payments. Had such course been pursued, the past quarter of a century would have been the most prosperous in the history of the world.

France took very much more gold after the discoveries of 1848 than she would need to have taken in 1871, even had all the silver of Germany been sent to her mints.

The population of France at the time of the enactment of the bimetallic law was less than 28,000,000, only a little over one-third the present population of the United States. The foreign trade of France in 1800, including imports and exports, amounted to but $155,000,000. If such a population, with so slight a foreign trade, were able to maintain the equivalence of relation between the metals, who can doubt that were silver remonetized by the United States the metals could be permanently bound together on the long-established ratio?

THE RELATIONS OF THE METALS IN THE UNITED STATES.

In this country we have had a practical illustration of the varying movement of the metals when both had unrestricted access to the mints, though at different legal valuations. Upon the organization of our mint in 1792, the relation between gold and silver was fixed by law at 15 to 1. This rated silver at a figure higher than the legal rate in France, which was 15½. Gold accordingly left our country and went to France, where, under the law, it was more highly valued. We had practically no gold in circulation, therefore, until a change in the law was effected in 1834. The legal relation between the metals was then established by the United States at 16 to 1. This rated silver at less than the legal ratio of France, whereupon that metal, instead of gold, took its way to France. The coinage rate of that country being more favorable, and ours less favorable, in the first instance to gold, and in the second to silver, we were in each case deprived of the metal which by law we had valued at a rate less than that of France. We were put to no loss or inconvenience, however, because each metal was as effective as the other in all payments, and they simply exchanged places.

Who can doubt that in this matter law and fact stood toward each other in the relation of cause and effect? Did "market" value have anything to do with it? Did not the legal relation which France had established control absolutely the movements of the metals? Was there any such thing as "commodity price" or "market price?" None whatever. It was the money value in France that governed. Had the value of silver been governed by the demand for bullion in the arts and manufactures, is it for a moment to be supposed that in the long series of years during which the yield from the mines, as I have shown, varied enormously from year to year, the relation of value between the metals should have remained what the records show? It seems to me to be cumulative testimony to the efficacy of the law to fix and maintain the relative values of the metals.

Mr. President, the arguments made by the advocates of bimetallism in this body have never been met. When we have asserted the most obvious of fundamental principles, we have received only ridicule and objurgation. I am quite sure that if in a discussion of the money question I should assert that "a straight line is the shortest distance between two given points," I should be met with the convincing reply that "that is a fallacy coming from the silver trust;" and if I should assert that "things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another," I should be met with the argument that "that is an emanation from a rotten borough." Those illustrate the species of "argument" that has been furnished in reply to the logical reasonings of the bimetallists.

In every way possible it has been attempted to belittle the importance of silver in the history of the United States. One of the points advanced in this connection is the small number of dollar pieces coined up to 1878. The fact of the coinage of few silver-dollar pieces during the early history of the country is of no more importance than the other fact, equally undeniable, that in our whole history the number of gold-dollar pieces coined has been less than twenty million, and that such pieces are not now permitted to be coined at all. The contention we make is not that a particular silver coin should be minted, but that silver should have equal access to the mints with gold.

The reason for the slight demand for silver-dollar pieces in the early history of the country was the great abundance of Spanish silver dollars for forty or fifty years after the Mint was established; and afterwards, the great abundance of Mexican silver dollars, both of which were a legal tender in the United States. But while the unnecessary expense was avoided of procuring the coinage of a particular piece which was already well supplied, it is still true that from 1793 to 1846 there was more full-tender silver coined than there was of gold; and even from 1834 to 1846, although silver was largely undervalued by the coinage law of 1834, there was nearly as much full-tender silver coined as gold. Prior to 1834 all gold coins, domestic and foreign, had disappeared from circulation in consequence of the premium on gold, which, at the legal relation then existing of 15 to 1, ranged between 5 and 7 per cent after 1821, when the Bank of England began gold payments.

It was only after the California discoveries that gold was much used. Prior to that time the reserves of the State banks were almost wholly in silver, largely in American half dollars, which, as well as the smaller coins, were full legal tender. It is a flagrant perversion of history to deny the important part that silver played in the monetary history of the country. The silver-dollar piece was little called for, not only because it was superseded by the Spanish and Mexican dollar pieces, but because the half-dollar piece answered all the purposes of the dollar piece. It is not so much the silver-dollar piece that was or is specifically needed, but the free access of silver bullion to the mint, to be coined into standard money in any convenient form which the law might authorize—money of full debt-paying power.

Some men assert that silver was practically demonetized by the act of 1834, which undervalued it; others that it was practically demonetized by the act of 1853 authorizing subsidiary silver coin. If silver was at either of those times demonetized, it is difficult to understand the persistency of the efforts in 1873 and 1874 to secure the passage of a law to demonetize it. Watchful and persistent efforts are never undertaken to accomplish what is already accomplished. The manifest truth is that silver was demonetized in 1873–74, not because it was already demonetized, but because it was still money and stood in the way of a scheme to establish a gold standard. The essence of money being the legal-tender function (the authority of law), it is only by law that anything which is money can be demonetized, and silver was as completely a money metal in this country until 1873–74 as it had ever been. That metal stood guard over the industries of the United States, ready to save them from destruction by a gold standard.

NO LOGICAL REASON EVER GIVEN FOR DEMONETIZING SILVER.

No satisfactory reason has ever been given for the enactment of the laws of 1873–74 demonetizing silver. The principal reason advanced in the House of Representatives was that the silver dollar was 3 per cent more valuable than the gold dollar, and that therefore no silver was brought to the mint. If that were a good reason it equally applied to gold. No gold was brought to the mint. Paper money had been the only circulating medium for eleven years. It could not be urged that the business of the country was subjected to any injury by fluctuations in the relative value, compared with gold, of a metal which was not in use. Nor can it be understood how any harm could have resulted from the retention of the option of using either of the metals, for it is not disputed that such option existed. It was a most valuable option, and it seems extraordinary that so much effort should have been made to give it away without any consideration whatever to the Government or people of the United States.

The object of the framers of the law of 1873, which omitted the standard silver dollar from the list of authorized coins, could not have been to strengthen the public credit of the United States. The amount of credit which a nation or an individual can possess depends upon the strength and extent of the belief among capitalists that the borrower is able and willing to meet the exact terms of his obligations. An offer to do more would be not only absurd and illogical, but would subject the debtor to suspicion and distrust. He can not improve his credit by promising to pay a larger amount of money, nor by promising to pay in money of greater value than that of the obligation held against him. The best way to improve credit, public or private, is to perform the contract with exactness and in its entirety. The debtor who insists upon all his rights and who himself observes all his obligations has nothing to fear.

MONETARY ISSUES NO PART OF LEGITIMATE BANKING.

We have become so accustomed to the issue of notes by the national banks and the use of these notes as money that such issues are coming to be regarded as a natural and proper part of the business of banking; and, as a corollary to that, we hear it said that the Government should issue no notes, but should "go out of the banking business." The fact is that the issue of circulating notes is no part of the business of banks. As Prof. Bonamy Price says, it has been "superadded" to banking. In the discussions relating to the Bank of England no voice has been more potent than that of Lord Overstone. In the testimony which that distinguished authority gave before the select committee of the House of Commons in 1857, he was asked this question:

Do you consider the separation of the issue and banking department of the Bank of England to be founded upon the principle that the business of issue and the business of banking are in their nature distinct?

To this he replied:

Undoubtedly; it is impossible to entertain any other view of the matter.

He was then asked the question:

What, in your Lordship's view, are the main causes of the fundamental distinction between the business of issue and the business of banking?

To this Lord Overstone replied:

That question necessarily raises the great question, What is the principle upon which the management of the paper money of the country ought to be regulated?

Then he goes on to say:

First. The supply of the current coin—that is, the money of the realm—ought to be entirely separated from banking business, which is simply trading in money, borrowing at a low rate and lending at a higher rate. Second. A £5 bank note is, in fact, a token or certificate representing 5 sovereigns; and no banker or private individual ought to be allowed to issue such tokens or certificates, any more than they are permitted to issue the coins of the realm.

After stating that the circulation of paper money tends to displace coin, Lord Overstone quotes from a speech delivered by Daniel Webster, as follows:

If others may drive out the coin and fill the country with paper which does not represent coin, of what use is that exclusive power over coins and coinage which is given to Congress by the Constitution?

And Mr. Webster adds:

Wherever paper is to circulate, as subsidiary to coin, or as performing in a greater or less degree the function of coin, its regulation naturally belongs to the hands which hold the power over the coinage. This is an admitted maxim by all writers.

The issue department of the Bank of England Lord Overstone regarded as a department of the Government of England, and not a department of the bank proper. The issue of paper money he regarded as part of the prerogative of coinage, and he speaks of "The sole priviledge of coining money, whether copper, silver, gold, or paper." "No share of such privilege," he says, "ought to be conceded in any form to banks or private individuals," and he adds that—

All profit arising from the issue of paper certificates, that is, bank notes in place of coin * * * ought to be appropriated to the public exchequer, and ought not to be diverted to the benefit of banks or any other concerns.

In the same investigation Lord Overstone says:

Perfect freedom of competition should be established in the business of banking, correctly understood and effectually distinguished from the function of coinage or from that of issuing paper tokens or representatives of coins—that is, bank notes, which, in fact, is coining under a form peculiarly susceptible of abuse.

And he quotes from Mr. Tooke the statement—

The privilege of issuing paper money is a delegation of that which is universally considered as a privilege residing in the State.

The issue department of the Bank of England Lord Overstone describes to be "nothing more than a department of the State, worked mechanically and clerically by the clerks of the Bank of England, but essentially a department of the State."

Inasmuch as the bill before the Senate will in effect turn over to the national banks the duty of supplying the country with paper money, it is a question for the people of the United States to determine whether they are ready and willing to transfer to thousands of private corporations a duty which inheres in the sovereign power alone.

For my part, although not a lawyer, I believe it is wholly unconstitutional for Congress to delegate this function of sovereignty and invest it in corporations which in its exercise will be guided, not by the requirements of the public welfare, but entirely by their own selfish interests. When the prices of property and commodities are rising the banks will increase their issues, because it will then be to their interest to do so. On the other hand, when the prices are falling, they will diminish their issues, call in their loans, and bankrupt great numbers of enterprises. When Senators know that it is the quantity of money that determines the value of every man's property, I can not understand how they can consent to placing in the hands of private corporations the power of changing at will the value of the unit of money. Money should be issued in the interest of all the people. The banks would issue it or withdraw it entirely from motives of cupidity, and none other.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] admitted this fact when he stated in debate that the banks had not taken advantage of their right to issue circulating notes because it was not profitable for them to do so. Therefore we are to have a note issue whenever it is profitable for the banks, that is, when general prices are firm or rising. On the other hand, when prices are falling, when it is of the utmost importance to the masses of the people of the country that more money should be in circulation in order that prices may be held firm, the banks will refuse to issue because it is not in their interest—because they can not then make money out of it. Bank issues are never profitable until there is a tendency to rising prices. At such times the banks would put out more money than would be warranted by our distributive share of what is called "the money of the world," prices would go on rising, and the Government of the United States would be obliged to go into debt time and time again in order to maintain the so-called gold standard.

THE VALUE OF MONEY IS DETERMINED BY THE QUANTITY OUT, IRRESPECTIVE OF THE MATERIAL.

I now come to another phase of this great question, a phase that can never be omitted from a discussion on money.

The value of money is determined not by the materials of which it is made, but by the number of units of which the monetary stock consists. All political economists of repute from the time of Locke—even from the time of Aristotle—to the present time admit this to be true. The principle is that the value of the unit of money in any country is determined by the number of units in circulation; that is to say, the value of each dollar depends on the total number of dollars out. The greater the number of dollars out, other things being equal, the less the value of each dollar. The fewer the number of dollars out, other things equal, the greater will be the value of each dollar; and in this determination of value the material on which the Government stamp is placed plays no part whatever.

In former addresses upon this subject I have cited the leading authorities, among whom stand the principal economists of the world, and I will not weary the Senate by repeating their statements in extenso. I have heretofore cited at length the statement of Paulus, the Roman jurisconsult, whose formulation became incorporated in the Pandects of Justinian, that—

This material (money), stamped in the corner by the State, circulates with a power that it derives not from the substance but from the quantity.

I have cited John Locke to the effect that—

The value of money in any one country is the present quantity of the current money in that country in proportion to the present trade.

I have quoted Hume, the historian, who stated that—

It is the total quantity of the money in circulation in any country which determines what portion of that quantity shall exchange for a certain portion of the goods or commodities of that country. It is the proportion between the circulating money and the commodities in the market which determines the price.

I have quoted James Mill, who, in his treatise on political economy, said that—

In whatever degree the quantity of money is increased or diminished, other things remaining the same, in that same proportion the value of the whole and of every part is reciprocally diminished or increased.

John Stuart Mill also lays down the maxim that—

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity; every increase of quantity lowering the value and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

And Ricardo says:

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing.

And he adds:

That commodities would rise or fall in price in proportion to the increase or diminution of money, I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

One of the later economists, Professor Sidgwick, professor of political economy in Cambridge University, says:

The exchange value of any particular coin will vary in exactly inverse ratio to the variations in quantity of the aggregate.

In the celebrated bullion report of 1810 the principle is laid down that—

An increased demand for gold and a consequent scarcity of that article will make it more valuable in proportion to all other articles; the same quantity of gold will purchase a greater quantity of any other article than it did before; in other words, the real price of gold, or the quantity of commodities given in exchange for it, will rise, and the money prices of all commodities will fall.

Professor Bowen, of Harvard University, states it as follows:

The general principle is that the value of money falls in exactly the same ratio in which its quantity is increased. If the whole money in circulation should be doubled prices would be doubled; if it was only increased one-fourth prices would rise one-fourth.

It must always be borne in mind that this principle, when stated, should be accompanied by the phrase "other things being equal." Professor Bowen expresses it in these words:

The principle, however, holds good only under the supposition that the quantity of commodities, the number of exchanges, and the number of people having occasion to effect exchanges, remain unaltered. Otherwise, if there be an increase in either of these respects, the quantity of money being unchanged, the value of that money would rise, or, if money is increasing, the increase in these other respects may neutralize, wholly or in part, the depreciation of that money.

Professor Bowen further states:

All exchange, as I have said, as a barter of merchandise for money, and the quantity of money which an article of merchandise will command in the market is termed its price. Increase that quantity [that is, the quantity of money] and the price of all articles inevitably rises; diminish it [that is, diminish the quantity of money] and the price as certainly falls.

Prof. Stanley Jevons, in his well-known work on Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, goes so far as to state that the value of a paper money, entirely inconvertible, is determined according to this same law of quantity. He says:

There is plenty of evidence to prove that an inconvertible paper money, if carefully limited in quantity, can retain its full value. "Such," he adds, "was the case with the Bank-of-England notes for several years after the suspension of specie payments in 1797, and such is the case with the present notes of the Bank of France"— referring to the notes issued after the Franco-Prussian war.

In a note to Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (Book II, chapter 2) Mr. McCulloch says:

Convertibility into gold or silver at the pleasure of the holder is not, as Dr. Smith supposes, necessary to sustain the value of such paper as has been made legal tender. Its value may be kept on a par with that of gold, or may be raised to any higher level by merely limiting its quantity.

Professor Perry says:

If for any reason gold becomes relatively more abundant in one country than in other commercial countries around it, general prices will rise in that country in consequence.

That is to say, in consequence of the increase of the quantity of money.

Professor Bowen carries the statement further when, in referring to our greenbacks, he states that—

The want of faith in the promise to pay, or the opinion which may be entertained respecting the probability of the notes being redeemed at some future day, more or less remote, is not the cause even of the depreciation of paper money. The extent of the depreciation depends not at all on the want of faith in the ability and disposition of the Government to pay off the notes in full in specie, or on the nearness or remoteness of the time when it is likely to do so, but solely on the relative amount of the currency as compared with the needs of business.—Bowen's American Political Economy, page 245.

In stating that the value of money depends on its quantity and that the value of each piece of money, as Mr. Mill puts it, is "in inverse ratio" to the number of pieces, it is to be understood that the value of money is nothing whatever but its general exchange power; that is to say, its general purchasing or debt-paying power. When, therefore, it is said that the value of money is increasing, what is meant is that the monetary unit will exchange for a larger proportion of other things; and when it is said that the value of money is falling, what is meant is that it will exchange for a smaller proportion of other things.

Strictly speaking, therefore, the value of gold is not to be ascertained by stating that it sells for $20.67 an ounce. The value of gold or of anything else can be determined only by ascertaining its general power in exchange; that is to say, the quantity of commodities in general which an ounce of it will command.

That the value of the money unit depends on the quantity of money actually or potentially in circulation has never been denied by any of the great writers upon political economy, although of late, it must be confessed, some of our economical philosophers have shown symptoms of perturbation, and in some cases a desire to minimize the force of this long-established principle—that, other things being equal, the value of the money unit in any country depends absolutely on the number of units. The more this principle is reflected upon and studied out to its last analysis, the more clearly will its correctness be demonstrated. The history of money in all times will illustrate its truth.

It must be manifest that the relation of money to other things is a numerical relation. If the idea of numbers is kept in mind in connection with the conception of money, the subject is much simplified. This involves, as a necessary corollary, the idea of limitation. Limitation is the essence of money. When the statement is made that the value of the money unit—that is to say, its purchasing power—depends altogether upon the number of units, and not at all upon the material, the objection is made that, if the idea of money value be removed from the material on which the stamp is placed, society will be subjected to some great danger—that is to say, that it comes to be understood that money can be made of an inexpensive material, depending for its value upon something other than its weight, color, or specific gravity—nothing can prevent a flood of such money from inundating industry and commerce! This objection, however, will not bear the test of investigation. The very idea of quantity involves and implies limitation.

Limitation means regulation, and regulation signifies the intelligent adaptation of means to ends. It is of universal application. We can hardly conceive of an agency more dangerous to human life than the great oceans that surround the continents. Yet the Hollanders have no difficulty in regulating and limiting the ocean power and compelling it to contribute to the happiness and welfare of man. Limitation, regulation, in all things is necessary. Regulation, based on increasing knowledge, is, beyond all else, that feature of our advancing civilization which distinguishes it from the merely empirical systems of the past. There is no difficulty in securing it when its beneficent effects are understood. Even liberty itself is subject to this interpretation. Liberty does not mean license. In the physical world every power which contributes to the welfare of mankind is necessarily regulated; the action of steam; the operation of the electrical currents—every force that makes for human progress or advances human development. All have come to be controlled and regulated in such manner as to contribute to the welfare of mankind.

The science of money, both in its scientific and its practical aspects, will never be understood until this natural law, the law of quantity, is thoroughly mastered and accepted. The absence of a scientific appreciation and practical observance of all that is implied in this law of quantity is not unlike in its effects to the failure of the world for many centuries to determine by the sun the position of ships on the sea. Imagine the confusion that would pervade the world of commerce to-day were men without an intelligent theory of navigation or were they ignorant of the natural laws relating to the progress and situation of vessels upon the surface of the globe!

If quantity is not the element which gives value to money—if the value of money be indeed, as some claim, derived from the material of which it is composed, and especially if a material be better adapted for money in proportion as it is valuable—why is it that metals other than gold, of which there are many more rare and more valuable, are not selected to be the material of money?

Manifestly because the quantity—the number of units—would not be sufficient to fulfill the functions of money. When the question is examined it will be found that it is not any quality of the metal as such that is necessary or desirable. What quality in gold is relied upon as the valuable quality? Surely not its color, other articles have the same color; not its weight, other metals are as heavy; not its form, other metals may be shaped and rounded into coins resembling gold coins. Even the division of the gold unit by the number of grains is only useful in determining the quantity of money that can be obtained from a given quantity of gold. Should we double the number of grains in the gold dollar, there would be but half the number of dollars; should we put but half the number of grains into a dollar, there would be twice as many gold dollars.

"QUANTITY" AND "QUALITY."

But, it is said, that in contending for the law of quantity we ignore what is termed the more important element of quality. There is no quality whatever in money, except that which is imparted to it by quantity and by law. There is no money in nature. It is a function given by law, created by government; and it is that function which gives value to the material on which the government stamp is placed. The money function is the all-sufficient guaranty of the money value, the value of each unit being determined by the number of the units. The total purchasing power in any country at any time will be represented by whatever quantity of money may be in existence in that country at that time.

If the number of monetary units be increased, the proportion of purchasing or debt-paying power of the unit must necessarily decrease. If, on the other hand, instead of an increase in the quantity of money, some proportion of the money stock were taken away, the total purchasing power would still remain the same, but would be divided among the smaller number of units remaining, and so each unit would represent a larger purchasing power. And this is true without reference to the material upon which the stamp is placed. The value of each dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, is determined absolutely by the whole number of dollars, assuming, of course, that the dollars have equal legal-tender power. And, strictly speaking, nothing is money unless it have full legal-tender power—full power to pay taxes and discharge debts. All forms of money not having full legal-tender power are, to the extent of their deficiency in that respect, practically counterfeit. No money should be permitted to circulate that has not full power to pay debts and taxes and discharge all obligations whatsoever.

In all the discussions that have taken place on the money question in this country and in Europe for many years I have never seen any attempt to confute the authorities I have quoted. I have never heard any Senator in this Chamber deny the truth of the principles laid down by those authorities. Is it not most singular that with reference to so important a question as this there is no attempt to prove the superiority of gold as a material of money? Like other problems that do not admit of demonstration, it is permitted to be taken for granted. There is no fact in history that demonstrates any such superiority, but, on the contrary, many facts which demonstrate that gold is an undesirable material upon which to depend for monetary purposes.

The quality which is asserted of gold, which entitles it in a preeminent sense to be the material of money, is the quality known to loose thinkers and inexact speakers as intrinsic value. Notwithstanding that the most eminent economists have shown over and over again that there is no such thing as intrinsic value, the writers and speakers of the gold-standard school constantly hold before the people the idea that the intrinsic value of gold is the element which by nature and evolution adapt it for the money use. They find this to their advantage in securing the general adoption of the idea that gold is the only true material for money.

In discussing the subject of value the Earl of Lauderdale, in his Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth, pertinently observes:

> The term value, whatever might have been its original sense, as it is used in common language does not express a quality inherent in any commodity. There is nothing which possesses a real, intrinsic, or invariable value. The possession of no quality, however important to the welfare of man, can confer value, for water, the most necessary of all things, seldom possesses it. Experience shows us that everything is uniformly considered as valuable which, to the possession of qualities that make it the object of the desire of man, adds the circumstance of existing in scarcity. To confer value, therefore, two things appear requisite: (1) That the commodity, as being useful or delightful to man, should be an object of his desire. (2) That it should exist in a degree of scarcity. With respect to the variations in value, of which everything valuable is susceptible, if we could for a moment suppose that any substance possessed intrinsic and fixed value, so as to render an assumed quantity of it constantly, under all circumstances, of equal value, then the degree of value of all things, ascertained by such a fixed standard, would vary according to the proportion betwixt the quantity of them and the demand for them, and every commodity would of course be subject to a variation in its value from four different circumstances:
> 1. It would be subject to an increase of its value from a diminution of its quantity.
> 2. To a diminution of its value from an augmentation of its quantity.
> 3. It might suffer an augmentation in its value from the circumstance of an increased demand.
> 4. Its value might be diminished by a failure of demand.

Then Lord Lauderdale continues:

> As it will, however, clearly appear that no commodity can possess fixed and intrinsic value so as to qualify it for a measure of the value of other commodities, mankind are reduced to select as a practical measure of value that which appears the least liable to any of these four sources of variation which are the sole causes of the alteration of value.

But, inasmuch as this so-called measure of value is affected by circumstances of supply and demand having relation to itself alone, and not to the commodities which it is intended to measure, Lord Lauderdale very properly states, "When in common language we express the value of any commodity it may vary at one period from what it is at another in consequence of eight different circumstances." That is to say:

1. From the four circumstances above stated in relation to the commodity of which we mean to express the value; and—now note—

2. From the same four circumstances in relation to the commodity we have adopted as the measure of value.

If, then, as all the authorities maintain, the value of money depends on its quantity and not on the material, why should the people of the United States go to a gold standard? When we know that there has never been too much of both metals, why should we refuse to protect ourselves against the disadvantages inevitable from reliance on the accidental yield of one metal?

THE MONEY STANDARD NOT THE MATERIAL, BUT THE QUANTITY OF MONEY.

The money standard of a country is not to be known by the material on which the government stamp is placed. The standard is not a physical object; it is wholly a numerical relation.

Strictly speaking, therefore, there is no silver standard, no gold standard, and no paper standard. Whatever may be the name of the material which serves the purpose of money, the standard is, and must necessarily be, quantitative. The name of the material, if a metal, has significance only in the fact that the available quantity of that metal determines and limits the number of money units that can exist. The general range of prices of property and commodities accommodates itself to that number. The term "gold standard," therefore, means only that the prices of commodities and property in general will be governed by the quantity of gold. Ricardo says:

> The only use of a standard is to regulate the quantity, and by the quantity the value of the currency.

The statement that a country has a standard of money would, from the meaning of the word "standard," appear to carry with it the idea that there is some regulation about its money. The idea would seem to be that a standard is provided in order that justice may be maintained between man and man and the equities of time contracts properly subserved. Hence, many people believe that there is really an attempt at the maintenance of justice and equity in having a "gold" standard, whereas by that standard there is an entire absence of scientific regulation of the money quantity. The term "gold standard" has no application whatever, and no relation whatever, to the increase of population or of the demand for money. The gold standard has been constantly shifting and changing until it signifies nothing. It is a standard depending on the accidental discoveries of mines. As the authorities all show, the value of all metallic money rose between 1810 and 1849 by as much as 145 per cent.

That was the increase in the value of the unit of metallic money. One dollar in 1849 had as much purchasing power as had two dollars and a half in 1809! This was owing to the closing of the mines caused by the revolutions in South America. Relief came only with the discoveries of California and Australia. For twenty years following those discoveries a fall in the value of money took place which, according to Professor Jevons, amounted to a total of about 20 per cent, or about an average of 1 per cent per annum.

The people of the United States have been informed that one of the greatest misfortunes that could occur would be a fall in the value of money. Was this fall in the value of money resulting from the discoveries of California and Australia a misfortune to the world? On the contrary, do we not find that as the new money stock distributed itself over the earth industry took on a new life, idle men were called to labor, the social and political upheavals all over the world were arrested by the great flood of prosperity produced by the yield from the new mines? During the period in which the value of the money unit was rising we note that distress and destitution multiplied in all the countries of Christendom. In 1848, as a result of thirty years of monetary contraction, almost all the countries of Europe were in the throes of revolution.

The new monetary supply changed the entire aspect of industry and society in the middle of the nineteenth century as it had done at the beginning of the sixteenth, when the yield from the mines of the newly discovered continent began to find its way through the various countries of Europe.

The history of the world shows that for a few years after the discovery and exploitation of great new mines a gradual rise of prices takes place. Idle men find employment; the hum of industry is heard on every hand. Those are red-letter years—a few years out of an entire century. As soon, however, as the mines are worked out and general prices have reached their maximum a decline begins, and then for a long period of years industry languishes. That has been the history of society from the earliest ages to the present time. I have never entertained a doubt that the Dark Ages were brought about by the decrease of the quantity of money. The discovery of the mines of the New World gave the first streak of light. It uplifted mankind. Under the impetus of an increasing money volume the common people rose and destroyed the feudal system, and progress began. Since that time there have been only a few periods—ten or fifteen years at a time—when there have been prosperity and general content among the masses.

That the gold standard has not been one under which the money market has been able to maintain steadiness and induce confidence is manifest upon a most cursory examination of its history. During the twenty-seven years after 1847 the rate of interest charged by the Bank of England was changed 223 times, or an average rate of change of nearly once per month; and the range of fluctuation was from 2½ per cent to 10 per cent. On the other hand, it is to be observed as a significant contrast that there were but 16 changes in the rate of interest at the same bank during the one hundred and twenty-three years preceding 1816, when the gold standard was adopted; and in those 16 changes the rate of interest never fell below 4 per cent nor rose above 6 per cent.

Many of the most thoughtful minds, well informed upon financial matters, have attributed the frequent crises in the London money market to the narrow basis of gold, upon which the financial structure existed.

In testifying before a Parliamentary committee in 1828, Alexander Baring said:

> A sudden change from peace to war, a bad harvest or a panic year, arising from overtrading and other causes, immediately impose upon the Bank of England, which is the heart of all our circulation, for the purpose of protecting itself, to stop the egress of specie; sometimes even to bring large quantities into the country. These indispensable remedies are always applied with more or less of restriction of the currency and consequent distress. * * *
> No care or prudence can enable the great bank to avoid occasional resort to those measures of defense. * * * It is evident that the bank, wishing to reenforce the supply of specie, can do so with infinitely increased facility with the power of drawing gold and silver than if it were confined to one of the metals. * * * The greater the facility of the bank to right itself, the less frequent will be those sudden jerks and changes so fatal to credit and commerce.

THE WIDER EXTENSION OF THE GOLD STANDARD NOT A RECOMMENDATION OF IT.

The fact that the creditor interests of the world have forced the gold standard upon the governments of most of the civilized nations, instead of being an argument in favor of the adoption of that standard by the United States is the very argument which should be potent in dissuading the United States from adopting that standard. A comparatively small supply of gold might be sufficient to meet the demands of moderate populations, whereas nothing but a ceaseless flood of gold will enable the commercial nations to conduct their business and maintain the prices of commodities at a just a equitable level.

Instead of the trifling populations of a few years ago which acknowledged the gold standard we now find the bondholding and creditor classes pressing practically all civilized nations to gold. In 1870 the only gold-standard countries were Great Britain and Portugal, and of those the only effective demand came from Great Britain, the population of which was then but little over 30,000,000 people. In obedience to the behests of Great Britain and of the owners of public debts we now find all the governments of Christendom making demand for gold. The countries making demand for gold, therefore, at the present time are Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, Russia, Finland, Turkey, Egypt, to which there is an attempt to add Brazil, Costa Rica, Chile, Peru, British Honduras, and Japan. The coinage of silver is either suspended or is conducted only on government account in France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, and Greece; and in this category should now also be included British India.

The countries now making demand for gold comprise many hundreds of millions of people, and when to those shall be added the population of the United States it must be manifest to the most limited understanding that a flood of gold such as the world has never known, both for volume and persistency of yield, is the only thing that will save the fabric of industry from a total collapse. If it was true before, as was well said by an English economist, that "England is the peculiar seat of monetary crises, as Egypt is of the plague and India of the cholera," it is manifest that all the civilized countries of the world will now be called upon to share with Great Britain the burden of these monetary crises in a degree of intensity and with a rapidity of recurrence hitherto unexampled.

The present yield of gold is an excellent illustration of the extraordinary irregularity of its production. A material so subject to violent alternations of miserliness and prodigality can never be relied on as a "standard." Under the influence of such a so-called standard all business is reduced to gambling. Business men can not buy or sell on time payments without subjecting themselves to serious risks, and if those risks are compensated by profits, a heavy tax is imposed upon consumers. No man who enters into a contract to pay gold can feel any assurance that at the date when the contract is performed the monetary unit will possess the same value that it possessed at the date of the making of the contract. All history shows that gold, when not associated with silver in unrestricted access to the mint, has been the most unstable standard of which any example is to be found. It is hardly necessary to call attention to the fact that 25 per cent of the world's money is uncovered paper. To what a ruinous level would not the gold standard have brought the world but for this dilution of the bitter draught by the enormous volume of so-called fiat money!

THE EFFECTS OF CHECKS AND DRAFTS.

It is sometimes maintained that a compensation can be made for a shrinkage in the volume of money by an increase of such banking expedients as checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and clearing houses. These expedients are now resorted to, and, because profit is found in their use, always will be availed of to the utmost possible extent. It is manifest, therefore, that, whatever the proportion or percentage they bear to the volume of money, it can not be increased except through an increase in that volume. And it is equally manifest that when the volume of money is diminished these expedients must diminish and general prices must fall in a corresponding ratio. Money is the primary and governing force whose functions can not be superseded by any device whatever, and whose volume or existence does not depend on banking expedients, while these expedients grow out of money and could not exist without it. The farthest extent to which they can be used is already practically reached, and they can only increase, and must decrease, as the volume of money increases or diminishes.

This reasoning partially applies as to the effect of credit on prices. It would seem to be reversing the natural order of things to maintain that prices are controlled by the volume of credit instead of by the volume of money. Without entering into an elaborate discussion of this intricate question, it may be said that prices were affixed to property at the time when the invention of money superseded barter. Credit, as it is now understood, was impossible under the barter system, and must have come into existence at some period after values were measured through the medium of price. Primarily, then, prices must have been entirely controlled by the volume of money, unaffected by credit.

Credit is the explosive element in the business of modern times. If it were extended upon property at such a rating of prices as would be established through money alone, and if the relation between the volume of money and population and commerce remained steady, prices would remain steady, and the great mass of credits would rest upon a sound basis. Even under such conditions there would be speculative and unsound credits, but these would be exceptional, and the injury caused by their collapse would be local, individual, and temporary. There never can occur a universal fall of prices and a general withdrawal of credits without a preceding decrease in the volume of money.

It is contended by many that credit is based on the combined volume of property and money, and that a diminution of the volume of money need not occasion any greater withdrawal of credit than such proportion as the diminution would bear to the aggregate amount of property and money. But the amount of credit which can or will be extended upon property depends upon its price, which is supposed to represent the cash it can be sold for, and price depends upon the relation between the volume of money and other things. Property which might be ample security for a given quantity of money at one range of prices would be an inadequate security at a lower range. If all the money of the world were diminished by one-half, the amount of credits that could be safely extended upon property would be diminished in at least as great a proportion.

It is money and not property, unless the creditor shall choose to accept it, that is required for the payment of debts, and the power of property over credit is limited to its command in open market over money, which command must be greater or less as the volume of money is larger or smaller. If the amount of credit which can be safely extended upon property be not governed by the price it can be sold for, then credit must be an institution based upon the whims and caprices of those who extend it. If credit is either increased or diminished upon property which has undergone no physical change, and without reference to its price, such increase or diminution must be ascribed to the abnormal mental condition of the money lender. This is a disease which, as it is not caused by a change in material conditions, is beyond the reach of the remedies of the political economist, and must be treated psychologically.

PRICES AND THE VOLUME OF MONEY.

It is often supposed that prices are not controlled by the volume of money, because they have neither risen nor fallen concurrently with, nor in exact proportion to, the increase or decrease of such volume. The precious metals are diffused over so vast a surface and their current production is so small in comparison with accumulated stocks that it takes considerable time for changes in their yield to so affect their volume relatively to population and business as to produce any sensible effect upon prices. The entire property interests of a country are united in maintaining, and, if possible, in advancing, the price of property and in resisting to the uttermost any decline.

A temporary maintenance of nominal prices, even in the presence of a shrinking volume of money, is especially practicable with imperishable property, such as real estate. When money begins to become scarce by reason of a shrinkage in its volume, the first effect upon real estate is found to be not a decline of its nominal price, but a diminution in the number of transactions. The stagnation is ascribed to temporary causes and a speedy recovery predicted. In order to maintain prices the terms of purchase are made easier. The amount of cash payments is reduced, and the deferred payments, secured by mortgage on the property, extended over longer periods. After a time this expedient fails, and even then nominal prices are unnaturally held up for a short period by the struggles of those who have purchased upon these extended credits, and by the tenacity of owners who refuse to sell at lower figures and mortgage their own property to protract their power to hold. The stagnation of voluntary transactions is finally followed by the activity of involuntary ones under the direction of sheriffs and by the foreclosure of mortgages.

Upon any material decline in the price of real estate a large class of investors, believing that the bottom has been reached, and desiring to profit by the reaction which they think is sure to come speedily, enter the market and temporarily check the decline. Another fall in prices sweeps them and their margins away, and a third class of dealers, now absolutely certain that bottom prices have been reached and sure that a further decline is impossible, come in as purchasers. Each succeeding purchaser fortifies his conclusion that present prices are bottom prices by comparing them with, and finding that they are no higher than, the prices of some period in the past which is arbitrarily assumed to be a standard level below which subsequent prices could never permanently go. It is overlooked that price is only the expression of a relation, and that no correct conclusions can be drawn from a comparison of the prices of two periods unless comparisons be also made of the money stock, population, and exchanges of both periods.

Contrary to all calculations, as the volume of money shrinks prices continue to fall, and these dealers encounter the fate of their predecessors. These operations repeat themselves until universal distrust prevails, and until it is found that—when money is decreasing in volume—prices have no bottom, except a receding one, and that they are inexorably ruled by the volume of money.

The effects of a decrease of the volume of money in a particular country arising from its abnormal outflow, or from its withdrawal from the channels of circulation through the distrust which prevails when unsound and speculative undertakings are breaking down, or when the country is convulsed by political disturbances, are the same as the effects of a general decrease in the volume of money. The result in both cases is a fall in prices. But in the first case the equilibrium is restored by a quickly returning wave of prosperity, and the evils resulting are confined to individuals and to special localities; and those dealers are fortunate who purchase in the first stages of the decline. But in the second case the cause of the fall in prices is radical, and must continue until prices go out of existence unless the decrease in the volume of money is arrested.

THE PANIC OF 1873.

The cause of our great panic in 1873—an unheard-of panic—has never been sufficiently reflected on. When our civil war closed in 1865 the farmers of the country were generally out of debt. I can recall that I thought it would be a good time to invest money when millions of men were taken out of the field of destruction and put into the field of production. I said it must bring about good times. I found, however, that prices did not ascend, as I supposed they would. Time went on. Farmers everywhere and holders of real estate commenced mortgaging their property in order to hold it, and meanwhile to pay their way. Matters so ran along until 1873, when the weakest link in the chain broke. The house of Jay Cooke & Co. and the Northern Pacific Railway failed, and there followed a general crash all over the United States.

What was the cause of this? Upon examination afterwards I found, first, that when the war closed in April, 1865, ten or twelve million people were added to the population of the United States without the addition of a dollar of money. What an enormous contraction! Cotton, tobacco, sugar, [illegible] everything produced in the South was coming to the Northern States and taking away the money that up to April, 1865, had [illegible] the business of the North alone. That same quantity of money was called upon to do the business of the whole country. Is it any wonder that the great crisis came? Is it any wonder that the industries of the country experienced a collapse?

In the whole history of the world every great and general fall of prices has been preceded by a decrease in the volume of money. There has never been a decrease in the volume of money, nor has there ever been a stationary volume of money, unless accompanied by a stationary population and commerce, which has not sooner or later resulted in a general fall of prices, and there has never been a recovery therefrom except through a preceding increase in the volume of money. After the volume of money has begun to decrease, every dollar of credit extended at the old range of prices aggravates the disaster which must come sooner or later. Stagnation and panic are nothing more nor less than the results of a struggle to make prices express truly the relation between money and all other things. Fluctuations of prices frequently arise from special causes, but they are local and temporary in their character.

Even were it possible to devise a money system so perfect that steadiness in the general level of prices would be absolutely assured, there would still occur occasional fluctuations in the prices of particular commodities, arising from a temporary glut or scarcity of such commodities in the general markets, caused by exceptionally favorable or unfavorable conditions, which might suddenly enlarge or diminish their production or vary the demand for them. Such fluctuations can not be avoided. They mark the ebb and flow of business and no more affect the general level of prices or prosperity than the ebb and flow of the tides affect the general level of the ocean. The producers of and dealers in each article should be better able than anybody else to foresee and guard against them, and have no reason to complain of them. But they may well complain when the general level of prices is disturbed by monetary legislation, which they could not foresee, are not responsible for, and whose injurious effects they could not by any degree of prudence avoid.

MONEY IS AN ORDER FOR GOODS.

In all discussions on money it is well to inquire what is money. I think it will not be disputed—certainly it will hardly be disputed in the United States—that the most distinguished political economist of the last quarter of this century is Francis A. Walker, of Massachusetts, recently deceased. His definition of money has been characterized by Professor Sidgwick, professor of political economy at Cambridge University, England, as the best definition that has ever been formulated. Now, let us see what this definition is that General Walker has given of money. He says:

> Money is to be known by its doing a certain work. Money is not gold, though gold may be money; sometimes gold is money and sometimes it is not. Money is no one thing, no group of many things having any material property in common. On the contrary anything may be money; and anything, in a given time and place, is money which then and there performs a certain function. Always, and everywhere that which does the money work is the money thing.

Adam Smith says:

> A guinea may be considered as a bill for a certain quantity of necessaries and conveniences upon all the tradesmen in the neighborhood.

By "bill" Adam Smith, according to the usage of this time, means an order, so that his statement is that a guinea is an order for a certain quantity of commodities. Now, is it necessary that an order for commodities shall be made of gold? Henry Thornton says:

> Money of every kind is an order for goods.

I will repeat that definition for the benefit of our gold-standard Senators: "Money of every kind is an order for goods."

Mr. Thornton makes no distinction here between gold money, silver money, and paper money. Whatever kind of money it is, he says it is merely an order for goods. Is he supported in this definition by any other political economist? Let us see. John Stuart Mill says:

> The pounds or shillings which a person receives are a sort of ticket or order which he can present for payment at any shop he pleases, and which entitle him to receive a certain value of any commodity that he makes choice.

Mr. Mill was an Englishman, and in writing this definition of pounds and shillings did not have before his mind any debased money or dishonest pounds or shillings. Yet he says in effect that gold pounds sterling are nothing whatever but an order for goods! Again I ask, Is it necessary that this order shall be made of gold?

McLeod, in his Elements of Banking, says:

When persons take a piece of money in exchange for services or products, they can neither eat it nor drink it nor clothe themselves with it. The only reason why they take it is because they believe they can exchange it away, whenever they please, for other things which they require.

Inasmuch as this money is something which people take merely to exchange it away, why is it necessary that it shall be gold? And so Mr. McLeod styles it credit, and quotes in support of that term Edmund Burke's description of gold and silver as "the two great recognized species that represent the lasting conventional credit of mankind."

General Walker also dwells on this peculiar feature of money, a feature which distinguishes it from all other things whatsoever, namely, that it is taken only with the intention of parting with it, and derives its value only from being parted with.

Money—

Says General Walker—

is that which passes freely from hand to hand throughout the community in final discharge of debts and full payment for commodities, being accepted equally without reference to the character or credit of the person who offers it, and without the intention of the person who receives it to consume it or enjoy it or apply it to any other use than, in turn, to tender it to others in discharge of debts or payments for commodities.

The only use, then, for money, according to all these authorities, is that it shall be parted with. If it is not to be retained, if it can not be enjoyed without being parted with, why is it a matter of such supreme importance that it shall be of gold?

The masses of the people the world over have never demanded gold, and in this country the people know nothing of gold. Why, then, is it that we find the bondholding and creditor classes alone, with their agents, the bankers and brokers, demanding the gold standard? Is it because gold is more uniform and steady as a so-called "standard" than silver? On the contrary, the production of silver, as statistics prove, has always been more steady and uniform than that of gold.

Prof. Shield Nicholson, who occupies the chair of political economy in the University of Edinburgh, in his new work on Political Economy, says:

Silver has proved itself, from the point of view of stability of value, a better standard than gold.

He quotes the statement of Ricardo, made in 1816, that—

There can be no doubt that on the whole silver is preferable to gold as a standard, and should be permanently adopted for that purpose.

Professor Nicholson continues:

A survey of the history of prices since this observation was made [by Ricardo] abundantly confirms the greater stability of silver as a measure of value.

This quotation is from a recent publication. Professor Nicholson had before him the statistics of the yield of the mines of the world up to the year 1897. He makes the deliberate statement that even up to that year a survey of the history of prices demonstrates the greater stability of silver over gold as a measure of value. He continues:

If, however, gold were linked to silver by a fixed ratio, it would obviously share in its stability.

Think of a distinguished professor of political economy in a great conservative university talking of a "fixed ratio" between gold and silver! Our gold-standard editors and orators have been telling us for many years that it is an absolute impossibility that a fixed ratio should exist between the metals.

Professor Nicholson continues:

The two metals together would possess greater stability of value than silver alone. The increasing demands caused by the growth of trade and population in new countries could be met by the annual supplies of both metals. And it must be remembered that with the increase in wealth there is a greater demand for the use of the precious metals in the arts; and, further, that the larger the mass in use, so much more is required annually to replace the wear and tear and accidental losses.—Principles of Political Economy, Volume II, page 161.

Silver is not to be found in the sands, or in great alluvial deposits. It is never found (as gold is) under circumstances in which a little labor can result in an extraordinary yield. Gen. W. T. Sherman (then a captain), being stationed in California in 1848, wrote from the gold diggings that common laborers, by their individual efforts, were making from $5,000 to $8,000 a month.

If an ordinary laborer, without skill or capital, could make from $5,000 to $8,000 a month at gold mining, no demonstration can be more complete as to the slight influence which cost of production exercises upon the value of the metal.

Upon this point Professor Jevons says:

The great principle of cost of production fails us because, in the case of such durable commodities as gold and silver, the accumulated stock on hand is immensely greater than the annual production or consumption.

If the principle of cost of production fails, what becomes of the theory that it is cost of production which gives to gold the value that it has as money?

In fact, the value of gold is determined not by what it costs to produce it, but by what it costs to obtain it after it has been produced, and that cost or value is registered by the general range of prices.

John Stuart Mill, fully agreeing with the other economists on this point of the inapplicability to the precious metals of the principle of cost of production, says:

Alterations, therefore, in the cost of production of the precious metals do not act upon the value of money, except just in proportion as they increase or diminish its quantity, which can not be said of any other commodity.

So that we are constantly brought around to the law or principle of quantity as the regulator of the value of gold money, as of every other form of money. If the value of money depends entirely on its quantity, then that value can not depend on the cost of production of the material on which the money stamp is placed; and if not on cost of production, then it can not depend in any respect on the material. The value of the unit of money depends on the quantity of money; the greater the number of units, other things being equal, the less the value of each unit; the fewer the number of units, other things being equal, the greater the value of each.

This principle operates absolutely, whether the money be of gold, of silver, or of paper, provided it be money of full legal-tender power, and no other sort of money should be permitted to circulate.

I present as a proposition incapable of successful contradiction that gold and silver were not fitted or adapted to be money and could not have come to be generally accepted as money until so enormous a stock of them had been accumulated that their value for commodity purposes (for purposes other than money) had been practically destroyed.

However startling this proposition may seem at first glance, it is one that will bear the test of the closest examination. The more it is reflected upon the more obvious and conclusive it will appear.

NO COMMERCIAL OR COMMODITY VALUE IN EITHER GOLD OR SILVER.

I assert, then, that there is practically no commercial value in either gold or silver. The value of those metals is derived from their use as money. Take away the entire money demand from gold or from silver, and what would they be worth? All will admit that it is demand as correlated to supply that determines the value of all things. Let us apply this principle to the matter in hand. There are probably now five thousand million dollars of gold money in the world. I am not speaking of gold in the shape of ornaments. In order to be surely within bounds, let us assume that the quantity of gold in use as money is four thousand million dollars. That is a very low estimate. It is also a very low estimate to assume that each one of these dollars is earned and demanded twenty times in three hundred and sixty-five days. If each dollar in 4,000,000,000 is demanded and earned twenty times a year, what demand does that make on the gold stock of the world? The calculation is very simple. Twenty times four thousand million would constitute a demand of eighty thousand million dollars a year, and there is not a doubt that this estimate is very far inside the mark.

Now, that being the money demand for gold, let us compare it with the demand for that metal for commercial or nonmonetary purposes. The annual demand for gold for commercial purposes (for jewelry, dentistry, gilding, and all other uses in the arts) is generally estimated at about $60,000,000. The monetary demand for gold being eighty thousand million dollars yearly, that demand is one hundred and thirty-three times greater than the so-called "commercial" demand; it exceeds the commercial demand by more than 13,000 per cent! Yet we are told that the demand for gold as a commodity is what creates its money value!

But in any case it is absurd to talk about the commodity value of either gold or silver. No material that has unrestricted coinage in any country has any commodity value or so-called "commercial" value. The value of silver is not a "commodity value," or derived from commodity use, but is the value that it obtains in the country in which it has free access to the mint. Who that wanted silver for any purpose would give for it more than he could get it for in that country by exchanging products for it? Who that had silver and wished to sell it would take for it less than he could get for it there? So it is an entire misconception, as to both metals, to speak of their supposed "commodity value."

When the relation of 15 to 1 between gold and silver was established in this country on the organization of the mint, whatever may be said as to an examination of the relations between the two metals, there can not be a doubt the purpose was to fix a relation that would be certain to result in keeping silver (the most needed coin) in the United States. Who would give a pound of gold for 15 pounds of silver in the United States when under the ratio established by law in France he could get 15½ pounds of silver in that country for one pound of gold?

When, later, our ratio was changed to 16 to 1 it was not because of any change in the relations of the metals, but because gold mines were discovered in our own country (in the Southern States), and inasmuch as gold was then a home product and its production was expected to increase rapidly, our lawmakers changed the ratio in order that it might enter into circulation among our own people. Some persons write very learned essays about the so-called "commercial relations" and "market relations" of gold and silver, but when the question is investigated without reference to any preconceived theory and with the simple purpose of ascertaining the truth, it will be found that whatever relations have existed between them have been the direct and absolute result of statute law or of kingly decrees and mint regulations having the force of law.

Before society could safely or justly commit to any one or two materials the duty of maintaining the equity of time contracts between man and man, it was absolutely essential that there should be on hand so stupendous a stock of those materials as that the production of a single year could produce but an infinitesimal effect upon the existing stock. This seems to me to be so plain a proposition that I can not understand how any reflecting man can deny it. Day by day we see extreme variations in the price or value of almost every article in the market, but only very slow and slight changes in the purchasing or exchange power of money.

A NATIONAL NONEXPORTABLE MONEY THE BEST AND MOST USEFUL MONEY.

Professor Sidgwick, of Cambridge, in his treatise on political economy, lays down the proposition that gold is no more useful for purposes of money than paper would be, except that it is acceptable over a wider area. If this be so—if there be really no advantage in gold except that it is acceptable over a wider area—is it not well to inquire whether this wider acceptance is really an advantage? For my part, I assert that a money exclusively national, a money which would not leave the country on the breaking out of war, and which could not be withdrawn from the country whenever a fright took possession of our foreign investors, such money remaining always in the country to do the business of the country and to meet the wants of the people of the United States, would be an infinitely better money than gold. With every considerable withdrawal of money from the country contraction takes place and the prices of property and commodities fall. With every considerable influx of money from abroad a great inflation of the currency takes place. One would suppose that an intelligent and progressive people would sufficiently understand the importance of steadiness of value in money to prevent great quantities of it from coming into the country to inflate prices, and then, when contracts are entered into and time transactions based on these inflated prices, permit that money to leave our shores in great quantities, compelling a contraction of the currency and consequent fall of prices, spreading ruin and devastation throughout the country.

That is always what happens with so-called "international money," the so-called "money of the world." Now, Prof. J. E. Cairnes and all other distinguished political economists contend—and the contention will be supported by the observation and reading of every thoughtful man—that the existence of different moneys in different countries is no obstruction whatever to trade, industry, or commerce, and that the money of one country will, on absolutely equitable terms, purchase the money of every other country.

Professor Cairnes especially mentioned that the foreign trade of the United States was not unfavorably affected by the fact that during our great civil war our money was greenbacks. And Professor Jevons, speaking of the condition of Great Britain during the period of the Napoleonic wars, stated that not only did the foreign trade of the country suffer no check, but, as he expressed it, "the very foundations" of England's home industries "were being energetically laid." Yet that was a period of nonredeemable, wholly inconvertible, paper money!

If, therefore, I could have my way, and a person residing in a foreign country relying upon the intelligence, enterprise, and integrity of the people of the United States and the excellence and stability of our institutions should wish to make an investment here, I should say to him, whether an Englishman, Frenchman, or German: "With the money of your own country buy the money of ours, and make your investment, whether in Wall street or elsewhere, in the money of the United States. By this course your investment in our country will not inflate our money volume; therefore it will not tend to inflate prices to a boom point, by taking advantage of which you would be able soon to sell out at an extraordinary profit. When, however, you get tired of your investment, sell it out for money of the United States, and with that money buy the money of your own country, which you can readily do, and leave our money volume untouched. By that course your withdrawal of your investment will not create a contraction of our currency; the prices of our commodities and property will remain firm, and our industries and commerce will continue undisturbed."

That, Mr. President, is the kind of monetary system I would have. In a country of continental proportions, reaching from ocean to ocean and from the frigid to the tropical zones, a country of every variety of resources—mineral, agricultural, and manufacturing—a country within whose own boundary lines can be grown and manufactured every article that can be desired by the most civilized man, I would have a money worthy of the highest civilization. I would not have a money that could be withdrawn from our country whenever the whim, caprice, or cupidity of a "foreign investor" might dictate such withdrawal. The withdrawal of large sums of money from the United States adds grievously to the debt burden of every energetic citizen of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. What would you use as money?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I should use the greatest money on the face of this earth—the paper money of the Government of the United States. And until we can have a perfect system, so long as we are to have the so-called "automatic" system of money, I would have what we have always had from the foundation of the monetary system, I would have both metals. Under that system, as all the great writers and thinkers of the past have said, money is far less liable to fluctuations in value than when based on one metal only. I say to the bondholders and great creditor classes that if in their greed and cupidity they insist on departing from the historic automatic system by demonetizing one of the metals and throwing all the monetary duties upon the other, they must not be surprised if the masses of the people who are injured by this change shall make up their minds to discard and demonetize the other metal.

If one of the metals is to be discarded for the benefit of the bond-holding and money-lending coterie, and that metal the more useful and reliable of the two, the creditor classes may well pause and consider whether there may not be some danger of the pendulum swinging the other way. Were it not for the intelligence and virtue of our people, the contest, ceasing to be a contest between the gold-quartz mill and the silver-quartz mill, might come to be a contest between the gold-quartz mill and the paper-pulp mill!

The people of the United States are accustomed, especially about election times, to being told how intelligent they are, how sound is their judgment, how pure their patriotism, how strong their sense of justice. As citizens of a self-governing Republic they are certainly intrusted with the most solemn, sacred, and responsible duties. In their keeping are placed, without hesitation or restraint, the determination of questions involving the liberties and even the lives of their fellow-beings.

Upon one subject only are they not trusted, upon one only are they feared. In their wisdom and discretion they may regulate and adjust all matters whatsoever pertaining to government, to progress, and to sovereignty, except that one subject without the proper regulation and adjustment of which the best government is impeded, progress fitful and spasmodic, and sovereignty deprived of the most valuable and beneficent of its functions.

Their wisdom, intelligence, and sense of justice may be trusted with the regulation of all matters whatsoever affecting their welfare, excepting only the regulation of the quantity of their money. As to that they are to be relegated to the "gold standard," the standard of Accident. "On the subject of money," say the creditor classes, "rather than look to the intelligence, virtue, and justice of our fellow-citizens, we will rely upon the edicts of Chance!" The creditors take care, however, by the adoption of the gold standard, to arrange matters in such fashion that for ninety years out of every one hundred the chance is in their own favor.

MONEY ESSENTIAL AT ALL TIMES, AND SHOULD BE KEPT IN THE COUNTRY.

Adam Smith compared money to a highway by which the products of labor were enabled to reach a market. There is no doubt that money performs the same function in the proprietary distribution of property that railroad trains and highways perform in its physical distribution. But would it not be deemed extraordinary if the people of this country were to place great numbers of our locomotives and cars on leviathan ships to be carried over the ocean and deposited in foreign countries, there to remain until some exigency of those countries impelled them to return them to us? Extending the simile, and regarding money as an implement, what would be thought of a proposition to ship out of our country, at a time just preceding the harvest, hundreds of shiploads of agricultural implements needed in the harvest field? Now, unlike agricultural implements, the season in which money is useful is every season of the year. There is no time at which it can be sent out of the country without loss and disadvantage to the country; no time when its outgo in any considerable quantity does not import injustice and inequity into all time contracts and deferred payments, upon which, in these times, the vast majority of business transactions are based.

Hundreds of millions of dollars of deferred obligations are always outstanding, and it seems to me to be a monstrous injustice for a people to maintain a money system by which ruinous oscillations of quantity are permitted to take place.

On the demand of a clique of "foreign investors," out go great loads of our money, and panic reigns. We see bills introduced in State legislatures and in Congress to accomplish great results as to public health—to arrest the yellow fever or the bubonic plague—yet there is a class of panic which produces more distress and misery than all the bubonic plagues and yellow-fever epidemics have ever produced. It is said they come around automatically; that they come around of themselves once in a while. This is the philosophy with which the people are taught to be contented! It is fate, they say. Yet no one has ever seen a panic in which there was not plenty of property nor in which large holdings of such property did not pass out of the possession of the borrower into the possession of the lender—the mortgage transmuted into a deed.

Nothing was needed to stop the panic except money. That was shown by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury recently in taking money out of the Treasury and using millions upon millions to stop the panic.

The panic was not on account of any suspicion that this bill would not pass. It was known that it would; but money—money was wanted. Legal tender was what everyone was after. A sufficiency of that is what this country has been looking for during its whole history; and it had it only for a few years after 1849, when California and Australia sent out their harvests. As I have already said, those were the red-letter years in the world's history. Those were the days when the country and the world were more spiritualized than in any other period of their history. That great boon lifted people out of poverty and put them on the road to prosperity. In a few years the money of the world was nearly doubled. Millions of men that had been idle all over Christendom were called to employment. What an immeasurable blessing was that! For a man without employment might as well, so far as his country is concerned, be in the grave. Every time that a material shrinkage in the volume of money takes place and one-tenth of the people are relegated to idleness, that fact of itself constitutes a reduction of our population by one-tenth, because when men are idle they make no demand—no economic demand—for money; they can offer nothing in exchange for it.

As events have fortuitously developed, we may now be on the eve of another rise of prices. It can not, however, in my judgment, equal the rise that followed the California and Australia output. This country had then not probably over twenty-five to thirty million people, and the entire world was small in comparison with what it is now, so there would now be necessary an enormous increase in the yield of gold in order that there might result a degree of prosperity proportionate to that effected by the yield from California and Australia. That doubled, and more than doubled, within a very few years the volume of money in the world. There will be no such yield now, in proportion to population and demand, as came from California and Australia, although in my opinion the yield will be much greater than came from those countries.

But it is reasonable to expect that prices will rise a little. The prices of some articles have already risen. There are many industries that do not share in the prosperity, yet, on the whole, things are much better than they were. If the mining industry does not experience some unforeseen check, that condition may persist for ten, twelve, or fifteen years, but that is all that can be expected of it. Such is now the energy and enterprise of this people that our prices will certainly be at the maximum by that time, and then, according to the verdict of all history, there will follow a period of forty or fifty years of gradual decline, with its inevitable long-drawn-out misery of the masses of the people, and with upheavals—social, industrial, and political—the consequences of which no man may predict.

During the last Presidential campaign one of the champions of the gold standard, addressing a public audience, assured them that if only the foreign investors had confidence in the good faith of the people of the United States and could only feel assured that our dollars would always be the equivalent of gold dollars there were "thousands of millions" of dollars, he said, which those foreigners were ready to invest in the United States! Any man who could make such a statement could not have the slightest apprehension of the money question. The idea that "thousands of millions" of dollars were to be invested here at the pleasure of the foreign investor and to be withdrawn at his pleasure is an idea that no thoughtful American can entertain with any degree of satisfaction or of national pride.

The idea that all the equities of time contracts, extending up to thousands of millions of dollars among our own people, shall be dislocated or destroyed for the purpose of accommodating foreigners is a monstrous absurdity. It would be infinitely better to have a money that would flow neither in nor out than to perpetrate the daily and hourly injustice involved in such a system. So, Mr. President, I am not alarmed when told that we can not prosper in this country unless we have the money of the world. A country like the United States, of rapidly growing population and colossal industries; a country of continental proportions, destined to excel the world in enterprise, in industry, and in commerce, should have its own money, a money which would not leave the country in its hour of trial and would not constantly flow in and flow out, to the detriment of all business within our own borders.

Let me here inquire of my fellow-Senators, inasmuch as it appears we must have money that is not money (money that has to be redeemed), why the Government can not save the interest on the bonds by establishing a sacred crypt in the Treasury, in which for every installment of Government notes issued a corresponding amount of Government bonds might be deposited, to be held inviolate for the redemption of that money. If $5,000,000 is wanted to be issued, the Government can certainly issue it as well as a bank could. If there were $300,000,000 of bonds out, the interest at 3 per cent would be $9,000,000 a year. What should prevent us from keeping the bonds in that sacred crypt in the Treasury and have the same security for that money that we how have, without paying out that nine millions and surrendering to the bank the sovereign authority of the Government for the issue of money? Why should the banks have that privilege? Have we become so afraid of the banks that we are obliged, in this indirect method, to do what is sometimes termed out West to "grease" them? Why should we pay them this money? I have never met anyone who could tell me why we should pay it.

I am opposed to the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else contemplating a continual increase of the public debt of the United States—an increase that apparently is to go on forever. We are to increase the volume of paper money, and do not propose to increase the Treasury notes or the greenbacks. If the issues of bank notes are to be increased, they can only be increased by the increase of the bonded debt of the country. I am opposed to it. I want the country to be out of debt. I do not believe a national debt to be a national blessing. It is a national curse.

The time is near at hand, if it has not already arrived, when the money of the United States, of whatever material it may be composed, will be deemed the money of the world and the best money. The people of the world will be only too glad to sell to us when they know that the money of the United States is a correct measure of the equities involved in all business transactions; that the value of our monetary unit will neither fall nor rise, but will maintain a steady relation to property and commodities.

If the American people had a national money—an American money—instead of their being troubled by the question, "Where are we going to get gold?" the question would be asked by the other countries of the world, "Where and how shall we get American money?" That is the money they will be obliged to have. We do not need to get theirs. We shall be out of debt to them.

The laborers in any country can be kept uninterruptedly employed only by contracts for enterprises requiring years to complete. The constant inflow and outflow of large quantities of the money of the country so affect the range of prices that equity and justice are constantly violated.

Although this bill is destined to become a law, it will not, in my belief, be long before the people of the United States will insist upon a reversal of the verdict now to be given by Congress. If not, if it shall finally appear that in order to secure unjust advantages to a small class of powerful persons, one of the metals, which for thousands of years has been dedicated to the full money function, is to be permanently rejected, to the great wrong and injury of the masses of mankind, then the advocates of the gold standard will find that the monetary discussion will enter upon a new stage. A broader, deeper, and more far-reaching discussion will be entered upon.

THE MONEY OF THE FUTURE AND OF THE HIGHEST CIVILIZATION.

The advocates of gold will have to meet the advocates of a paper money to be issued by the Government, which should possess no value on account of the intrinsic qualities of the material of which it is composed, but whose value should be extrinsic and derived from the useful functions with which the Government invested it, and whose each unit should be kept steady in value through legal limitations and regulations of the number of such units issued.

The views of the school of thinkers advocating such money are that utility, accompanied by limitation of quantity, is the basis of exchangeable value; that this utility may depend either upon such intrinsic qualities as would render the thing possessing them valuable to man in isolation as well as to man in society, or upon extrinsic, artificial qualities which society may confer upon any article, however much it may lack qualities intrinsically useful to mankind, by endowing it with the power of performing the money function; that the evident fact that this function does not inhere in and can not be conferred on any article so as to make it either valuable or useful to man in isolation, while it is essential to the very existence of society, demonstrates that money value is not derived from the useful, intrinsic qualities of the material upon which the money function may be conferred. They also call attention to the facts that the usefulness to the individual of any article depends solely upon the intrinsic qualities which it may possess, and is not diminished by its existence in unlimited quantity, while money, on the contrary, becomes entirely useless unless its quantity be limited. They conclude from these facts that the money value of the material on which the money stamp is placed rests solely upon the artificial and extrinsic qualities conferred upon it by law; that this value is inseparable from society and grows out of its need of and demand for an instrument of exchange and valuation.

MONEY NOT WEALTH, BUT A SET OF COUNTERS.

They maintain that money is not in itself wealth, but a set of counters for computing and exchanging wealth, or, as was said by Bishop Berkeley, "a ticket entitling to power and fitted to record and transfer this power;" and that "it is of little consequence what materials the tickets are made of;" that there are certain qualities which are essential to a proper performance of the money function; that money should be steady in value, portable, divisible, distinguishable, and difficult of imitation; that of all these qualities steadiness in value is the one of greatest importance; that the highest office of money is that of measuring values, present and future, and that to perform this office equitably its each unit must possess through time a practically unfluctuating, unvarying purchasing power; that as this steadiness can be secured only through a limitation and regulation of its quantity, the power of limitation and regulation should be always present, and that to this end the material on which the money function is conferred should be producible at all times in such quantities as may be necessary and as nearly as possible without cost.

They maintain that when the money function is conferred upon gold and silver, while the requirements of portability, divisibility, distinguishability, and difficulty of imitation are tolerably met, the requirements of constant attainability and inexpensiveness are not met at all, and that the superlatively essential requirement of steadiness in value is so imperfectly met as to render them unfit for money, and gold much more unfit than silver, because of much more irregular yield. They claim that the money function is the noblest of all functions and invests anything upon which it is conferred with a utility far greater than is possessed by any other exchangeable article known to man; that this utility is the true and only scientific basis of money value; that the value begotten of this utility is all that is needed for money, and all that money can possibly possess, and is all, and the only kind, of value ever estimated when money, whether metallic or otherwise, is used.

IT IS THE LEGAL-TENDER FUNCTION THAT CONSTITUTES ANYTHING MONEY.

That whenever the material of money is in demand as a commodity, such demand can neither increase the money value nor disturb either the commodity or the money until it rises to the level of the money demand, when it begins to destroy the money; that this is illustrated in subsidiary coinages and in the full-tender silver coinage of France and of the United States, the bullion value of which, being below the money value, prevents the metal in the coin from being either exported or used for other than money purposes; that in that coinage it is the legal-tender function conferred by the sovereign authority and verified by its stamp, and not the metal receiving the impression, which really constitutes the money, and that this stamp of authority would be as efficient and valuable if impressed on paper, and that this was shown in the experience of our greenbacks and fractional paper currency; that while the bullion in this coinage has added nothing to the value of the money, the Government stamp has effectually deprived the world of the use of the bullion, and that the cost of the bullion is a loss to the people for which there is no compensation; that the aggregate of the money value which can exist in any country is limited and fixed automatically by conditions and environment; that it bears a sure relation to the population, wealth, and exchanges of such country as modified by the character and habits of the people, their modes of transacting business, the rapidity with which their exchanges are effected, and many other considerations; that this value exists potentially wherever there are exchanges to be made; that in order to utilize this value it is only necessary for the law to materialize it, whereupon it becomes money; that it is independent of all other values, and can not be mixed with them: that the money value can not be in any degree increased by the commodity value of a material selected for money; that the commodity value, if any exists, can make itself felt only through a destruction of the money; that so long as the commodity continues to perform the money function commodity value, instead of adding anything to the conferred money value, is entirely suspended and noneffective; that when paper money depreciates or even breaks down entirely the process is ordinarily so gradual that the losses of individual holders are inappreciable.

Let the Government say that a greenback is a dollar receivable for all dues and legal tender for all debts, public and private, and although not redeemable in gold or silver or in any other one thing, but (as all money should be) redeemable in all things for sale and in all things for hire, that dollar can be made worth $10, $20, $50 in gold as it now stands. Why? All that would need to be done would be to limit the quantity of those dollars. Suppose there were five hundred millions of greenbacks, and gold and silver should be demonetized in this country, then that sum of $500,000,000 of greenbacks would have to do all the business of the nation, all that had before been done by the combined gold, silver, and paper, how much do you suppose each dollar of those greenbacks would be worth?

I recollect that a very distinguished gentleman, formerly a Senator in this body, once said to me: "Who would take this kind of money that you describe?" "Well," I replied, "you would, or you would get into jail as a tramp." [Laughter.] Every man who lives in civilized life must have money; he cannot live without it. How is he to get it? He must enter into trade in competition with every other man in his line of business and compete for money; whoever bids the most and offers the best service for the smallest number of money units gets the money. That is the way the value of money is fixed. No man or set of men can fix the value of money. It is the quantity—the supply as correlated to the demand—that fixes the value, yet, I regret to say that men of splendid minds—superlatively intellectual men—whom I know in this body—I could put my hand on them—are advocating a purely accidental standard, and call it the gold standard, far more accidental than the so-called double standard. If you had two thousand millions of gold at this moment doing the business of this country, and every dollar of it should be sunk irrecoverably in the bottom of the sea, and you should issue the same amount of paper, making it full legal tender, redeemable in all things, each dollar of the paper would be worth exactly as much as each dollar of the gold. As I have said, demand and supply regulate value. If you have the same supply, no more and no less, and you have the same demand, no more and no less, you can not have a change in value; it is absolutely impossible.

REGULATION AND LIMITATION OF QUANTITY ESSENTIAL.

Mr. ALDRICH. How would you fix the proper limit of your ideal money?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. That question has been asked many times. The answer is very simple. The proper limit at the present time would be exactly the amount we now have; that amount not to be diminished and not to be increased except in obedience to well-established laws. That simply means that we should go right along as we are going now, but much better, because under a gold standard we might find gold 20, 30, 40, or 50 per cent dearer or cheaper as time went on. That is a matter of pure accident. We could keep exactly the amount of money now in circulation and with it do the business of this country, only increasing the circulation pari passu with the increase of population.

Mr. ALDRICH. And you would not take into consideration any increase in business or any other circumstances?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I should increase it (as an established principle) according to population, then I should make a small increase on account of what might be destroyed or accidentally burned up, so far as ascertainable; and then, if I found the country was not holding firmly to its range of prices—and I should spend a good deal of money to ascertain how that was—appointing for the purpose a commission of the most skillful and accomplished experts—I should propose a small percentage more. I think my friend would be among the first to understand the necessity for that, and to propose it, because nobody wants inflation—that is, nobody who has any sense. Inflation and contraction end in the same pit.

All we want is honest money—not the "honest money" that the Indianapolis League tell us about—we want the honest money that means a money unchanging in value through time, with which we can make a contract for the issue of bonds for thirty years and know that those who come after us are not going to be ruined in standing by their contract.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to follow the Senator as far as I can, but not too far. [Laughter.] I should like to ask him whether he really thinks it would be a safe limitation upon the amount of national money to prevent inflation, which he says is an evil, to fix the amount in accordance with the population of the country? Would that be a safe system of national finance?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. There can be no doubt about that in my mind.

Mr. CHANDLER. But will not the desire to get a little more, from Congress to Congress, lead to an increased proportion until, after all, we shall have inflation?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I will say to the Senator that I think the people of the United States who ran in debt during civil war, when the currency was in greenbacks, deserve the admiration of the world from the fact that they saw their money afterwards burned by the Secretary of the Treasury without for a long time taking any steps to stop it. Ten or twelve millions of people—all the inhabitants of the Southern States—had in 1865 been added to the population without the addition of a dollar of money. I do not think that in that instance there was any evidence of a desire for inflation.

I will answer the Senator further by stating that in all the history of the world I have never heard or read of a case where the people demanded inflation. In every instance where history shows that there has been inflation it has not been caused by any demand of the common people, but it has grown out of the exigencies of government. A government fighting for its very existence will resort to such measures as are absolutely essential. The assignats and mandates of the French Revolution were issued for that reason; the paper money of our own Revolution and our greenbacks during the civil war were issued for the same reason. The life of the Government was at stake. These moneys were all issued in the most unscientific manner, because the issuers were ignorant, as many otherwise intelligent people are now ignorant, of the natural law or principle of quantity as applied to money. At some periods a very few dollars were issued, and at other periods an enormous mass was issued. Irregular and unscientific, however, as were the issues of greenbacks, we had better times than we have ever had since, because on the whole there was a sufficient quantity of money.

Mr. CHANDLER. Everybody agrees, I will say to the Senator, that an increase in the volume of money is beneficial; but it is like drinking whisky, if you drink too much you break down. How can we limit the amount of this national money?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. All on our side are against both inflation and contraction.

Mr. CHANDLER. It encourages me to move toward the Senator if he is against inflation.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. We are against inflation, because it must end disastrously. It is easy to point out the road by which it ends. When prices of commodities are rising for no cause whatever connected with their production, and the rise can only be attributed to the increasing volume of money, every unthinking person in the country wants to become possessed of property. Seeing prices rising, he wants to get an option on everything in sight, and will pay almost any interest to secure it. I remember seeing this exemplified in Los Angeles. When property was rising everybody wanted to get options; they wanted to get a chance to control property in order to take advantage of the rise in prices, but by and by they found that the prices rose faster than the money increased in volume, and very soon everything collapsed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will not the same people who want to do this elect Representatives and Senators in Congress—if they can get at them—to come here to Washington and issue a great deal more money? It seems to me that that is the danger.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONEY. The observation I wish to make is suggested by the question of the Senator from New Hamsphire [Mr. CHANDLER]. Does the Senator from Nevada not know that Brazil maintained for years and years an absolutely irredeemable and inconvertible limited paper currency at par without either silver or gold?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. How about the Argentine? If the Senator will allow me, I think I should be willing to go as far as they have gone in Brazil, but not quite so far as they have gone in the Argentine. I want the Senator from Nevada to tell me how we can go so far and then stop?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. The only thing needed for safety is knowledge. The people should understand the principles regulating the value of money. Many of the leading men of the country refuse to investigate our presentation of the subject; they refuse especially to investigate the law or principle of quantity; they hold up their hands against it; they run away from it; yet that is the very fundamental law of money.

There should, of course, be an exact regulation of the circulation. The thing for every statesman to do, in my judgment, is to study and discuss thoroughly this law of quantity, which is perfectly mathematical. Our people are so accustomed to the miseries of falling prices, hard times, disappointment, and distress in business, that if good times were once restored they would, in my opinion, be ready to mob any man who should talk about changing them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Any man who talked about refusing to increase the money?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. No; about changing its quantity.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not about increasing it?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. What would they want a change for?

Mr. CHANDLER. To make better times.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Oh, no; there would be no danger of that. I have more confidence in the masses of the people than has the Senator. As I have said, there is no instance in history in which any inflation has arisen from a demand of the people. I believe our people understand what they want, and I believe that when once they commenced to see good times resulting from proper regulation of the quantity of money they would make no change.

THE AGGREGATE MONEY VALUE CAN BE INCREASED OR DECREASED ONLY BY AN INCREASE OR DIMINUTION OF PRODUCTIVE FORCES AND WEALTH.

When interrupted I was proceeding to state the contentions of the school of thinkers that favor the use of Government paper money of full legal-tender power, and I will continue that subject.

They assert that the money of all countries, whatever may be its material, is nothing but the sum of the integrant parts into which the money value is divided; that the value of each of these integrant parts, or units, will depend upon the number of parts into which this value is subdivided; that in case this value is subdivided through the use of the precious metals, these units, or integrant parts, are subjected to variations in their value through an increase in the number from unknown and accidental supplies from the mines, and through a decrease by the unknown number of such units which may be consumed in other uses; that while the cost of producing such units adds nothing to their money value, the uncertainty of producing them and the uncertain quantity destroyed after being produced render it impossible to regulate the number, and consequently the value of such units.

They maintain that the aggregate of the money value can only be increased or diminished by an increase or diminution of the productive forces and wealth which it measures and which govern it; that the increase or decrease of the number of the units of money can have no effect upon the aggregate of the money value, but that the number of such units simply determines the fractional part of the whole value belonging to each unit; that the money value will inhere in any material substance whatever upon which the sovereign authority may confer the money function; that whenever the law declares that paper in a certain form, upon being stamped with authoritative and distinguishing marks and devices, shall be invested with the money function, each piece of such paper so stamped becomes not a debt, nor a credit, nor a promise, dishonored or otherwise, nor a "representative" of gold or silver, nor of any one thing, but of all things; that it becomes the thing signified, not a sign, and to all intents and purposes lacking no quality, but possessing all, becomes money, pure, simple, and unadulterated, with a value not less real because not possessing intrinsic qualities useful for other purposes than the money value conferred in the same manner and by the same authority on gold and silver.

A MATERIAL MOST USEFUL FOR MONEY PURPOSES WHEN POSSESSING NO UTILITY FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

They claim that money can be maintained steadier and more uniform in purchasing power, and made to perform its true functions with greater exactness when composed of some material substance always attainable and not possessing utility or value for other purposes than when composed of metals difficult and uncertain of attainment and subject to other than money demands; that the commingling of money value and commodity value in one substance is an intermingling of things whose uses are inconsistent with and whose elements have no affinity for each other; that it is a confounding of barter with price, and of measure with the thing to be measured; that the uncertain, varying, and generally increasing demand for the commodity subjects the money to vicious perturbations in value, while the superior and constant demand for the money renders the commodity more steady in value than it would otherwise be; that the greater steadiness thus gained in the commodity value is of no importance or benefit whatever, while the resulting unsteadiness in the value of money is a transcendent injury to the world; that the commodity demand for gold and silver not only exerts a disturbing influence on the value of metallic money, but, unfortunately, always exerts it in the ruinous direction of increasing that value by diminishing the volume of money, and still more unfortunately that, as wealth and population increase, old uses increase and new uses are discovered; that to unite commodity and money in one substance is to plant in money the seeds of its own destruction; that the arts, resisting the invasion of heir legitimate domain, are constantly absorbing the coin; that such money is costly and unscientific, and only an improvement on the barter system, and retains vicious ingredients of that barbarous method of exchange; that it is as imperfect an instrument for measuring values as would be a thermometer for measuring heat if its fluid were subject to constant disturbances to an unknown extent from other influences than heat.

EVIL OF FLUCTUATIONS OF SUPPLY.

They maintain that the fluctuation in the value of metallic money caused by the encroachments of the commodity demand is sufficient of itself to condemn the use of gold and silver as money, but that when to this are added the enormous fluctuations in their supply the argument against their use becomes conclusive.

They claim that adequate metallic supplies in the future will depend, as in the past, upon the accidental discoveries of mines and upon the policy and mining laws of the governments controlling the locality of the discoveries.

They maintain that the industry of mining, and especially gold mining, is more subject to chance and less governed by the economic laws of production than any other pursuit, and consequently bears only an accidental relation to human efforts in other fields, and that therefore the product of such industry is uneven and ill-suited for a measure of all values. They claim that the world's supply of metallic money, and consequently its value, is not only subject to the vicissitudes inherent in the business of mining, but is largely increased or diminished, as the case may be, through political complications, and through other conditions which have no necessary connection with mining.

As a signal illustration of this, they refer to the decrease of the supplies of gold and silver after 1809, caused by the revolutions in the Spanish-American colonies, and to the enormous increase of the supplies at a later period through the acquisition and occupation of California, which resulted from the success of the Democratic party in the close Presidential election of 1844, and which might otherwise have been postponed indefinitely; that of these two noted changes in the metallic supply, resulting from facts having no necessary connection with mining, the first nearly bankrupted the world, while the second stimulated industry and commerce to an extent never before known.

ESPECIALLY THE EVIL OF INADEQUACY.

They say that in addition to the evils which result in fluctuations in the supply of the precious metals is the fatal evil of inadequacy of supply which for a quarter of a century has been pressing upon the industry and commerce of the world with crushing severity. They refer to the facts that the yield of the precious metals since 1847 has been unprecedented, aggregating billions of dollars; that this entire amount, swollen by the sums liberated by suspending countries, has been permitted to flow uninterruptedly into the few countries maintaining the specie basis; that the maximum of production was reached in 1865, when there began a fall of prices lasting for more than thirty years.

It blighted civilization, retarded prosperity, and brought more unhappiness to the world than if there had been continuous war during that entire period. They insist that these facts show that, even if the precious metals were otherwise fit for money, the utter impossibility of regulating their quantity interposes an insuperable objection to a money system founded upon them.

HUMAN PROGRESS INTERMITTENT BY REASON OF VARIATIONS IN MONETARY SUPPLIES.

They maintain that by reason of the great variations in the supply of the precious metals, and the purely accidental relation which that supply has borne to the world's demand for money, the movement of the human race in wealth and civilization has been fitful and spasmodic, and not always progressive; that the business of the world in all times past has been, through fluctuations in the supply of money, now stimulated by fever and now prostrated by collapse; that industry and commerce have been alternately borne high on the flood tide of metallic production from newly discovered mining fields, and stranded on the shoals of bankruptcy by the refluent ebb; that, unfortunately, the ebbs and flows of these tides are of unequal duration; that the flux of prosperity has usually lasted but a brief period, while the reflux of adversity, with its attendant circumstances of falling prices, industrial paralysis, and destitute populations, has been painfully prolonged; that the tide of metallic production which commenced its flood in 1847 turned in 1865 to an ebb that lasted until within a very recent period; that however well metallic money may have been adapted to the circumscribed business and political and social condition of the past, the growing industry and commerce of the world can not afford to have their lusty limbs shackled by it in the future.

They maintain that as the most important function of money is to measure values and to preserve equities in time transactions, the great bulk of which are internal and between citizens of the same country, and all of which are expressed in the money of some particular country, it follows that any system of money that is common to several countries is a vicious system, in that it subjects the entire internal business of each of them to all the disasters originating in the political or financial mismanagement of foreign governments, or in the political disturbances, follies, misfortunes, or reckless speculations of the inhabitants of any one or all of such governments, as, for instance, in the case of the Baring failure.

Mr. STEWART. And the Boer war.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. And the Boer war. Under a gold standard we may expect at any time to hear of a war on some island of which we never heard before that will shake the financial foundation of this country, because it will throw our securities on the market and take our money away—money that is indispensable for our domestic exchanges; money that is essential to transact our business; more essential than any other thing whatever.

MONEY THE INSTRUMENT, NOT THE OBJECT, OF COMMERCE.

These advocates of full legal-tender Government paper money assert that money is simply the instrument of commerce and industry, and not their object; that a sufficiency of it is better than more and infinitely better than less; that the outflow of money from one country to another having money systems in common is a double injury; that it is an injury to the country that receives it, and a greater injury to the country that parts with it; that it tends in the one instance to produce crises through inflation, and, in the other, panics through contraction; that the invention of money is but half completed when the necessary limitations and regulation of its quantity, and consequently of its value, are remitted not only to the chances of mining, but to the vicissitudes in the business and legislation of foreign countries; that these facts and considerations, and many others which might be urged, show that metallic money is an inaccurate money, that it fills only in a moderate degree any of the requirements of a perfect system, while, in essential particulars, it so far fails to fill them as to render it unfit for an advanced civilization.

ADVANTAGES OF A PERFECTLY REGULATED SYSTEM OF MONEY.

They claim, on the other hand, that every requirement of a perfect system can be met more nearly and more certainly by a properly regulated system of paper money than by any other ever devised. Not paper money based upon gold, silver, or any other fluctuating commodity, whose measure it should be; nor upon a promise of commodities, near or remote, definite or indefinite, of governments or of banks; nor like the French assignats, based upon lands; nor like our national-bank notes, based on bonds; nor fastened to gold or silver by a chain sure to snap when the metals are wanted; nor convertible into bonds and thereby offering the bribe of interest for the withdrawal of the money from circulation; nor of any use to its owner except when parted with; nor capable of yielding profit except when employed in the production and distribution of wealth; but an absolute money, whose value, conferred by the sovereign authority, and regulated by a prearranged and perfected system, and not by the passions and caprices of the hour, would rest impregnably on functions essential to civilization and progress.

They claim that it would be more portable, more difficult of imitation, more easily verified, more readily divisible, and less expensive than metallic money; that as quantity controls the value of money, the all-important quality of steadiness in value could be better assured through a system which subjects that quantity to absolute control than through the metallic system, which remits the regulation of quantity to accidents and vicissitudes, industrial and political, sometimes through the resumption or suspension of the yield of the mines, and sometimes through the resumption or suspension of specie payments in any and every country; that as paper money is producible substantially without labor and without expense, its exclusive use would be an addition to the public wealth equal to the entire cost of furnishing and keeping up the supply of the necessary quantity of metallic money; that in order to make it secure and possess the highest degree of utility, paper money should be issued exclusively by the Government, to the exclusion of all other kinds of money; that it should be regulated in value through an equitable adjustment of quantity, by virtue of laws which should take effect only upon the occurrence of conditions precedent not dependent upon legislation, such as an increase of population; that it should be reciprocally receivable by Government and people and between the people themselves; that its each unit should be convertible, not at any specific time or place, nor into any specific quantity of any particular product of human industry, such as gold or silver, but at all times and in all places where the sovereign power gives it the right to circulate, and to the full extent of the value determined as above, and into any and all of the products of human industry, including those metals.

They claim that every argument against investing with the money function a material not possessing qualities useful for non-monetary purposes is, when analyzed—I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to this statement—an impeachment of the integrity and capacity of the people and of their fitness for self-government, and a claim that the regulation of the most important institution of civilization can be more safely remitted to the edicts of chance than to the guidance of human wisdom.

REASONS FOR FAILURE TO ESTABLISH SUCH A SYSTEM HERETOFORE.

That the failure in times past to establish satisfactory systems of paper money no more proves that such systems are impossible than the innumerable abortive attempts throughout the ages to establish individual liberty proved that political freedom was impossible; that if the French assignats broke down, so also did the French Republic, and mainly for the similar reasons, that the French people did not then fully comprehend the true nature of either liberty or money; that the same degree of virtue and enlightenment necessary for the establishment of the one is necessary for the establishment of the other; that the failures of efforts under revolutionary or despotic governments to establish paper-money systems have no significance whatever; that no such effort has ever been made under free institutions firmly established, without which perfection in the money, or any other system which affects the general welfare, is impossible.

That the failures of one age often become the established successes of the next; that every progressive movement of mankind has been tedious and toilsome and has been accomplished only through trial, suffering, and the disappointment of repeated failures; that every step of this progress has been impeded by a sinister conservatism which glorifies everything, even stupidity and tyranny, if hoary with age, and always seeks to rivet the needs of the present to the decaying and imperfect systems of the past and to deny to the human race the hopes and possibilities of the future.

That there have been the same evolutions of progress in money as in all other things; that in the rude original of society no kind of money was possible; that the first trade was by barter, after which some one or more commodities attainable in the vicinage, and in general use and demand, were selected as the common media through which all exchanges were filtered; that the use for that purpose of various metals by weight followed next, and at a succeeding stage gold, silver, and copper by weight, and after this their use in the form of coins.

That in most countries coined money has been sometimes supplemented and sometimes superseded by promises to pay coin, which were always broken when coin was demanded; that the next step in many countries has been a coinage maintained above its bullion value through limitation of quantity and the stamp of authority, as in subsidiary silver coinages, and at the present time in the entire silver coinage in the States of the Latin Union and the United States; and that since the success of this last step in preserving, through limitation of quantity, a steadiness of money value above and wholly independent of commodity value has been assured, it would be presumptuous to affirm that the same means may not furnish, without any commodity value whatever, a better and steadier money than the world has ever seen, and that such money will not become the money of the future.

They do not overlook the objections heretofore made on the part of many thoughtful persons to the issuance of full legal-tender paper money by the Government, but they claim that those objections have been founded on overissues, the result of ignorance on the part of statesmen as to the factors of value in money, and especially the disregard of the natural law of quantity, on which the whole science of money is founded, political economists of repute admitting that when sufficiently limited in quantity such money has always maintained its value at the par of gold.

But they claim that in the present enlightened age the true function of money is better understood than at any former period; that with all the experience of the past to warn and guide, false systems may be avoided and a true system established; that such countries as have free, stable, and constitutional governments and advanced systems of jurisprudence, and which furnish universal opportunities for education, and whose citizens are, by the practice of liberty, accustomed to self-imposed burdens and restraints, can be intrusted with the regulation of the volume and value of "fiat" money with a full assurance that it will be regulated with wisdom and equity, and they maintain that it is the only kind of money whose value can be scientifically regulated.

The statement of the great financial authority, Ricardo, must commend itself to every reflecting mind. He says:

> A regulated paper currency is so great an improvement in commerce that I should greatly regret if prejudice should induce us to return to a system of less utility. The introduction of the precious metals for the purposes of money may, with truth, be considered as one of the most important steps toward the improvement of commerce and the arts of civilized life. But it is no less true that with the advancement of knowledge and science we discover that it would be another improvement to banish them again from the employment to which, during a less enlightened period, they had been so advantageously applied.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I must be permitted to say that the world has never known the degree of progress of which mankind is capable under the influence of a sufficient and regularly increasing quantity of money. It never will be known to what degree of excellence and achievement the human race may attain until the monetary volume shall keep even step and pace with the world's monetary wants. The physical, intellectual, and spiritual development of mankind depends upon an unfailing sufficiency of the money quantity.

But so long as the world determines to adhere to the metals it is essential to the welfare of society and industry that both shall be utilized to the fullest extent in order that the inevitable oscillations in the yield of one shall be supplemented by the correcting oscillations in the yield of the other. There never has been too much of both; and in view of the tendency of industry and commerce to unexampled development and expansion, it is, in my judgment, exceedingly to be regretted that the United States are to be deprived of the benefits to be derived from the utilization of both metals as full legal-tender money. In my judgment it will not be many years before the people of this country will reverse the verdict of Congress and insist upon a measure of legislation that will not deliberately reject the bounties of nature, but will again make available for purposes of money the metal that has always been and must long continue to be the money of the masses of mankind.

The Late Daniel Ermentrout.

REMARKS
HON. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 3, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 3, 1900.

"Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. DANIEL ERMENTROUT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for fitting tribute to his memory.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, do adjourn"—

Mr. GAINES said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall detain the House but a few moments. I have no prepared speech, but shall speak of DANIEL ERMENTROUT, whose memory we hold dear, as I knew him in this body and socially. My acquaintance begun at the Fifty-fifth Congress convened in extra session. But a few moments after it was announced from the Clerk's desk in the organization of the House that I represented the Nashville district I saw him first. Immediately upon this announcement being made I saw him, to me a total stranger, leave his seat and walk deliberately around to where I now stand, giving me his hand and saying: "DANIEL ERMENTROUT, from the good county of Berks, which," said he, "always goes Democratic. Yes, sir; always stands for the party." And if I mistake not, he said that "that county had not gone Republican for the last thirty years."

He immediately began to inquire of some old friends in Nashville and was characteristically solicitous about them. From that time until we parted, when the extra session adjourned sine die, my association with him was frequent and of the very pleasantest nature. I so much enjoyed his companionship, and, indeed, so much appreciated the friendly, warm-hearted bearing toward me, that when I invited a party of members of Congress, at the request of my people in Nashville, to attend our Centennial, he was among the first whom I invited, and he, with his charming wife, composed two of that party of sixty.

He was an outburst of sunshine wherever he went. I remember our party went out to Murfreesboro to the home of my distinguished colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON], and there, with others, he was called upon to make a speech. He made the best speech of the occasion, and I remember in discussing the subject then before that meeting—for we were invited out by the charming people of Murfreesboro to look over the historic battlefield of Stones River—the question of making it a military park was raised.

I believe a measure of that kind is now pending before Congress, and I remember distinctly that Mr. ERMENTROUT said that he favored it, that he would support it; but he said, "I want a condition coupled with it. We must take care of the ashes of the brave Confederates who also sleep on this memorable battlefield. If not, I will not support the measure. They and their children are paying the taxes. They bear the burdens, and they and their dead should receive some of the benefits bestowed by a generous Government. We are all one people and we all love the same flag."

During our two days' trip to Nashville he was a champion of the cause of pleasure making, adding always refinement and zest to each and every occasion, he was the joy of the party. He was happy all the time. He could tell a good joke, was a good historian, and had a rich store of memories, and particularly, as he always said, of "the good county of Berks." He was entertaining to the old and the young alike, always refreshing.

Reaching Nashville, DANIEL ERMENTROUT, if not the guest of some charming circle of new acquaintances, if left alone a short while, soon had a crowd about him. I can see him now talking to the little "darkies," as he called them, telling them jokes, adding oftentimes, as he thought, a charm to the "yarn," as he called his jokes, by saying, "I am a Yankee Democrat."

Mr. Speaker, "kind hearts are more than coronets." He made no distinctions in kind attentions. He was the center of attraction wherever he went, whether in a circle of distinguished ladies and gentlemen or with the very humblest of the immense throngs that visited our noted centennial. He was liked by all. He loved to make everybody enjoy life, as he often said.

I remember the succeeding day we took our party to the Hermitage, where rests the sacred dust of Jackson, the hero of every fight, civic, military, or political. DANIEL ERMENTROUT was the first man to alight from the train; he was the first man in the conveyance; the first man to leave the conveyance; the first man to reach the mansion, and the first man to reach the sacred tomb of Jackson and his wife. I remember how he dwelt about that historic sepulchre; how he was touched by the epitaph over the grave of Mrs. Andrew Jackson, written by Jackson himself, which reads as follows:

Here lie the remains of Mrs. Rachel Jackson, wife of President Jackson, who died the 22d of December, 1828, aged 61 years. Her face was fair, her person pleasing, her temper amiable, her heart kind. She delighted in relieving the wants of her fellow-creatures, and cultivated that divine pleasure by the most liberal and unpretending methods; to the poor she was a benefactor; to the rich an example; to the wretched a comforter; to the prosperous an ornament; her piety went hand in hand with her benevolence, and she thanked her Creator for being permitted to do good. A being so gentle and so virtuous slander might wound, but could not dishonor; even death, when he bore her from the arms of her husband, could but transport her to the bosom of her God.

He read this beautiful epitaph over and over again, as I have seen, Mr. Speaker, often the case. I remember distinctly what he said at the conclusion of this reading: "He was a faithful husband, a faithful friend, and a faithful public servant on all occasions." And then, turning to one of the officers of the Ladies' Hermitage Association, with his hat off in the hot sun and with the graciousness of a Chesterfield, he said:

I congratulate the Ladies' Hermitage Association that they have such a spot as this to love, to visit, and preserve.

Mr. Speaker, when I learned of the death of DANIEL ERMENTROUT I was indeed shocked and distressed. I felt that I had lost a warm friend. That the "good county of Berks" had lost an illustrious and useful son, one who had stood by her in a most loyal and patriotic manner in public office, and who had been an ornament to society, who had reared a beautiful family, who did honor to that county and his State. And, Mr. Speaker, when I look over the biographical sketch of this very remarkable man I feel that there are few people in this country who have been honored by others as much as he was. I am not surprised that he was loyal to them. Let me read, Mr. Speaker, from a short history of his life:

He was born at Reading, Berks County, Pa., January 24, 1837, and has continued to reside there since; was educated in the public and classical schools of his native city, Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, and Elmwood Institute, Norristown, Pa.; studied law and was admitted to practice in the courts of Berks County in August, 1859; was elected district attorney of Berks County for three years in 1862; was solicitor for the city of Reading 1867-1870; was elected to the State senate of Pennsylvania in 1873 for a term of three years, and reelected in 1876 for four years; was a member of the board of school control of Reading for many years; was appointed in October, 1877, by Governor Hartranft—

Governor Hartranft was a Republican, but he saw DANIEL ERMENTROUT was the man for the place, and appointed him—a member of the Pennsylvania statuary commission; was several times chairman of the Democratic county committee of Berks; delegate to various State and national conventions; was in 1880 elected as a Democrat to represent Berks County, then constituting the Eighth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, in the Forty-seventh Congress, and successively in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses, his services ending March 4, 1889; served on the House committees on Accounts, Banking and Currency, Military Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, and was chairman of Committee on Election of President and Vice-President; was elected in 1896 as a Democrat to represent Berks and Lehigh counties, constituting the Ninth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. Speaker, here is an unbroken chain of honors that were conferred on this distinguished son of Pennsylvania by his people. It is very often said, Mr. Speaker, that a man is not without honor save in his own country, but here certainly is an exception, a man who was not only honored at home, but loved beyond the limits of his State. He left a happy impress on his fellows in Congress. He came here and won my own heart, and it is to me a pleasant yet sad duty to bear testimony to the charming characteristics of his lovely individuality, and to say that wherever he went, whether North or South, East or West, he won the heart of everyone, and seemed to make it a business invariably to make people happy, to turn the cutting edge of anguish, and if not able to bring them to his high standard of taking life easy, to hurry the clouds by and beyond. The undertaking was natural and pleasing to him.

Mr. Speaker—

No radiant pearl which crested fortune wears,
No gem that twinkling hangs from beauty's ears,
Not the bright stars which night's blue arch adorn,
Nor the rising sun that gilds the vernal morn,
Shine with such luster as the tear that flows
Down virtue's manly cheek for other's woes.

The Late Denis M. Hurley.

REMARKS
HON. ADOLPH MEYER, OF LOUISIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 1, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Whereas the late Hon. DENIS M. HURLEY, member of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Second district of the State of New York, died on the 25th day of February, 1899, immediately preceding the final adjournment of the Fifty-fifth Congress; and

"Whereas the pressure of public business in the few days then remaining of the Fifty-fifth Congress prevented a day being set apart for the customary tributes to the memory of the said deceased:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives be permitted to print in the RECORD appropriate remarks in eulogy of the said Hon. DENIS M. HURLEY, deceased"—

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not rise for the purpose of speaking in detail of the varied and useful career of DENIS M. HURLEY, to whose memory we are now paying this tribute. That duty has been well performed by those from whom it more appropriately comes than from myself, but a long association with the deceased in this House, and an observation of his public career will surely justify in me a brief word expressive of my respect and sympathy for his elevated sturdy character and useful service.

Mr. HURLEY sat in this House for about four years, the choice of a great constituency from the important city of Brooklyn. Serving with him as a colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, and in frequent social intercourse, I had constant opportunity to observe and study his admirable traits of character and his devotion to duty. He was a man endowed with a quiet but steady enthusiasm, and brought to the performance of his duties an admirable courage, perfect conviction, and conceded purity of motive, and even those who differed from him most widely in his political beliefs, recognized his sincerity, and respected him as a worthy and most honorable antagonist.

I believe that Mr. HURLEY enjoyed the sincere respect of every member of the House, and he more than deserved it. He was not a man of artifice or tricks. He had no cunning. He was not a demagogue or timeserver. He spoke always what he believed to be the truth. He followed unostentatiously but firmly what he believed to be the path of duty. No line of ambition, no sordid motive, no popular clamor or misconception could have led him to swerve from the right as he understood it. He was a punctual, a faithful, a laborious public servant. In an epoch when many public men are accused, whether rightfully or wrongfully, no one ever whispered a syllable against his personal integrity. His life was one of republican simplicity, true to his antecedents and traditions; homely, if you please, but clean, honest, and brave.

If the high standard of fidelity and duty that Mr. HURLEY recognized could be made the law and life of our representative men, the effect upon every branch of the public service would be to quicken us all to a new and higher patriotism and to inspire a stronger hope in our institutions. He has left a noble model for us to follow. Those who specially mourn his loss in this hour of bereavement can not but feel that he has well and bravely filled his part, both as a useful citizen in the industrial walks of life and on a great theater of public action; and that not only his good works do follow him, but the lesson of a high example.
